to this extent (and it is sufficient to sustain the proceedings in this case), that, where the trial is completed by the introduction of testimony, the arguments of counsel, and the charge of the court, and the case has passed to the jury for consideration before midnight of Saturday, the fact that they do not finally arrive at and return a verdict until some time in the early hours of Sunday morning does not vitiate the entire proceedings, and compel a retrial."

In the case of Barter v. People, 8 Ill. 395, Caton, J., in discussing this question, says: "But, although the law seems to be well settled that a judgment cannot be entered of record on Sunday, yet I think it equally settled that a verdict of a jury may be entered of record on Sunday. . . . We think the authorities clearly establish that when a cause is submitted to the jury before 12 o'clock on Saturday night the verdict of the jury may be received on Sunday, but that it is not a judicial day for the purpose of rendering any judgment, and, if it attempt to render a judgment, still, in law, it would be no judgment, but absolutely void, and will be so declared, and may be reversed by this court. Not that such reversal will take from it any force or vitality, for it never had any, nor having been rendered by a court having authority to render any judgment whatever at the time."

In the case of Reid v. State, 53 Ala. 403, Judge Manning says: "We are of opinion that when a jury, to whom a cause has been committed on a Saturday or other secular day of the week, are lawfully kept together under charge of officers of court, and are ready on Sunday to deliver in their verdict, it is lawful for the judge then to meet them, with the other officers of court, to receive it, and thereupon to discharge the jury, and adjourn the court until the next day."

In the case of Webber v. Merrill, 84 N. H. 203, it was held that a verdict may be lawfully returned on Sunday, if the case has been committed to the jury before that day.

In the case of Sargeant v. Butts, 21 Vt. 96, Judge Redfield says: "The arbitrators might retain the case under consideration during Sunday, and make their award upon any day, or close it at the earliest possible moment, and then set themselves to the appropriate celebration of the Lord's day, freed from the care of this and other worldly anxieties of a secular character. The latter course to us seems the more consistent with that unostentatious humble-mindedness which is so befitting the Christian profession."

In the case of Huidekoper v. Cotton, 3 Watts, 59, it is held that a judgment is not erroneous because the verdict upon which it was rendered was delivered on Sunday. See also Kiosser v. McColly, 9 Ind. 587; McCorkle v. State, 14 Ind. 89; Joy v. State, Id. 189; True v. Plumley, 36 Me. 466; Buller v. Kelsey, 15 Johns. 177; Houghtaling v. Osborn, Id. 119; State v. Ricketta, 74 N. C. 187; State v. McGimsey, 80 N. C. 877. See also Coleman v. Henderson, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 171, 12 Am. Dec. 291, note. It may be argued, however, that this court.

in the case of Bass v. Irvin, 49 Ga. 486, held a contrary doctrine to the views above announced. The reasoning of the court in that case, we admit, is in conflict with the views we have announced in this case, as well as in conflict with all the other authorities we have been able to find, except the case of Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene (Iowa) 410, and the case of Shaw v. McCombs, 2 Bay, 282, referred to in Huller v. English, 4 Strob. L. 486, supra. We have already seen that the case of Shaw v. McCombs was improperly reported; and it is said in the notes to 9 Pac. Rep. supra, that the case of Davis v. Fish is no longer law in Iowa. We do not think it was necessary to the decision in Bass v. Irvin, 49 Ga. 486, for this court to go as far as it did in its reasoning upon this question. In that case a verdict had been obtained that was written upon the wrong paper, and no judgment had been entered. A motion was made to transfer the verdict to the proper declaration in the case, and to enter up judgment thereon nunc pro tunc. The defendant was called upon to show cause why the motion should not be granted; and he showed for cause that no legal verdict was rendered in said case, the pretended verdict having been returned on the Sabbath day, in the absence of, and without the consent of, the defendant. The facts seem to be that the judge opened his court on Sunday, and received the verdict in the absence of the defendant or his counsel, and without their knowledge. We think that under this state of facts the judgment rendered by the court was perhaps right. We do not think the trial judge had a right on Sunday, in the absence of the parties, to go to the court-house, open the court, and receive the verdict; for the parties had a right to be present when the verdict was received. This court, as now constituted, would follow that case, under an exactly similar state of facts, unless we were called upon to review it; but we would not feel bound by all of the reasoning of the decision.

We reverse the judgment of the court below because of the refusal to grant a new trial on the eighth ground of the motion.

WEISS et al., Appts.,
v.

DISTRICT BOARD OF SCHOOL DIS-TRICT NO. 8, of the City of Edgerton, Resp't.

(.... Wis....)

1. A petition stating that petitioner is taxed for the support of the public schools and is equally entitled to the benefits thereof, and that the reading of the Bible therein is contrary to the rights of conscience and is in violation of law and the Constitution, is sufficient to raise the question of the legality of such reading.
2. Averments of legal conclusions from facts stated, or of facts not well pleaded, are not admitted by a general demurrer to the pleading.
3. Courts will take judicial notice of the contents of the Bible, and that the religious world is divided into sects, and of the general doctrines maintained by each sect.
4. The "sectarian instruction" prohibited by art. 10, § 3, of the Constitution, is instruction in religious doctrines which are believed by some religious sects and rejected by others.
5. There is no room for construction of a constitution outside of the words themselves if they are unambiguous; and the rules as to the authority of surrounding circumstances and contemporaneous exposition are unimportant in such cases.
6. The use of the Bible as a text-book and the stated reading thereof in the public schools without restriction is "sectarian instruction" within the meaning of art. 10, § 3, of the Constitution, which ordains that no such instruction shall be allowed in such schools; and the fact that children are not compelled to remain in the school-room during such reading does not remove the cause for complaint on the part of one feeling himself aggrieved thereby.
7. When a man's conscience coincides with the law, and he obeys its dictates, he will be protected.

(Per Cassoday, J.)

8. The stated reading of the Bible in a public school renders it a place of worship within the provision of the Constitution, art. 1, § 18, that no man shall be compelled to support a place of worship against his will; hence taxpayers compelled to aid in the erection and support of such school-house have a legal right to object to its being put to such a use.

9. Such reading also renders the school a religious seminary, and is prohibited by the provision of art. 1, § 18, of the Constitution, that no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious seminaries.

APPEAL by relators from an order of the Circuit Court for Rock County overruling a demurrer to the answer in a proceeding for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to cause the reading of the Bible in a certain public school to be discontinued. Reversed.

Statement by Lyon, J.:

The relators filed their petition in the Circuit Court of Rock County praying that a writ of mandamus issue to the District Board of School District No. 8, of the City of Edgerton, in said county, commanding said Board to cause the teachers in the public schools of that district to discontinue the practice, which had theretofore prevailed, of reading therein selections from the Bible. The petition is as follows:

"The petition of Frederick Weiss, W. H. Morrissey, Thomas Mooney, James McBride, J. C. Burns and John Corbett respectfully shows unto this court that your petitioners are, and for many years last past have been, residents and taxpayers of the City of Edgerton, in Rock County, Wisconsin; that there are in said City of Edgerton, kept and maintained in accordance with and in pursuance of the Revised Statutes of said State of Wisconsin, certain free common schools; that the residents of said City of Edgerton who are taxed for the support of said schools are equally entitled to the benefits thereof by having their children instructed therein according to law; that your petitioners are parents of children, which children they are desirous of having educated in said schools; that said children of your petitioners, respectively, to wit: Annie Mooney, Ettie Weiss, Thomas Burns, Nora Corbett, Bessie Corbett, Katie Corbett, Annie McBride, Jane McBride and James McBride are pupils of and attend said schools for the purpose of receiving instruction.

"Your petitioners further show that certain of the teachers employed by the District Board having charge of said schools to conduct the same and instruct the pupils attending said schools read to said pupils, and among them the children of your petitioners above named, each and every day when said schools are in session and during the hours fixed for the instruction of pupils certain portions of the book commonly known as the Bible, said teachers themselves selecting the portions so read, and uniformly using in such reading the translation of said Bible known as the King James version; that such reading as above set forth was and is a custom followed by certain of said teachers in said schools.

"Your petitioners further show that they and many others of the residents and taxpayers of said city and school district, whose children attend said schools and are under the control and are instructed by the teachers above named, and who are lawfully entitled to the equal benefits of said schools, are, together with their said children, members of the Roman Catholic Church, and conscientiously believe its doctrines, faith and forms of worship, and that by said church the version of the Scriptures referred to in this petition is taught and believed to be incorrect as a translation, and incomplete by reason of the omission of a part of the books held by such church to be integral portions of the Inspired Canon; and it is further taught by the said Roman Catholic Church and believed by its members that the Scriptures ought not to be read indiscriminately, inasmuch as said church has divine authority as the only infallible teacher and interpreter of the same, and that the reading of the same without note or comment, and without being expounded by the only authorized teachers and interpreters thereof, is not only not beneficial to the children in said schools, and especially to the above-named children of your petitioners, who are members of said church, but likely to lead to the adoption of dangerous errors, irreligious faith, practice and worship, and that by reason thereof, the practice of reading the King James version of the Bible, commonly and only received as inspired and true by the Protestant religious sects, is regarded by the members of said Roman Catholic Church, among whom are your petitioners, as contrary to the rights of conscience and as wholly contrary to, and in violation of, the law; and that your petitioners believe such exercises as are above set forth, and each and all of them, to be sectarian instruction, and in violation of § 3, art. 10 of the Constitution of the State of Wisconsin.

"Your petitioners further show that they, with others of said residents and taxpayers of said city and school district, have petitioned and requested said Board having the control and management of said schools, to interfere as they lawfully might and should do, and to direct said teachers to discontinue the unlawful and wrongful practices and exercises above set forth, and to confine the instruction to be given by such teachers to the studies and branches of knowledge lawfully provided for the said pupils; but that said Board has wholly neglected and refused, and still does wholly neglect and refuse to in any way interfere in said matter, and has and does wholly refuse to perform the duties legally devolving upon it, and has and does now permit said above-mentioned exercises to be carried on as above set forth.

"Wherefore your petitioners pray that a writ of mandamus may issue from said court to said District Board, commanding said Board to cause said teachers to discontinue the practices and exercises above set forth."

Upon such petition an alternative writ of mandamus was issued and served, to which the District Board made return as follows:

"The answer of the District Board of School District Number 8, of the City of Edgerton, to the amended alternative writ of mandamus issued by the Circuit Court for Rock County in the above-entitled action.

"I. The District Board of School District Number 8, of the City of Edgerton, for return and answer to the amended alternative writ of mandamus issued in the above-entitled action, admit that the said Frederick Weiss, W. H. Morrissey, Thomas Mooney, James McBride, J. C. Burns and John Corbett are and for many years have been residents and taxpayers of the City of Edgerton; that there is in said City of Edgerton, kept and maintained in accordance with and in pursuance of the statutes of the State of Wisconsin, a free common school; that the residents of the City of Edgerton taxed for the support of said school, and having children to be instructed therein, are entitled to the benefits of such school; that the petitioners Frederick Weiss, Thomas Mooney, James McBride, J. C. Burns and John Corbett are parents of children which they are desirous of having educated in said school; that the children named in said amended alternative writ are pupils of and attend said school, for the purpose of receiving instruction therein.

"The said District Board, further answering the allegations of said amended alternative writ, admit that two of the teachers employed by said District Board, and having charge of two of the departments in said school, did, prior to the filing of this petition of the relators of this action, read to the pupils in their departments, daily when said school was in session, portions of the book known as the Bible; that said teachers selected the portions of the Bible so read by them; that these selections so read were made from the translation of the Bible known as the King James version, and that some of the children whose names are set forth in the said amended alternative writ attended and received instruction in the departments of said school in which such selections from the Bible were so read; but said Board allege that the children of said petitioners were not and are not required to remain in said school during the reading of such portions of the Bible, but are at liberty to withdraw during such reading if they desire to do so.

"The said District Board, further answering the allegations of said alternative writ, deny that selections from the Bible were read by all of the teachers in said school, or that such selections were read in all the departments of said school.

"The said District Board, further answering the allegations of said amended alternative writ, admit that the petitioners above named, together with the children in said alternative writ named, were and are members of the Roman Catholic Church; that they believe in the doctrines, faiths and form of worship of the Roman Catholic Church, and that by said Roman Catholic Church the translation of the Bible known as the King James version is believed to be incorrect as a translation, and incomplete by reason of the omission of certain books held by said church to be integral portions of the Inspired Canon.

"The said District Board, further answering the allegations of said amended alternative writ, admit that it is taught by said Roman Catholic Church and believed by some of its members, that the Scriptures ought not to be read indiscriminately; that said Roman Catholic Church has divine authority as the only infallible teacher and interpreter of the Scriptures, and that the reading of the same without note or comment, and without being expounded by the only authorized teacher and interpreter thereof, is not only not beneficial to children, but likely to lead to the adoption of dangerous errors, irreligious faith, practice and worship, and that by reason thereof, the practice of reading the King James version of the Bible is regarded by some of the members of the Roman Catholic Church, and by the petitioners above named, as contrary to the rights of conscience, and as contrary to and in violation of law, and that the petitioners above named believe that the reading of the King James version of the Bible as set forth in said amended alternative writ, to be sectarian instruction, and in violation of § 8, art. 10 of the Constitution of the State of Wisconsin.

"But said District Board, further answering the allegations of said amended alternative writ, upon information and belief, deny that the Roman Catholic Church is the only infallible teacher or interpreter of the Bible, but on the contrary said Board allege, upon information and belief, that every person has the right to read the Bible and interpret it for himself; that the claim of the relators in that regard is sectarian, and that an enforcement thereof would be a violation of the Constitution of this State.

"The said District Board, upon information and belief, further deny that the reading of selections from the King James version of the Bible, as alleged in said alternative writ, is contrary to the rights of conscience or in violation of law, or that the same is sectarian instruction, or in violation of § 8 of art. 10 of the Constitution of this State, or of any provision or requirement of said Constitution, or of the statutes or the common law of this State; and the said Board, upon information and belief, deny that the reading of such selections from the Bible by some of the teachers in said school, in some of the departments thereof, as the same were in fact read, was contrary to or in violation of law, or that the same was or is sectarian instruction, or that the same was or is in violation of § 8 of art. 10 of the Constitution of this State, or that the same was or is in violation of any provision or requirement of the Constitution or the statutes or the common law of this State.

"The said District Board, further answering the allegations of said amended alternative writ, admit that they have permitted, and now do permit, some of the teachers in some of the departments of said school to read, without comment, selections made by such teachers from the King James version of the Bible, and said Board, upon information and belief, allege that they have the lawful right to permit such selections to be made and read by some of said teachers, in some of the departments of said school.

"The said District Board, further answering the allegations of said amended alternative writ, upon information and belief allege that they have no lawful right or authority to require the teachers in said school to discontinue the reading of selections from the Bible in said school, and that therefore they ought not, and cannot, lawfully require said teachers to discontinue the reading of selections from the Bible in some of the departments of said school.

"II. The said District Board, for a further answer and return to the allegations of the amended alternative writ issued by said court in this action, admit that the petitioners named in said writ, with their children, are members of the Roman Catholic Church, and that they believe that the translation of the Bible known as the King James version is incorrect as a translation, and incomplete by reason of the omission of a portion of the books held by the Roman Catholic Church to be integral portions of the Inspired Canon; but the said District Board, upon information and belief, allege that the said Roman Catholic Church does also believe and teach that the translation of the Bible known as the Douay and Rheims version, and commonly called the Douay version is correct and complete; that said church and the members thereof constantly use said Douay version in the worship conducted in and by said church; and said Board, upon information and belief, allege that said translation of said Bible known as the King James version contains no book, or part of book, not contained in the translation known as the Douay version; that the King James version and the Douay version are different translations of the same Bible; that there is no material difference in said translation; that while the selections from the Bible read by the teachers in the school of said district were read from the King James version, the portions and passages so read are contained in the Douay version, and were not and are not materially different from the translation of the same portions and passages of the Bible in the Douay version used by said Roman Catholic Church.

"The said District Board, upon information and belief, further show that the following are the only portions of said Bible so selected by the said teachers in said school and read therein, and that the same were read from the King James version of said Bible:"

Quotations from the Scriptures are inserted in the answer, consisting of the 1st, 15th, 19th, 23d, 24th, 27th, 37th, 46th, 100th, 121st, 125th Psalms; the 1st, 3d, 18th, 16th and 20th verses of chapter 15 of the Book of Proverbs; the 16th, 20th and 22d chapters of Proverbs; the 2d chapter of Matthew; the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th and 13th verses of the 5th chapter of Matthew; the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th and 16th verses of the 6th chapter of Matthew; the 13th chapter of Matthew; the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th and 28th verses of the 25th chapter of Matthew; the first 14 verses of the 11th chapter of Luke; the first 23 verses of the 19th chapter of Luke; the first 5 verses of the 21st chapter of Luke; the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th verses of the 14th chapter of Romans; and the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians.

The answer then proceeds as follows: "This said District Board, upon information and belief, further allege that the portions of the Bible above set forth and so selected by said teachers and read in said schools as aforesaid were not and are not sectarian; that the reading of those portions of the Bible above set forth was not and is not sectarian instruction; that the reading of the portions of the Bible above set forth was not and is not contrary to the rights of conscience, nor in violation of § 8 of art. 10 of the Constitution, or the statutes or the common law of this State, and that said § 8 of art. 10 of the Constitution was not intended by the people of said State, when said Constitution was adopted, to prohibit the reading of the Bible in the schools of said State, and does not prohibit the reading of the Bible in such schools.

"III. The said District Board, for a further answer and return to the amended alternative writ issued by said court in this action, respectfully show that prior to, and at the time of, the filing of the petition of the relators in this action, said School District Number 8 was duly formed and organized as a school district under and in pursuance of the laws of this State, that prior to the time of the filing of said petition the said school district owned and maintained a school-house in said district; that prior to the time of filing such petition a school with different departments therein was maintained and taught in said school house under the direction of said District Board, and that such school was being maintained and taught in said school-house at the time of the filing of the petition of the relators herein.

"The said District Board further show that prior to the time of filing said petition the District Board of said district had the right and authority to determine what school and text books should be used in the several branches of study pursued in the school of said district; that prior to the filing of said petition the said District Board, in pursuance of their authority, decided and determined what school and text books should be used in the school in said district, and made a list of such books, and adopted the same as the books to be used in said district in the manner required by law; that such list was and is as follows:" Here follows a list of such text-books, one of which is the Bible.

The return then goes on to its close as follows:

"The said District Board further show that the translation of the Bible selected and included in said list of text and school books and adopted by said Board was and is the version thereof known as the King James version, and that the readers so selected and included in such list and adopted by said Board contain many selections from the King James version of the Bible.

"The said District Board further show that said King James version of the Bible was so selected by said Board and included in said list of text-books and adopted by said Board for the purpose of being used in the general education of the scholars attending said school, and not for sectarian instruction.

"The said District Board further show that when a list of text-books has been made by it, that it is by the statutes of this State prohibited in making any changes in said list for the term of three years; that it cannot make any change in said list until after the expiration of three years without the consent of the state superintendent, and that three years have not elapsed since said list of text books was so made by said District Board.

"The said District Board, upon information and belief, further show that prior to the time of the reading of the Bible in the school of said district, and prior to the adoption of said list of text-books by said District Board as aforesaid, the superintendent of public instruction in said State of Wisconsin recommended for adoption and use in the schools of said State a list of text-books; that in such list of text-books so recommended by said state superintendent and as a part thereof is the King James translation of the Bible, and that such recommendation has not been in any way revoked or withdrawn, but still remains in full force.

"The said District Board, for a further return and answer to the amended alternative writ issued in this action, allege that said school district was, long prior to the reading of the Bible as mentioned in the petition of the relators, duly formed and organized as a school district under and in pursuance of the statutes of this State; that the members of said District Board were duly elected and qualified as required by law; that, as members of such Board, they entered upon the discharge of their duties, and the performance of the trusts reposed in them as members of such Board; that the school in said district is established and maintained for the benefit and advantage of all of the children residing in said district between the ages of four and twenty years; that there are residing in said school district, in addition to the children named in the petition of the relators, about 500 children, a small proportion of whom are children of Catholic parents, or members of the Roman Catholic Church, but nearly all of whom are children of Protestant parents; that such school is established and maintained for the purpose of giving and securing to all of the children within the ages aforesaid residing in said district as complete an education as the educational facilities of said district will permit; that it is the duty of said District Board to so maintain, conduct and control said school that every child within the ages aforesaid residing in said district shall have the advantage of every educational facility that may be afforded by said school; that the Bible is an important text-book in said school; that there is no book known to said Board that can be used as a text-book in said school which will take the place of the Bible in said school; that the reading of the Bible to the children attending said school at suitable and proper times is an important part in the education of the children attending said school; that the parents of the children in said district, with the exception of the petitioners and a very few others, desire that the King James translation of the Bible be used as a text book in said school; that the reading of the Bible in said school is not in any way sectarian instruction in said school, and is not in any way prohibited by the Constitution or the laws of this State.

"And the said Board, upon information and belief, further allege that it is the duty of said Board to require said Bible to be used in said school as a text-book at suitable and proper times, when the use thereof will aid in the education of the children attending said school; and that said Board has no right to prohibit, and should not attempt to prohibit, the use of the Bible in said school at proper and suitable times, when such use will aid in making more complete the education of the children attending said school; and said Board submits that, for the reasons above set forth, they ought not to discontinue the use of the Bible in the school of said district, and that they have no right nor authority to discontinue such use of the Bible in said school.

"Wherefore said Board pray the judgment of this court denying the prayer of the petition of the relators, and that said Board recover their costs and disbursements in this action."

The petitioners interposed a general demurrer to such answer and return, and the same was overruled by the court, and the petitioners appeal to this court from the order overruling such demurrer.

Messrs. Humphrey J. Desmond and J. H. M. Wigman, with Messrs. Winans & Hyzer, for appellants.

Messrs. J. P. Towne and A. A. Jackson for respondent.

Lyon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners are residents and taxpayers of the City of Edgerton, and their children are pupils in the public schools of that city. They allege in their petition that certain of the teachers employed by the District Board having charge of such schools read daily to the pupils therein, during school hours, certain portions of the King James version of the Bible, selected by the teachers; and that the petitioners have requested the District Board to require the teachers to discontinue such practice, but the Board refuses to do so. The petitioners further allege that such practice is a violation of certain provisions of the Constitution of this State, hereinafter more particularly mentioned, and pray that a writ of mandamus may issue from the circuit court to the School Board commanding such Board to cause the teachers to discontinue the practice and exercises complained of.

Upon the filing of such petition in the circuit court, the usual alternative writ of mandamus was issued and served upon the School Board. The Board made return to such writ by filing an answer to the petition, admitting the existence of the practice complained of, and the refusal of the Board to cause it to be discontinued, denying the authority of the Board to interfere with the practice, and alleging that the practice is legal and proper, and that the Bible is a duly authorized and selected text-book for use in said schools.

Further statement of the contents of the petition and answer is hereinafter made.

The petitioners demurred to the answer of the School Board, alleging as ground of demurrer that the answer fails to state facts showing that a peremptory writ of mandamus, as prayed, should not issue. The circuit court overruled the demurrer, and the petitioners appeal to this court from the order in that behalf.

The questions which must be adjudicated on this appeal have been argued by the respective counsel with great ability, and with all the earnestness of intense personal conviction. The arguments, and the opinion of the learned circuit judge overruling the demurrer to the answer of the respondent, show great learning and historical research, and have been valuable to us in our deliberations upon the case.

The constitutional objections urged by the petitioners to the reading of the Bible in the district schools are that, (1) It violates the rights of conscience. (2) It compels them to aid in the support of a place of worship against their consent (Const. art. 1, § 13). (3) It is sectarian instruction (art. 10, § 8).

This opinion will be confined quite closely to a discussion of the question, whether the adoption of the Protestant or King James version of the Bible, or any version thereof, in the public schools in the City of Edgerton, as a text-book, and the reading of selections therefrom in those schools at the times and in the manner stated in the answer, is sectarian instruction within the meaning of that term as used in § 8, art. 10 of the Constitution, which ordains that no sectarian instruction shall be allowed in the district schools of this State.

1. Some questions as to the effect of the demurrer upon certain allegations in the answer of the respondent to the petition for a writ of mandamus will first be considered. It is a familiar rule that a demurrer to any pleading reaches back through the whole record, and seizes hold of the first defective pleading. In this case, the petition for a writ of mandamus and the answer of the School Board thereto constitute the pleadings. Hence, if the petition is insufficient, judgment on the demurrer to the answer should go for the respondent, although the answer may also be insufficient. This rule is invoked by the learned counsel for the respondent.

It best comports with the gravity and importance of the case to fully consider and determine it upon the merits, to the end that the controversy which has grown out of the practice complained of be put at rest in this State. Hence, no narrow or technical construction of the pleadings should prevail which will defeat or postpone a final adjustment of the controversy.

The petitioners are members of the Roman Catholic Church, and believers in its doctrines. Hence, it is quite natural that most of the averments in their petition should be made, as they in fact are, from the stand point of such doctrines. But should it be held that members of that church have no valid grounds, as such, for their objections to the reading of the Bible in the district schools, still the petition contains general averments sufficiently broad to cover any valid objection to such reading, which might be made by any citizen of the State aggrieved by the action of the School Board. These averments are: "That the residents of said City of Edgerton who are taxed for the support of said schools are equally entitled to the benefits thereof, by having their children instructed therein according to law," and that such reading of the Bible "is contrary to the rights of conscience, and wholly contrary to and in violation of the law, and that your petitioners believe such exercises as above set forth, and each and all of them, are sectarian instruction, and in violation of § 3, art. 10 of the Constitution of the State of Wisconsin."

The answer contains several averments which counsel claim are admitted by the demurrer, but which are mere legal conclusions from facts stated therein, such as that the reading of the Bible in schools is not sectarian instruction, or that the School Board have lawful right to permit, and none to prevent, such reading of the same. Averments of this kind, or of facts not well pleaded, are not admitted by a general demurrer to the pleading. 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 581, and cases cited in note 6.

It is averred in the return that there is no material difference between the King James version of the Bible used in the Edgerton schools, and the Douay version, which is the only one recognized by the Catholic Church as correct and complete. It is universally known that there are differences between these two versions in many particulars, which the respective sects regard as material. Hence, the averment is against common knowledge, and therefore not well pleaded.

Our conclusion is that if such reading of the Bible is sectarian instruction, or if it violates any other constitutional right of any citizen or sect, the petition is sufficient.

2. In considering whether such reading of the Bible is sectarian instruction, the book will be regarded as a whole, because the whole Bible, without exception, has been designated as a text-book for use in the Edgerton schools, and the claim of the School Board is substantially (although perhaps not in terms) that the whole contents thereof may lawfully be so read therein if the teachers so elect. This being so, it is quite immaterial if the portions thereof set out in the return as the only portions thus far read are not sectarian. Yet it should be observed that some of the portions so read seem to inculcate the doctrines of the divinity of Jesus Christ, and the punishment of the wicked after death, which doctrines are not accepted by some religious sects.

3. The courts will take judicial notice of the contents of the Bible; that the religious world is divided into numerous sects; and of the general doctrines maintained by each sect,—for these things pertain to general history and may fairly be presumed to be subjects of common knowledge. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 6, 6, and notes.

Thus they will take cognizance, without averment, of the facts that there are numerous religious sects, called "Christians," respectively maintaining different and conflicting doctrines; that some of these believe the doctrine of predestination, while others do not; some the doctrine of eternal punishment of the wicked, while others repudiate it; some the doctrines of the apostolic succession, and the authority of the priesthood, while others reject both; some that the Holy Scriptures are the only sufficient rule of faith and practice, while others believe that the only safe guide to human thought, opinion and action is the illuminating power of the Divine Spirit upon the humble and devout heart; some in the necessity and efficacy of the sacraments of the church, while others reject them entirely; and some in the literal truth of the Scriptures, while others believe them to be allegorical, teaching spiritual truths alone or chiefly. The courts will also take cognizance of numerous other conflicts of doctrine between the sects; also that there are religious sects which reject the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, among which is the Hebrew or Jewish sect, which denies the inspiration and authority of the New Testament; and, further, that the sect known as the Latter Day Saints, or Mormons, while accepting the Bible, is reputed to believe the Book of Mormon, and the deliverances of its own alleged prophets, to be of equal authority therewith. Many, if not most, of the above sects include within their membership citizens of Wisconsin. A great majority, if not all, of them, base their peculiar doctrines upon various passages of Scripture which may reasonably be understood as supporting the same.

It should here be said that the term "religious sect" is understood as applying to people believing in the same religious doctrines, who are more or less closely associated or organized to advance such doctrines and increase the number of believers therein. The doctrines of one of these sects which are not common to all the others are sectarian, and the term "sectarian" is, we think, used in that sense in the Constitution.

4. Counsel for the School Board maintain in their argument that the Christian religion is part of the common law of England; that the same was brought to this country by the colonists, and, by virtue of the various colonial charters, was embodied in the fundamental laws of the Colonies; that this religious element or principle was incorporated in the various State Constitutions, and in the Ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, by virtue of which ordinance it became the fundamental law of the Territory of Wisconsin. Numerous quotations are given by him from the above documents, from the utterances of Congress and Legislatures, and from the writings of our early statesmen, to prove these propositions. That the learned counsel have fairly demonstrated their accuracy is freely conceded. More than that, counsel have proved that many, probably most, of those charters, and some of the State Constitutions, not only ordained and enforced some of the principles of the Christian religion, but sectarian doctrines as well.

They have also attempted, at considerable length, to show that the Church of Rome is hostile to our common-school system. This court neither affirms nor denies the accuracy of this position. Moreover, counsel on both sides have argued, to some extent, as to whether certain religious dogmas are true or false.

None of these matters are material or pertinent to the questions to be determined on this appeal. This case must be decided under the Constitution and laws of this State now in force, and it is entirely immaterial to the decision thereof whether the interference of the courts to compel a faithful execution of the law by school boards is invoked by those who are hostile or friendly to our common-school system. The question is, What is the law of the case? not, What opinions are entertained by those who demand its enforcement? It is scarcely necessary to add that we have no concern with the truth or error of the doctrines of any sect. We are only concerned to know whether instruction in sectarian doctrines has been or, under existing regulations, is liable to be, given in the district schools of the State, and especially in the public schools of the City of Edgerton.

5. We come now to the more direct consideration of the merits of the controversy. The term "sectarian instruction" in the Constitution manifestly refers exclusively to instruction in religious doctrines, and the prohibition is only aimed at such instruction as is sectarian, that is to say, instruction in religious doctrines which are believed by some religious sects and rejected by others. Hence, to teach the existence of a Supreme Being of infinite wisdom, power and goodness, and that it is the highest duty of all men to adore, obey and love Him, is not sectarian, because all religious sects so believe and teach. The instruction becomes sectarian when it goes further, and inculcates doctrine or dogma concerning which the religious sects are in conflict. This we understand to be the meaning of the constitutional prohibition.

That the reading from the Bible in the schools, although unaccompanied by any comment on the part of the teacher, is "instruction," seems to us too clear for argument. Some of the most valuable instruction a person can receive may be derived from reading alone, without any extrinsic aid by way of comment or exposition. The question, therefore, seems to narrow down to this: Is the reading of the Bible in the schools—not merely selected passages therefrom, but the whole of it—sectarian instruction of the pupils? In view of the fact already mentioned, that the Bible contains numerous doctrinal passages, upon some of which the peculiar creed of almost every religious sect is based, and that such passages may reasonably be understood to inculcate the doctrines predicated upon them, an affirmative answer to the question seems unavoidable. Any pupil of ordinary intelligence who listens to the reading of the doctrinal portions of the Bible will be more or less instructed thereby in the doctrines of the divinity of Jesus Christ, the eternal punishment of the wicked, the authority of the priesthood, the binding force and efficacy of the sacraments, and many other conflicting sectarian doctrines. A most forcible demonstration of the accuracy of this statement is found in certain reports of the American Bible Society of its work in Catholic countries (referred to in one of the arguments), in which instances are given of the conversion of several persons from "Romanism" through the reading of the Scriptures alone. That is to say, the reading of the Protestant or King James version of the Bible converted Catholics to Protestants without the aid of comment or exposition. In those cases the reading of the Bible certainly was sectarian instruction. We do not know how to frame an argument in support of the proposition that the reading thereof in the district schools is not also sectarian instruction.

It should be observed in this connection that the above views do not, as counsel seemed to think they may, banish from the district schools such text-books as are founded upon the fundamental teachings of the Bible, or which contain extracts therefrom. Such teachings and extracts pervade and ornament our secular literature, and are important elements in its value and usefulness. Such text-books are in the schools for secular instruction and rightly so, and the constitutional prohibition of sectarian instruction does not include them, even though they may contain passages from which some inferences of sectarian doctrine might possibly be drawn.

Furthermore, there is much in the Bible which cannot justly be characterized as sectarian. There can be no valid objection to the use of such matter in the secular instruction of the pupils. Much of it has great historical and literary value which may be thus utilized without violating the constitutional prohibition. It may also be used to inculcate good morals—that is, our duties to each other—which may and ought to be inculcated by the district schools. No more complete code of morals exists than is contained in the New Testament, which reaffirms and emphasizes the moral obligations laid down in the Ten Commandments. Concerning the fundamental principles of moral ethics, the religious sects do not disagree.

6. It is urged on behalf of the School Board that the Constitution must be interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances existing when it was framed and adopted, and that contemporaneous exposition thereof is of great authority. Cases in this court and elsewhere are cited to these propositions. Undoubtedly they are correct rules of interpretation, applicable alike to constitutions, statutes and all written instruments, where the language employed is of uncertain import. But if the words of the instrument are unambiguous, there is no room for construction outside the words themselves, and the above rules cease to be controlling or important. It is proper, however, to consider the constitutional prohibition in the light of such rules of interpretation.

On the subject of contemporaneous exposition, counsel refer us to the uniform action of the department of public instruction in this State, from 1853 to the present time, recommending the Bible as a text-book in the district schools, as evidence that the constitutional provision under consideration was not understood by the framers of that instrument, or the people who adopted it, as excluding from such schools the reading of the Bible. The action of that department upon the subject, showing, as it does, the opinions of the eminent scholars and teachers who have presided over it for a long series of years, is entitled to great weight, and on a doubtful question of construction would doubtless be held controlling. But we do not think the true interpretation of the constitutional provision under consideration is doubtful or uncertain, or that any extraneous aid is required in order to interpret it correctly. Hence our judgment cannot properly be controlled by the action of the department of public instruction, or the opinions of its learned chiefs. The fact probably is that the practice of Bible reading in the district schools was not seriously challenged at the outset, and not subjected to close legal scrutiny until the policy of the department had become fixed. It was but natural that such policy should, to some extent at least, be thereafter adhered to.

It is further said that the practice of reading the Bible in the district schools prevailed generally after the adoption of the Constitution. This is claimed to be a most persuasive fact showing that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution and the people to prohibit the practice. We do not know how the fact was, but we must be permitted to doubt whether the practice was ever a general one in the district schools of the State. We are quite confident that it is not so at the present time. It was said in argument, and not denied, that the practice does not prevail in the public schools in any of the larger cities in the State. But were the fact otherwise, for the reasons above stated, it would not be controlling.

It may not be uninformative to consider somewhat certain other circumstances existing when the Constitution was adopted, which may fairly be presumed to have influenced the inserting therein of the provision against "sectarian instruction" in the district schools.

The early settlers of Wisconsin came chiefly from New England and the Middle States. They represented the best religious, intellectual and moral culture, and the business enterprise and sagacity of the people of the States from which they came. They found here a Territory possessing all the elements essential to the development of a great State. They were intensely desirous that the future State should be settled and developed as rapidly as possible. They chose from their number wise, sagacious, Christian men, imbued with the sentiments common to all, to frame their Constitution.

The convention assembled at a time when immigration had become very large, and was constantly increasing. The immigrants came from nearly all the countries of Europe, but most largely from Germany and Ireland. As a class they were industrious, intelligent, honest and thrifty—just the material for the development of a new State. Besides they brought with them, collectively, much wealth. They were also religious and sectarian. Among them were Catholics, Jews and adherents of many Protestant sects. These immigrants were cordially welcomed, and it is manifest the convention framed the Constitution with reference to attracting them to Wisconsin.

Many, perhaps most, of these immigrants came from countries in which a state religion was maintained and enforced, while some of them were non-conformists and had suffered under the disabilities resulting from their rejection of the established religion. What more tempting inducement to cast their lot with us could have been held out to them than the assurance that, in addition to the guarantees of the right of conscience and of worship in their own way, the free district schools in which their children were to be, or might be, educated, were absolute common ground where the pupils were equal, and where sectarian instruction, and with it sectarian intolerance, under which they had smarted in the old country, could never enter.

Such were the circumstances surrounding the convention which framed the Constitution. In the light of them, and with a lively appreciation by its members of the horrors of sectarian intolerance, and the priceless value of perfect religious and sectarian freedom and equality, is it unreasonable to say that sectarian instruction was thus excluded to the end that the child of a Jew, or Catholic, or Unitarian, or Universalist, or Quaker, should not be compelled to listen to the stated reading of passages of Scripture, which are accepted by others as giving the lie to the religious faith and belief of their parents and themselves?

It is argued that the reading of the Bible in the district schools is not included in the constitutional prohibition of sectarian instruction therein, because the Bible is not specifically mentioned in the Constitution. It is said that if it was intended that such reading was to be excluded, it would have been so provided in direct terms. The argument may be plausible, but is believed to be unsound. Constitutions deal with general principles and policies, and do not usually descend to a specification of particulars. Such is the character of the provision in question. In general terms it excludes sectarian instruction, and the exclusion includes all forms of such instruction. Its force would or might have been weakened had the attempt been made to specify therein all the methods by which such instruction may be imparted.

We have a statute upon this general subject which must not be overlooked. Sec. 3, chap. 251, Laws 1883, amending § 514, Rev. Stat., provides that in cities "no text-books shall be permitted in any free public schools which will have a tendency to inculcate sectarian ideas." Of course this applies to the public schools of the City of Edgerton. This statute certainly emphasizes the constitutional prohibition, although it may not extend its scope. It is, in effect, a legislative declaration that the use of text-books which have "a tendency to inculcate sectarian ideas" is sectarian instruction, prohibited by the Constitution.

For the reasons above stated, we cannot doubt that the use of the Bible as a text-book in the public schools, and the stated reading thereof in such schools, without restriction, "has a tendency to inculcate sectarian ideas," and is sectarian instruction, within the meaning and intention of the Constitution and the Statute.

7. The answer of the respondent states that the relators' children are not compelled to remain in the school-room while the Bible is being read, but are at liberty to withdraw therefrom during the reading of the same. For this reason it is claimed that the relators have no good cause for complaint, even though such reading be sectarian instruction. We cannot give our sanction to this position. When, as in this case, a small minority of the pupils in the public school is excluded for any cause from a stated school exercise, particularly when such cause is apparent hostility to the Bible, which a majority of the pupils have been taught to revere, from that moment the excluded pupil loses caste with his fellows and is liable to be regarded with aversion, and subjected to reproach and insult. But it is a sufficient refutation of the argument that the practice in question tends to destroy the equality of the pupils which the Constitution seeks to establish and protect, and puts a portion of them to serious disadvantage in many ways with respect to the others.

8. The foregoing views render unnecessary any extended discussion of the question whether such reading of the Bible is or may be a violation of the rights of conscience guaranteed by section 18 of the Bill of Rights art. 1, Const.). There has been considerable discussion concerning the limitations of that right. That there are limitations thereto must be conceded. For example, a Mormon may believe that the practice of polygamy is a religious duty, yet no court would regard his conscience in that behalf for a moment should he put his belief into practice.

The petition alleges that, in addition to their objections to the King James version, the relators have conscientious scruples against the reading of any version of the Bible to their children, either in the district schools, or elsewhere, without authoritative note, comment or exposition, because the practice may lead their children to adopt dangerous errors, and irreligious faith, practice and worship. When we remember that wise and good men have struggled and agonized through the centuries, to find the correct interpretation of the Scriptures, employing to that end all the resources of great intellectual power, profound scholarship and exalted spiritual attainments, and yet with such widely divergent results; and further, that the relators conscientiously believe that their church furnishes them means, and the only means, of correct and infallible interpretation,—we can scarcely say their conscientious scruples against the reading of any version of the Bible to their children, unaccompanied by such interpretation, are entitled to no consideration.

But however this may be, it may safely be said, and nothing further need be said upon the subject, that when a man's conscience coincides with the law, and he obeys its dictates, he will be protected.

9. Whether the reading of the Bible in the public schools is religious worship, and whether it constitutes the school-house for the time being a place of worship, and, if so, whether such reading during school hours as a school exercise against the consent of a taxpayer, compels him to support a place of worship, within the meaning of section 18 of the Bill of Rights, are questions which will not be here discussed. These questions are considered in an opinion by Mr. Justice Cassoday filed herewith.

10. A number of cases in different States, supposed to have a bearing upon the main question here considered and determined, have been cited, and quotations made therefrom at considerable length by the respective counsel, and by the circuit judge in his elaborate opinion overruling the demurrer to the answer. None of the States in which those decisions were made seem to have in their Constitutions a direct prohibition of sectarian instruction in the public schools. It is believed that this State was the first which expressly embodied the prohibition in its fundamental law, and we are not aware of any direct adjudication of the question under consideration, by any court previously to Judge Bennett's decision in this case, except (as we are informed) the late Judge Stewart decided in some case before him in the Circuit Court of Sauk County (but at what time we are not advised) that the Constitution prohibits the reading of the Bible in the district schools. Practically, therefore, we are now determining a question of first impression, and it must necessarily be determined upon general principles of law. Cases from which only mere inferences, more or less remote, can be deduced, afford but little aid to correct judgment in this case. Hence, the cases cited have not been specially referred to in this opinion. Some of them are nearer in point on the question considered by Mr. Justice Cassoday, and he has referred to and commented upon them in his opinion.

11. The drift of some remarks in the argument of counsel for the respondent, and perhaps also in the opinion of Judge Bennett, is that the exclusion of Bible reading from the district schools is derogatory to the value of the Holy Scriptures, a blow to their influence upon the conduct and consciences of men, and disastrous to the cause of religion. We must emphatically reject these views. The priceless truths of the Bible are best taught to our youth in the church, the sabbath and parochial schools, the social religious meetings, and above all by parents in the home circle. There those truths may be explained and enforced, the spiritual welfare of the child guarded and protected, and his spiritual nature directed and cultivated in accordance with the dictates of the parental conscience. The Constitution does not interfere with such teaching and culture. It only banishes theological polemics from the district schools. It does this, not because of any hostility to religion, but because the people who adopted it believed that the public good would thereby be promoted, and they so declared in the preamble. Religion teaches obedience to law, and flourishes best where good government prevails. The constitutional prohibition was adopted in the interests of good government, and it argues but little faith in the vitality and power of religion to predict disaster to its progress because a constitutional provision, enacted for such a purpose, is faithfully executed.

The order of the Circuit Court overruling the demurrer of the relators to the answer of the School Board must be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to that court to give judgment for the relators on the demurrer, awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus, as prayed in the petition.

Cassoday, J.

The gravity of the questions involved in this case are fully appreciated. They have received the careful consideration of all the members of the court. The writing of the formal opinion has fallen to the lot of Mr. Justice Lyon. At his suggestion a separate presentation of one branch of the case is here made. Before entering upon its direct discussion, however, but as leading to it, a few general observations may not be wholly unprofitable. It is undoubtedly true, as once observed by Mr. Justice Baldwin, that "in the construction of the Constitution we must look to the history of the times, and examine the state of things existing when it was framed and adopted, to ascertain the old law, the mischief and the remedy." Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 723 [9 L. ed. 1260].

A few years later Mr. Justice Story said: "Perhaps the safest rule of interpretation, after all, will be found to be, to look to the nature and objects of the particular powers, duties and rights, with all the lights and aids of contemporary history; and to give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the ends proposed." Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 610, 611 [10 L. ed. 1087].

These observations were of course made with reference to our Federal Constitution, but they are equally applicable to our State Constitution. In so far as the rules there suggested may aid in the construction of the provisions of our Constitution here involved, they may properly be invoked. It is probably in this view that counsel have dwelt so extensively upon the history of the Christian Church and its status under different charters and Constitutions, although much of it has a very remote, if any, bearing upon the questions here presented. All are familiar with the fact that the Jews, in the time of the apostles, were divided into "the sect of the Sadducees" and "the sect of the Pharisees." Paul declared in the presence of Agrippa "that after the strictest sect" of their religion, he had "lived a Pharisee;" and when Tertullus charged him with being "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes," he boldly confessed "that, after the way which they" called "heresy," or, as the new version has it, "a sect," he had worshiped or served the God of his fathers; and afterwards to the "chief of the Jews" at Rome, he discoursed "concerning this sect," and persuaded "them concerning Jesus both from the law of Moses and from the prophets." Of course "the sect of the Nazarenes," subsequently acquired the more honorable name of "Christians." As the centuries rolled on and Christians became more numerous, disputes arose among themselves, from time to time, in matters of faith, doctrine, practice and interpretation of certain passages of scriptures, and these led to repeated divisions and subdivisions until the different sects of Christians became very numerous. There is no purpose here of indicating that the Holy Scriptures,—the Old and New Testament,—if considered as a whole and fully comprehended, would exclude from the promises therein contained any of the human race complying with the essential conditions therein prescribed; but since every translation made by man must be more or less imperfect, and since the application of particular passages is liable to be made with partial apprehension, and biased or even distorted judgment, it is easy to perceive how texts of scripture may be read with such an emphasis and tone as to become excessively sectarian. While the members of any particular sect may be willing to have one of their own number read the Bible in the public schools, yet they are not always willing to concede the same to a member of a sect believing in an opposite faith or doctrine. But the law is impartial and has given no rights to any one sect that are not equally secured to every other. The relation of the church to the Scriptures has been a subject of controversy ever since the Reformation. Upon that question even Protestants have differed. Some have gone so far as to say that "the Bible and the Bible only is the religion of Protestants;" while others have declared that "the living church is more than the dead Bible, for it is the Bible and something more."

The relations of church and state have been the subject of discussion for many centuries; and at certain times and in certain nations of Europe one particular sect has been the established church of the state, and at other times or in other nations the belief of some other sect has been the established religion,—while other sects, not so favored, were either exterminated altogether, or permitted to remain on conditions more or less disagreeable and humiliating. These discriminations naturally generated bitterness, enmities and even cruel war among brethren. Many of the early immigrants to this country had felt the despotism of such intolerance and came hither in consequence of it. They came from different countries of Europe and consequently had experienced different types of intolerance. Some of them were as narrow-minded in such matters as their oppressors had been, and hence no sooner acquired civil power than they themselves became intolerant toward all sects except their own. Such divisions, controversies and contentions among professing Christians were supposed by many to be repugnant to the sublime teachings and fraternal spirit revealed to the world through Jesus Christ. Many of the colonists—especially when they came to the formation of state governments—proved to be sufficiently broad and liberal to exact nothing for themselves or their particular sect that they were unwilling to grant to every other citizen and his particular sect. This benign spirit seemed to extend as its wisdom became more manifest by experience. True, the Constitution of South Carolina, adopted in 1778, declared that the "Christian Protestant Religion" was the "established religion" of that State; but that was modified in 1790 so as to secure freedom and prevent discrimination or preference in worship or religion. The Constitution of North Carolina of 1776 excluded from office all non-believers in the Protestant religion or the divine authority of the Old or New Testament; while the Constitution of Delaware, of the same year, made every official subscribe to a confession of faith; but that was abrogated sixteen years afterwards, and equal protection was extended to all sects. So the first Constitutions of Maryland, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and, later, of Connecticut, provided for the support by taxation or otherwise, of the Christian or Protestant Christian religion, with more or less toleration guaranteed to other sects. Such direct sanction and toleration seem to have been inspired by a lingering attachment for, or a sympathy with, the European theory of union between church and state. But the several States of New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont and Virginia from the first, and later Maine and Rhode Island of the New England States, and every or nearly every State admitted into the Union after the organization of the federal government, expressly secured, in effect, in their respective State Constitutions, the equal freedom of every religious sect, organization and society, with a guaranty against preference or discrimination. No firm had become the public conviction in favor of a broad liberality and equal protection in such matters, at the time of the organization of our national government, that, although the Federal Constitution, as originally adopted, did not mention nor refer to the subject, yet the first session of the first Congress proposed the first amendment to that instrument prohibiting Congress from making any "law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," notwithstanding no power had therein been granted to enact such a law, and no such law could be legally enacted without such grant of power first being made. The learned counsel for the School Board contends, in effect, that the third of the "articles of compact between the original States, and the people and States" carved out of the old "Northwest Territory," is still in force in Wisconsin; and that under it this State is required and bound to directly foster and encourage "religion" through schools and education. Assuming such to be the meaning of the article, which is, to say the least, debatable, still it is only necessary here to say, in addition to what is said by my associate, that, by the adoption of our State Constitution, and the admission of the State into the Union, that article became superseded and ceased to be longer in force. This has in effect been firmly settled by the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212 [11 L. ed. 565]; Perrin v. First Municipality, 44 U. S. 8 How. 609 [11 L. ed. 742]; Strader v. Graham, 51 U. S. 10 How. 94, 97 [18 L. ed. 841, 842]; 7 L. R. A.

The question therefore recurs whether the provisions of our State Constitution, here involved, when construed with reference to the evils, or supposed evils, thereby sought to be suppressed, and the object or purpose thereby sought to be secured, permitted or prohibited the stated reading of the Bible as a text-book in the public schools. Wisconsin, as one of the later States admitted into the Union, having before it the experience of others, and probably in view of its heterogeneous population, as mentioned in the opinion of my associate, has, in her Organic Law, probably furnished a more complete bar to any preference for, or discrimination against, any religious sect, organization or society, than any other State in the Union. Our State Constitution expressly prohibits any religious test as a qualification for office, or the exclusion of any witness in consequence of his religious opinion. § 19, art. 1.

Aside from the clause just referred to, and the one against sectarian instruction, so fully considered by my brother Lyon, our State Constitution provides that, (1) "the right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed; (2) nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent; (3) nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishments, or modes of worship; (4) nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies, or religious or theological seminaries." § 18, art. 1.

The decisions of courts in States having no such constitutional prohibition, of course, can have no application to the case at bar. The question thus presented is not one of sectarian predilection, nor of religious belief, nor of theological conception, nor of sentiment, but one of fundamental law. It is no part of the duty of this court to make or unmake, but simply to construe, this provision of the Constitution. All questions of political and governmental ethics—all questions of policy,—must be regarded as having been fully considered by the convention which framed, and conclusively determined by the people who adopted, the Constitution more than forty years ago. The oath of every official in the State is to support that Constitution as it is, and not as it might have been. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Taylor Co. 53 Wis. 58; Lake Co. v. Rollins, 180 U. S. 672 [33 L. ed. 1063].

That oath is to be kept sacred, with strict integrity of purpose, and without any sectarian, religious or political bias or equivocation. In considering the meaning of the section of the Constitution quoted, we are to remember that canon of construction adverted to by my associate, and aptly expressed by Marshall, Ch. J., in these words: "Although the spirit of an instrument, especially of a Constitution, is to be respected not less than its letter, yet the spirit is to be collected chiefly from its words. It would be dangerous in the extreme to infer from extrinsic circumstances that a case for which the words of an instrument expressly provide shall be exempted from its operation." Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 302 [4 L. ed. 550].

Similar expressions have come to us from the same court within a year. "If the words convey a definite meaning which involves no absurdity, nor any contradiction of other parts of the instrument, then that meaning apparent on the face of the instrument must be accepted, and neither the courts nor the Legislature have the right to add to it or take from it." Lake Co. v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 670 [32 L. ed. 1062].

The first and third clauses of the section of the Constitution quoted are similar in their scope and may therefore be considered together. They read:

"(1) The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed; . . . (3) nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishment, or modes of worship."

This language is quite similar to and may have been taken in part from the Constitution of Pennsylvania, as well as other States. In commenting upon a similar clause in the Pennsylvania Constitution, in the celebrated Girard Will Case, Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the whole court, observed: "Language more comprehensive for the complete protection of every variety of religious opinion could scarcely be used; and it must have been intended to extend equally to all sects, whether they believed in Christianity or not, and whether they were Jews or Infidels. So that we are compelled to admit that although Christianity be a part of the common law of the State, yet it is so in this qualified sense that its divine origin and truth are admitted, and therefore it is not to be maliciously and openly reviled and blasphemed against, to the annoyance of believers or the injury of the public. Such was the doctrine of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Updegraph v. C-m. 11 Serg. & R. 394;" Vidal v. Girard, 48 U. S. 2 How. 193 [11 L. ed. 284].

In commenting upon a similar clause in the Ohio Constitution, Mr. Justice Thurman, speaking for the whole court, said: "We sometimes hear it said that all religions are tolerated in Ohio; but the expression is not strictly accurate; much less accurate is it to say that one religion is a part of our law, and all others only tolerated. It is not by mere toleration that every individual here is protected in his belief or disbelief. He reposes, not upon the leniency of government, or the liberality of any class or set of men, but upon his natural, indefeasible rights of conscience, which in the language of the Constitution are beyond the control or interference of any human authority." Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 800.

In considering the two clauses quoted from our Constitution, we are to bear in mind the general proposition, conceded by all, that our State Constitution is not a grant, but a limitation of powers. State v. Forest Co. 74 Wis. 615. 7 L. R. A.

Viewed in this light, and it will readily be perceived that these clauses operate as a perpetual bar to the State, and each of the three departments of the state government, and every agency thereof, from the infringement, control or interference with the individual rights of every person, as indicated therein, or the giving of any preference by law to any religious sect or mode of worship. They presuppose the voluntary exercise of such rights by any person, or body of persons, who may desire, and by implication guarantee protection in the freedom of such exercise. We neither have nor can have in this State, under our present Constitution, any statutes of toleration, nor of union directly or indirectly between church and state, for the simple reason that the Constitution forbids all such preferences and guarantees all such rights. But the exercise of such rights by one person, or any given number of persons, cannot be so extended as to interfere with the exercise of similar rights by other persons, nor so far as to prevent the legitimate exercise of the police powers of the State in preserving order, securing good citizenship, the administration of the law, and the Sabbath as a day of rest. Stansbury v. Marks, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 213 [1 L. ed. 353]; Com. v. Wolf, 3 Serg. & R. 43; Com. v. Leaser, 17 Serg. & R. 155; McGairick v. Wason, 4 Ohio St. 536; Simon v. Gratz, 2 Penn. & W. 412, 23 Am. Dec. 33; Shover v. State, 10 Ark. 259; Ferriter v. Tyler, 48 Vt. 469; State v. Judge of Section "A.", 39 La. Ann. 132.

Such statutes come within no constitutional prohibition and are founded upon an impregnable basis. The two clauses mentioned recognize the existence of different religious establishments or sects, and different modes of worship, but they do not have so direct a bearing upon the question here presented as the second and fourth clauses, which will now be considered. The second clause of the section quoted is to the effect that no man shall "be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent." Is the stated reading of the Bible in the public schools, as a text book, "worship" within the meaning of this clause? As indicated in the clauses already considered, the word "worship" as here used, includes any and every mode of worshipping Almighty God. Webster has defined it as: "The act of paying divine honors to the Supreme Being; religious reverence and homage; adoration paid to God, or a being viewed as God. . . . 'The worship of God is an eminent part of religion, and prayer is a chief part of religious worship.'"

Worcester defines it as: "3. Adoration; a religious act of reverence; honor paid to the Supreme Being, or by heathen nations to their deities. Worship consists in the performance of all those external acts, and the observance of all those rights and ceremonies, in which men engage with the professed and sole view of honoring God. . . . They join their vocal worship to the choir of creatures wanting voice. . . . 4. Honor; respect; civil deference."

The Imperial defines it as: "4. Chiefly and eminently the act of paying divine honors to the Supreme Being; or the reverence and homage paid to him in religious exercises, consisting in adoration, confession, prayer, thanksgiving and the like."

The Bible Dictionary declares, that the "worship of God, both spiritual and visible, private and public, by individuals, families and communities . . . is abundantly commanded in his word."

In theology, we are told, that, "the honor which is due in a peculiar sense to God consists supremely in religious worship; in making him the object of our supreme affection; and rendering to him our supreme obedience." 1 Dwight, Theol. 555.

Certainly the reading of the Holy Scriptures, as the eternal word of God, in obedience to the often repeated injunction therein contained, whether by the individual in private, or in the family, or in the public assembly, is an essential part of divine worship. Every sermon is based upon some text of Scripture. Most prayers are preceded by the reading of some passage of Scripture, as an intelligent guide to the thoughts of the worshiper or worshippers.

The Sermon on the Mount contains the prayer taught by the blessed Lord. Is it possible for any genuine believer in the Christian religion to read or listen to the reading of that sermon, and especially that prayer, without being filled with a holy sense of honor, reverence, adoration and homage to Almighty God, which is the very essence of worship?

We must hold that the stated reading of the Bible in the public schools, as a text-book, may be "worship" within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution under consideration. If, then, such reading of the Bible is worship, can there be any doubt but what the school-room in which it is so statedly read is a "place of worship," within the meaning of the same clause of the Constitution? Counsel seem to argue that such place of worship should be confined to some church edifice, or place where the members of a church statedly worship. Some of the earlier Constitutions having similar clauses, used the words "building" and "church." Manifestly the words, "place of worship," were advisedly used, as applicable to any "place" or structure where worship is statedly held, and which the citizen is "compelled to attend," or the taxpayers are compelled "to erect or support." The mere fact that only a small fraction of the school hours is devoted to such worship in no way justifies such use as against an objecting taxpayer. If the right be conceded, then the length of time so devoted becomes a matter of discretion. If such right does not exist, then any length of time, however short, is forbidden. The relators, as taxpayers of the district, were compelled to aid in the erection of the school building in question, and also to aid in the support of the school maintained therein. S. & B. Ann. Stat. §§ 480, 480(a).

Being thus compelled to aid in such erection and support, they have a legal right to object to its being used as a "place of worship." In fact it has been held that it can be devoted to no other use as against an objecting taxpayer. School District No. 8 v. Arnold, 21 Wis. 658.

In that case a temperance society obtained permission from a majority of the electors present at a school meeting, duly called, to hold its meetings in the school-house. But it was held that such electors had no authority to thus divert its use. The present chief justice, speaking for the court, among other things said: "The statute has not given the board, nor the electors of the district, any authority to permit a school house to be used for meetings of the Sons of Temperance, or anything of the kind. So the action of the electors of the district . . . was wholly unauthorized, and furnished no defense to the action." To the same effect are: Spencer v. Joint School Dist. 15 Kan. 259, 22 Am. Rep. 268; Dorton v. Hearn, 67 Mo. 801; Schofield v. Eighth School Dist. 27 Conn. 499, and Weir v. Dav, 35 Ohio St. 143.

There are cases of a contrary import, but it is very certain that, as against an objecting taxpayer, such school-house cannot be devoted to a use expressly forbidden by the Constitution of the State—as for instance as a place of worship.

There is another feature of the clause we are considering which requires attention. Under our statutes, the children of the relators, between certain ages, were bound to attend some public or private school for a certain period of each year. S. & B. Ann. Stat. § 489a (chap. 121, Laws 1879, chap. 298, Laws 1882, chap. 73, Laws 1887), superseded by S. & B. Ann. Stat. § 489b (chap. 519, Laws 1889).

In the case of a poor man incapable of educating his children at private expense, they are "compelled to attend" such school without the consent of themselves or their parents, notwithstanding it is, in a limited sense, a place of worship; and in the case of men of property, it might impose an unauthorized burden. This, as we understand, is prohibited by the clause of the Constitution we are considering.

The fourth clause of the section of the Constitution quoted, declares, in effect, that no money shall "be drawn from the treasury, for the benefit of religious societies, or religious or theological seminaries." As argued by the learned counsel for the School Board, the word "treasury" in this clause, probably refers to the state treasury. But we are to remember that the school in question receives annually from the state treasury its proportionate share, not only of the school-fund income (§ 554, Rev. Stat., § 3, chap. 124, Laws, 1885, chap. 277, Laws, 1887), but also of the one-mill tax, § 1070a, S. & B. Ann. Stat. (chap. 287, Laws 1885).

The question thus recurs, whether the money thus drawn from the state treasury for the maintenance and support of the school in question is for the benefit of a religious seminary within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution. A seminary, is defined by Webster, as a "place of training; institution of education; a school, academy, college or university, in which young persons are instructed in the several branches of learning which may qualify them for their future employments." It manifestly includes institutions of learning or education of different grades. But a religious seminary of any one grade is just as effectually forbidden as a religious seminary of any higher or other grade. The thing that is prohibited is the drawing of any money from the state treasury for the benefit of any religious school. If the stated reading of the Bible in the school, as a text-book is not only, in a limited sense, worship, but also instruction, as it manifestly is, then there is no escape from the conclusion that it is religious instruction; and hence the money so drawn from the state treasury was for the benefit of a religious school within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution. The Constitutions of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and some other States differ so widely from ours as to make the adjudications in those States almost wholly inapplicable to the question here presented. It is conceded that no decision has been found, under constitutional provisions like ours, squarely sustaining the ruling of the learned trial court. Some things have been said in some of the cases cited, arising under somewhat similar constitutional provisions, that may seem to support it. Among these are: Donohoe v. Richards, 88 Me. 879, 61 Am. Dec. 256; Ferriter v. Tyler, 48 Vt. 444; Moore v. Monroe, 64 Iowa, 367; Millard v. Board of Education, 121 Ill. 297, 8 West. Rep. 372.

The main case, largely involving other considerations, is based, in part upon decisions under Constitutions widely differing from ours, and was decided under a Constitution containing none of the provisions upon which especial stress is here laid. The same is partially true of the Vermont case. The same is true in a limited sense of the Iowa and Illinois cases; and in neither of which is any adjudication cited. The following cases seem to be in harmony with the conclusions we have reached: State v. Hallock, 16 Nev. 373; Cincinnati Board of Education v. Minor, 23 Ohio St. 211; State v. White, 82 Ind. 278, 43 Am. Rep. 496; Spencer v. Joint School Dist., Dorton v. Uearn, Schofield v. Eighth School Dist. and Weir v. Day, supra.

They are, moreover, in harmony with prior decisions of this court. Morrow v. Wood, 35 Wis. 59; School Dist. No. 8 v. Arnold, supra. In the Nevada case the decision was adverse to the use of the Catholic Bible.

We deem it unnecessary to enter upon an extended analysis of the numerous adjudications cited, since the constitutional provisions here involved rest upon us with an imperative command. The unanimous result of our deliberations is as directed by Mr. Justice Lyon.

Orton, J. concurring:

I most fully and cordially concur in the decision, and in the opinions of Justices Lyon and Cassoday, in this case.

It is not needful that any other opinion should be written, but I thought it proper to state briefly some of the reasons which have induced such concurrence in the decision.

"The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed; nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, . . . nor shall any control or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted or any preference be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship." Const. art. 1, § 18.

"No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of public trust, under the State, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of his opinions on the subject of religion." Const. art. 1, § 19.

"The interest of 'the school fund,' and all other revenues derived from the school lands, shall be exclusively applied . . . to the support and maintenance of common schools in each school district," etc. Art. 10, § 2, subd. 1.

"The Legislature shall provide by law for the establishment of district schools which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable; and such schools shall be free, and without charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of four and twenty years; and no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein." Art. 10, § 3.

"Each town and city shall be required to raise by tax annually, for the support of common schools therein, a sum not less," etc. Art. 10, § 4.

"Provision shall be made by law for the distribution of the income of the school fund among the several towns and cities of the State, for the support of common schools therein," etc. Art. 10, § 5.

These provisions of the Constitution are cited together to show how completely this State, as a civil government, and all its civil institutions, are divorced from all possible connection or alliance with any and all religions, religious worship, religious establishments or modes of worship, and with everything of a religious character or appertaining to religion. And to show how completely all are protected in their religion and rights of conscience, and that no one shall ever be taxed or compelled to support any religion or place of worship, or to attend upon the same, and more especially to show that our common schools, as one of the institutions of the State created by the Constitution, stand, in all these respects, like any other institution of the State, completely excluded from all possible connection or alliance with religion, or religious worship, or with anything of a religious character, and guarded by the constitutional prohibition, that "no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein." They show also that the common schools are free to all alike, to all nationalities, to all sects of religion, to all ranks of society, and to all complexions. For these equal privileges and rights of instruction in them, all are taxed equally and proportionately. The constitutional name, "common schools," expresses their equality and universal patronage and support. Common schools are not common as being low in character or grade, but common to all alike, to everybody and to all sects, or denominations of religion, but without bringing religion into them. The common schools, like all the other institutions of the State, are protected by the Constitution from all "control or interference with the rights of conscience," and from all preferences given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship. As the State can have nothing to do with religion, except to protect everyone in the enjoyment of his own, so the common schools can have nothing to do with religion in any respect whatever. They are as completely secular as any of the other institutions of the State, in which all the people, alike, have equal rights and privileges. The people cannot be taxed for religion in schools, more than anywhere else. Religious instruction, in the common schools, is clearly prohibited by these general clauses of the Constitution, as religious instruction or worship in any other department of the State, supported by the revenues derived from taxation. The clause, that, "no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein," was inserted ex industria to exclude everything pertaining to religion. They are called by those who wish to have not only religion, but their own religion, taught therein, "Godless schools." They are Godless and the educational department of the government is Godless in the same sense that the executive, legislative and administrative departments are Godless. So long as our Constitution remains as it is, no one's religion can be taught in our common schools. By religion, I mean religion as a system, not religion in the sense of natural law. Religion in the latter sense is the source of all law and government, justice and truth. Religion, as a system of belief, cannot be taught without offense to those who have their own peculiar views of religion, any more than it can be without offense to the different sects of religion. How can religion, in this sense, be taught in the common schools without taxing the people for or on account of it. The only object, purpose or use for taxation by law in this State must be exclusively secular. There is no such source and cause of strife, quarrel, fights, malignant opposition, persecution and war, and all evil in the State, as religion. Let it once enter into our civil affairs, our government would soon be destroyed. Let it once enter into our common schools, they would be destroyed. Those who made our Constitution saw this, and used the most apt and comprehensive language in it, to prevent such a catastrophe. It is said, if reading the Protestant version of the Bible in school is offensive to the parents of some of the scholars, and antagonistic to their own religious views, their children can retire. They ought not to be compelled to go out of the school for such a reason, for one moment. The suggestion itself concedes the whole argument. That version of the Bible is hostile to the belief of many who are taxed to support the common schools, and who have equal rights and privileges in them. It is a source of religious and sectarian strife. That is enough. It violates the letter and spirit of the Constitution. No State Constitution ever existed that so completely excludes and precludes the possibility of religious strife in the civil affairs of the State, and yet so fully protects all alike in the enjoyment of their own religion. All sects and denominations may teach the people their own doctrines in all proper places. Our Constitution protects all, and favors none. But they must keep out of the common schools and civil affairs. It requires but little argument to prove that the Protestant version of the Bible, or any other version of the Bible, is the source of religious strife and opposition, and opposed to the religious belief of many of our people. It is a sectarian book. The Protestants were a very small sect in religion at one time, and they are a sect yet, to the great Catholic Church against whose usages they protested, and so is their version of the Bible sectarian, as against the Catholic version of it.

The common school is one of the most indispensable, useful and valuable civil institutions this State has. It is democratic, and free to all alike, in perfect equality, where all the children of our people stand on a common platform, and may enjoy the benefits of an equal and common education. An enemy to our common schools is an enemy to our state government. It is the same hostility that would cause any religious denomination, that had acquired the ascendancy over all others, to remodel our Constitution, and change our government and all of its institutions, so as to make them favorable only to itself, and exclude all others from their benefits and protection. In such an event, religious and sectarian instruction will be given in all schools. Religion needs no support from the State. It is stronger and much purer without it. This case is important and timely. It brings before the courts a case of the plausible, insidious and apparently innocent entrance of religion into our civil affairs, and of an assault upon the most valuable provisions of the Constitution. Those provisions should be pondered and heeded by all of our people, of all nationalities and of all denominations of religion, who desire the perpetuity, and value the blessings of our free government. That such is their meaning and interpretation no one can doubt, and it requires no citation of authorities to show. It is religion and sectarian instruction that are excluded by them. Morality and good conduct may be inculcated in the common schools, and should be.

The connection of church and state corrupts religion, and makes the state despotic.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

VIRGINIA MIDLAND R. CO., Pff. in Err.,
v.

George WASHINGTON, Jr.

(....V.....)

A railroad company that has leased its road under due authority of law is not liable for injuries inflicted by the lessee company upon its own agent or servant in operating the road.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Alexandria City to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while an employé of the lessee of defendant's road and the public; and when such lease is made the lessor will be liable for injury to a passenger resulting from negligence of the lessee. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Underwood, 67 Tex. 589; East Line & R. R. Co. v. Rushing, 69 Tex. 305.

NOTE.—Lessor railroad, not liable for injuries resulting from negligence of its lessee.

alleged to have resulted from the negligence of such lessee's servants. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Payne, for plaintiff in error:

There are some dicta tending to the opinion that the lessor is not released from liability for injuries, but those are cases where there was no authority given to lease (Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 219); where the surrender of autonomy was voluntary and a fraud (Washington, A. & G. R. Co. v. Brown, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 445 21 L. ed. 875), to escape a condition in its charter. But where the Legislature had authorized the act, responsibility ceases.

Pierce, Railroads, 268 and note.

Where a company had been duly leased by competent authority, the lessee is responsible solely for torts committed by it.

See Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Crugen (Kan.) 15 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 516; Patterson, Railway Acct. Law, §§ 130, 131; Freeman v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 28 Minn. 443, 7 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 410-413.

The true distinction is as to liability arising out of law and duties to the public exacted by public policy (which they cannot shirk), and liability for injuries to those whom they employ and contract with to enable them to discharge their public duties.

Augut v. Boston, U. & M. R. Co. 5 New Eng. Rep. 870, 80 Me. 62; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Fiddell, 79 Ga. 489; Singleton v. Southwestern R. Co. 70 Ga. 464.

Plaintiff can sue either lessor or lessee or both, jointly or separately.

Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 20 Ill. 623, 71 Am. Dec. 291.

Though the charter or the Act of the Legislature gives a railroad company authority to make a lease of its road, the lessor can be sued for all torts of the lessee, unless it is expressly exempted from liability in the Act. Unless the lessor is thus exempted, the lessee is merely its agent, and the lessor is liable therefor as fully as if they had been done by the lessor.

Fauntleroy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Alexandria City, rendered on the 26th day of September, 1898, in an action of trespass on the case brought in said court by the appellee, George Washington, Jr., plaintiff, against the Virginia Midland Railway Company, defendant.

The declaration claims $30,000 damages for injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon the plaintiff, George Washington, Jr., while he was serving the said Virginia Midland Railway Company as a fireman upon one of its freight trains, by the negligence of the servant of the said Company, which, on the 23d day of August, 1888, in Orange County, Virginia, caused the train upon which the appellee was so employed at the time as fireman, as aforesaid, to collide with the passenger train of the said Company, marked on the schedule as No. 53.

Soon after the institution of this suit in the Circuit Court of Alexandria City the said Washington brought a like suit for the same cause of action, and for the same amount, $30,000 damages, in Orange County, where the accident occurred, against the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, which suit is now pending in the circuit court of said county.

There was a demurrer to the whole declaration, and especially to each count thereof. The Circuit Court of Alexandria City overruled the demurrer, and compelled the defendant to go to trial. In the progress of the trial the defendant objected to the introduction of the testimony of the plaintiff until a foundation was laid, and then moved to exclude it, upon the ground of total irrelevancy to the case alleged in the declaration, it not only failing utterly to prove the alleged relation of the plaintiff, Washington, to the defendant, Virginia Midland Railway Company, as its employé at the time and place of the accident, and that the said accident or injury was caused, done or occasioned by the said defendant Company, but distinctly and absolutely proving that the said plaintiff was in the employment of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, then and there, as fireman upon a train of the said company, and that the injury was done by the said train being collided with another train of the said company, under the management, control and conduct of another servant or employé of the said Richmond & Danville Railroad Company—viz., the conductor on the said passenger train No. 53.

But the court overruled the motion to exclude the said testimony, and not only permitted it

So the lessor company was held responsible to a passenger on a train of the lessee who was improperly expelled by a servant of the lessee, in Washington, A. & G. R. Co. v. Brown, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 445 (21 L. ed. 875).

But the servant of a railway company operating under a lease from another company, made without authority of law, cannot recover against the lessor for injuries sustained by the negligence of his employer or of its officers or agents. East Line & R. R. Co. v. Culberson, 3 L. R. A. 567, 72 Tex. 375.

to go to the jury, but instructed them that "the defendant could not, by the lease shown in evidence, exonerate itself from the duties and liabilities imposed upon it by law, and that it was the duty of the jury to consider the evidence before them as though the said motion (to exclude) had not been made." To which ruling of the court the defendant excepted.

Upon this evidence, and this instruction, the jury rendered a verdict for $10,000 damages for the plaintiff, which verdict the defendant moved the court to set aside; but the court overruled the motion, and entered judgment upon the verdict. To this action of the court the defendant excepted, and the case comes up to this court upon the three bills of exceptions to the said rulings of the court.

The exceptions may be all grouped, as the demurrer to the declaration, the motion to exclude the testimony of the plaintiff, and the instruction given by the court to the jury, all present the question for this court to decide—viz., the liability of the defendant, Virginia Midland Railway Company, to respond in damages to the suit of the plaintiff, Washington, for injuries inflicted on him while he was an employé of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, by the negligence of the conductor of another train of the said Richmond & Danville Company, which company had leased the said Virginia Midland Railway, by virtue and authority of an express Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, for ninety-nine years, and was in the exclusive and absolute operation, possession, management and control of the same when its own employé, Washington, a fireman upon one of its own freight trains, was run into and injured by another train of its own, under the conduct of another employé of its own—the conductor of its passenger train No. 53—without the knowledge or complicity of the Virginia Midland Railway Company, defendant, who, by solemn Act of the Legislature, had ceased to exist, so far as operating its road, and who had given up its road before this appellee was employed by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, and who owned and operated no trains, employed no servants, and had no knowledge of, contract or affinity with, the plaintiff whatever, at any time or in any way.

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in not excluding the evidence, after it manifestly failed to prove the case set out by the declaration against the defendant, and did, as manifestly, show an entire disparity between the allegata and the probata; and it aggravated the error, to the prejudice of the defendant, by its instruction, which, without defining what were the "duties and liabilities" which the defendant Company could not escape by the lease in evidence, virtually told the jury that one of the "duties and liabilities" to the public of the Virginia Midland Railway Company is to pay damages to the employés and servants of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company who are hurt by the negligence of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, provided the accident occurred on the road-bed of the lessor, Virginia Midland Company. The court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict. It is established beyond question or controversy, by the evidence of the appellee, and by the pleadings in the record, that the appellee, Washington, was not in the employment of the Virginia Midland Railway Company, which had, before Washington entered the service of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, by solemn and formal lease, for a term of ninety-nine years (as it was duly authorized to do by Acts of General Assembly of Virginia, passed February 15, 1866, and July 11, 1870), surrendered and transferred the sole and exclusive use, management, possession and control of itself and of everything pertaining to its autonomy, rights, powers and duties (except only so much as to keep itself alive) to the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, of which said lease and transfer notice was given in the most public manner, by the authorities of the Virginia Midland Railway Company, that they had abdicated, and by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company that they had acquired and assumed, control of the Virginia Midland Railway, and the pay-rolls and vouchers running through the whole period of Washington's employment, all signed by him and all paid by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, show conclusively that Washington knew of the change of ownership and management, and knew whose "servant he was to obey." He had contracted with the Richmond & Danville Company, was in its service when he was hurt, and he was injured by the negligence of the conductor in the employ of the said company. These facts are all proved in the record, and there is no question of the fact of negligence, and of the severe injuries inflicted on the plaintiff, Washington, nor of his right to recover damages for the wrong and injury: but it is contended by the plaintiff, and was held by the circuit court, that, in spite of the lease, the contract relation of master and servant between appellee, Washington, and the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, and of the negligence of that company; by whom and whose conductor he was injured, the defendant, Virginia Midland Railway Company, is liable to the suit of the plaintiff, Washington, for injuries received in the service of the lessee, Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, and which were caused by the negligence of that company.

A corporation exists and acts towards the public through and by its agents and agencies, but there is a discrimination between its duties, obligations and liabilities to the public, as such, and its duties and responsibilities to its own necessary employés, to whom it stands in the relation of master and servant by contract of employment, which may, or may not, implicate the risk or hazard of the employment. That question obtains between Washington and the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, in whose service and by whose servant he was injured. His case against the defendant is not within the reason or the rule of the numerous cases decided by this and other courts, involving the policy and law of the duty and responsibility of railway carriers to the passenger public, nor even the duty and measure of redress due for injuries inflicted by the negligence of their own servants upon those whom they employ and contract with to enable them to discharge their public duties. But the decision of the Circuit Court of Alexandria City, under review, is that the lessor, Virginia Midland Railway Company, is liable to be sued and mulcted in damages by the employés of the lessee, Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, for injuries caused in the service of that company to its own employés by the negligence or malfeasance of the lessee company's own servants, non obstante, the Act of the General Assembly of Virginia authorizing the lease of its road and the transfer of all its rights and powers, and the actual lease or transfer thereof in pursuance of the said legislative authority given and enacted by the same grantor of its charter, and in as public a law, and as much in the interests of the public, as the charter itself.

It is contended, however, by the appellee, and was so decided by the court, that, as the Act of the General Assembly authorizing the Richmond & Danville Company to acquire, "by lease or otherwise," of the Virginia Midland Railway "its franchises and property, and to hold, use and enjoy the same in like manner as the proper franchises and property of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company are held, used and enjoyed," does not, expressly and in terms, grant a positive exemption from the liabilities imposed upon it by law under its charter, the lease and transfer of its road for ninety-nine years to the absolute and entire and exclusive use, conduct and control of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company does not operate in law to relieve it from liability—not to the passenger public, or even to its own servants and for its own negligence, but to the working agencies employed by the Richmond & Danville Railroad in operating and discharging its own duties to the public, and for the negligence and wrong-doing of the Richmond & Danville Company's own servants.

This construction is not tenable in law or reason, and is not warranted by the broad scope, comprehensive language and obvious intentment of the Act of the General Assembly, nor by the act of the parties to the lease. "The lease of a railroad, under due authority of law, effects a transfer of rights and liabilities in its management, so that the corporation owning the railroad is discharged from responsibility for the lessee's torts," Pierce, Railroads, 288, and note, citing Mahoney v. Atlantic & St. L. R. R. Co. 68 Me. 68; Ditchett v. Spuyten Duyvil & P. M. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 425, 5 Hun, 165; Norton v. Wiswall, 26 Barb. 618.

"Statutes imposing police and other duties and liabilities on railroad companies are usually construed to apply to companies and persons who are in possession, under contracts with or by permission of the company owning the railroad." Pierce, Railroads, 283, 244.

"A railway cannot, without express statutory authority, divest itself of its franchise, or delegate to others the performance of that duty which the Legislature has imposed upon it." "On the other hand, where a railway, under due authority of law, has leased its line to another railway, the lessor railway is not liable for torts committed by the lessee railway in the operation of the line. Yet in Snigleton v.

Southwestern R. Co. 70 Ga. 464, where a lease had been authorized by statute, the lessor railway was held liable to a passenger who was injured by the negligent operation of a train by the servants of the lessee railway, upon the ground that the Statute authorizing the lease did not, in terms, exempt the lessor railway from liability, but this case is certainly in conflict with the current of authority." Patterson, Railway Acct. Law, §§ 130, 131.

In the case of Mahoney v. Atlantic & St. L. R. R. Co. 68 Me. 68, it was decided that the lessee company, for the purposes of the lease, became, pro hac vice, the owner of the road, and that, while the lessee operates the road under its lease, the lessor is not liable, under its charter or the statutes of the State, for an injury sustained thereon by a passenger, caused by the wrongful acts of the agents or servants of the lessee towards him; nor is there, in such case, any privity, either of contract or by implication of law, between the passenger and the lessor as common carrier of passengers by which it is rendered liable for such an injury. The remedy of the passenger for an injury thus caused is against the lessee, who had the exclusive use, care, direction and control of the road, and with whom alone the passenger contracted. See the case of Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Friddell, 79 Ga. 489; Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 5 New Eng. Rep. 865, 80 Me. 63-72.

All the cases cited and relied on by the appellee to support his suit against the Virginia Midland Railway Company for damages for injuries inflicted by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company upon Washington, its own contract servant and agent, in the operation of a road which was exclusively its own road, under a lease for ninety-nine years, by special legislative consent, given in a special Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, of as much public importance and as high a sanction as the original charter of the lessor company, are inapplicable to the facts of this case, which take it wholly out of the purview and the policy of the law which holds railroad companies to the strict and inexorable duties which they owe to the public, and to their own servants withal; but not one of them involved the question of liability of a lessor company to an employé of the lessee company, for injuries inflicted by the lessee company upon its own agent or servant in its own operations.

There is a proper suit of the appellee pending in the Circuit Court of Orange County—the scene of the accident—against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, in whose service alone Washington was, and by whose conductor he was injured, and in that suit the question of gross negligence, the extent of his injuries and the just measure of his redress must be adjudged. The verdict in this suit must be set aside and the cause dismissed.

There is error in the judgment of the Circuit Court of Alexandria City, as shown by this record, and it must be reversed and annulled.

Reversed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of California, ex rel.
Ben MORGAN, Appt.,

v.

R. Y. HAYNE et al., Respts.

(....Cal....)

1. An Act providing for the appointment by the supreme court of commissioners "to assist" "in the performance of its duties" "under such rules and regulations as said court may adopt" is not in violation of the Constitution.
2. Commissioners "to assist" a court do not usurp judicial functions or exercise any judicial power by taking such transcripts and briefs as the court shall assign to them, and reporting the result of their examination thereof, with opinions and suggestions merely for the consideration of the court, as to the proper disposition of the cases.
3. The possibility that the court may be unduly influenced by the reports and opinions of commissioners appointed to assist it does not affect the question of the constitutionality of the Act providing for their appointment when it is shown that they are not usurping judicial power.

(February 6, 1890.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for new trial in a proceeding to test the right of defendants to exercise judicial powers as alleged in the capacity of Supreme Court Commissioners. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Fox, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to us on appeal from the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco. It is one of such commanding public importance, involving, as it does, the course of procedure in, and validity of, many of the judgments rendered by this court, that upon motion it has been advanced on the calendar, and is given precedence in the order of determination. It is a proceeding against the defendants, R. Y. Hayne, H. S. Foote, I. S. Belcher, J. A. Gibson and P. Van Clief, the commissioners of this court, to inquire "by what authority they claim to exercise any judicial powers within the State of California, and particularly of considering and determining cases on appeal to the supreme court of said State."

The complaint charges: (1) that the defendants are exercising the office of judges of the Supreme Court of the State of California, and as such claim the right to and do pass upon cases appealed from the superior courts of the State to the supreme court, and decide the same by virtue of their appointment as supreme court commissioners; (2) that the Act of the Legislature creating the commission, approved March 12, 1885, and the Acts amendatory of and supplementary thereto, are contrary to the provisions of article 6, §§ 1-4, of the Constitution of the State of California, and are null and void; (3) that the only authority of the defendants to consider and pass upon appeals to the supreme court is by virtue of their appointment as commissioners, and the authority conferred under and by virtue of said Acts; (4) that they and each of them are usurping the office of supreme judge of the State of California, and exercising the judicial powers of the State, vested solely in the supreme court by the Constitution and laws of the State; and (5) that their only claim so to do is by virtue of their appointment under the Acts of the Legislature aforesaid.

The defendants answer, denying that they or either of them claim, or have ever claimed, or that they or either of them have ever exercised, or are now exercising, the office of judges of the supreme court; that they or either of them, as such or otherwise, claim the right to or do pass, or have ever passed, upon cases, or any case, appealed from the superior court to said supreme court, or to decide, or have decided, the same, by virtue of their appointment as supreme court commissioners or otherwise; deny that they or either of them claim, or have ever claimed, the right or authority to hear or determine causes, or any cause, on appeal from the superior court to the supreme court; deny that they or either of them do claim, or have ever claimed, the right to exercise any judicial power within the State; and deny that they or either of them are or ever have been usurping the office of supreme judge of the State of California, or exercising any judicial office or function whatever. They further aver that they are commissioners appointed under the Act of the Legislature approved February 15, 1889, to provide for the appointment by the supreme court of five commissioners, to be known as "commissioners of the supreme court," etc., and that the only work which they or either of them perform, or claim the right to perform, or have ever performed, or claimed the right to perform, by virtue of their appointment or otherwise, consists in the preliminary examination of the records and briefs in cases referred to them by the supreme court, or the justices thereof, and of the authorities cited in such briefs, and in the making to the court, and the justices thereof, of written suggestions and opinions of the defendants, or some of them, as to the proper disposition of said causes, so referred as aforesaid, for the consideration of the said court and justices in the determination and disposition of said causes by said court and the justices thereof; that said suggestions and opinions have no force or effect whatever as judgments or decisions, nor are they filed or recorded as such; that neither of the defendants or any of them ever enter or direct any judgment or decision whatever in any case whatever, or ever have entered or caused to be entered any judgment, order or decision whatever, in any case whatever, or ever claimed the right so to do; that neither they nor any of them do perform or exercise, or ever have performed or exercised, any other function than as above stated. They further deny that they or either of them hold or claim to hold their positions as such commissioners under the said Act of March 12, 1885, or any Act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

On the issues thus framed trial was had, resulting in a judgment in favor of the defendants, and dismissing the action. Motion for a new trial was made, and heard upon a statement of the case, and denied, when plaintiff appealed from the judgment, and from the order denying the motion for new trial.

Upon the record, and as the case is presented in this court, there are but two questions for consideration: (1) Is the Act under which it is conceded that these defendants were appointed—the Act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Appointment by the Supreme Court of Five Commissioners, to be Known as 'Commissioners of the Supreme Court,' and to Appoint a Secretary Therefor, to Relieve Said Court from the Overburdened Condition of its Calendar, and to Provide for the Compensation of Said Commissioners and Secretary, and to appropriate Money therefor," approved February 15, 1889 (Stat. 1889, p. 18)—in conflict with the Constitution? (2) Are the defendants usurping powers not conferred by the Act?

1. The first section of the Act is the only one which needs to be considered in the discussion of either of these questions. It reads as follows: "Section 1. The Supreme Court of the State of California shall immediately, upon the expiration of the term of office of the present supreme court commissioners, appoint five persons, of legal learning and personal worth, as commissioners of said court. It shall be the duty of said commissioners, under such rules and regulations as said court may adopt, to assist in the performance of its duties, and in the disposition of the numerous causes now pending in said court undetermined. The said commissioners shall hold office for the term of four years from and after their appointment, during which time they shall not engage in the practice of the law. They shall each receive a salary equal to the salary of a judge of said court, payable at the same time and in the same manner. Before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall each take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of California, and to faithfully discharge the duties of the office of commissioner of the supreme court to the best of their ability. The said court shall have power to remove any and all members of said commission at any time, by an order entered on the minutes of said court, and all vacancies in said commission shall be filled in like manner."

This section contains all that there is in the entire Act on the subject of the powers or duties of the commissioners. Every presumption is, as is the case with all legislative enactments, in favor of the constitutionality of the provision. It was enacted by a senate and Assembly, every member of which was sworn to support the Constitution, and is presumed to have passed his judgment to the effect that it is not in conflict with that instrument. It was approved by the Chief Executive, who was under like obligation, and whose judgment is usually exercised with even more deliberation than can be had in the hurry and confusion often attending upon the action of legislative bodies. The judgment of these two great departments of the government is not to be lightly disregarded or turned aside. Yet it is the province of the Judicial Department to finally determine the question of the constitutionality of this or any other statute law, whenever a litigant shall challenge the judgment of the other departments, and appeal to this for that final determination. It is also the duty of the Judicial Department, of its own motion, to pass upon and determine this question for itself, whenever it is called upon to act, in the exercise of its own jurisdiction, under a statute like the one under consideration. This court was so called upon to act when, on the 13th day of May, 1889, it appointed these commissioners, under and in conformity with the provisions of said Act of February 15, 1889. By the very act of appointment it, by necessary implication, if not by direct ruling, held the Act to be a valid law under the Constitution; and this holding was not without direct precedent, even in this State and under the present Constitution. Under a similar Act, approved March 12, 1885, this court as then constituted appointed a commission for a like purpose, and with like powers, consisting of three members, and by such appointment recognized the Act as a valid law under the Constitution. From that time until the creation of the present board, under the Act of 1889, the commissioners so appointed exercised all the functions that are authorized to be exercised, or are in fact exercised, by these defendants under the said Act of 1889. That commission and the present one have, unchallenged, assisted the court in the examination and preparation for decision of over a thousand cases, wherein the judgments were coram non jure, if it be true, as claimed by the relator, that the Act authorizes the commissioners to exercise functions, and they have exercised functions, judicial in their character, and which, by the Constitution, are conferred alone upon the justices of this court. To reverse a construction which must of necessity have been given to these statutes before or at the time of the appointment of these commissioners, and which has been acquiesced in for so long a time, and thereby produce such a result as would follow such reversal, is a thing which ought not to be done by any court, unless there is found the gravest necessity for doing it. If the question of the constitutionality of the Act was even doubtful, after such a lapse of time and such a practice under the Act, the doubt ought to be resolved in favor of its validity, and the case be left to rest on the doctrine of stare decisis.

But to our minds there is no doubt about the validity of the statute. In the language of the court below: "The Act in question is not open to objection of a constitutional character. In order to bring it into conflict with the Constitution, a strained construction of its words becomes necessary, as well as an utter disregard of the natural import of those words. . . . The phrase 'assist the court' must, for the purpose of creating a conflict, be understood not merely to facilitate the court, which is the natural import,—to lessen its labors,—but, beyond this, to assume the exercise of, or a participation in the exercise of, the appropriate function of the court to decide causes; that the commissioners are to take part in that decision as the members of the court themselves take part in it; in short, it is necessary to say that 'assistance' means 'supersession.'" Nothing in the language used, or in its context, will justify any construction which will bring the provisions of this Act in relation to the powers or duties of the commissioners in conflict with any provision of the Constitution. If the language employed was capable of two or more constructions, any one of which would be in harmony with the Constitution, it would be our duty to give it that construction. But, fortunately, we are not driven to the selection of one of several possible constructions. There is but one "warranted by the natural import of the language employed." One who attacks the constitutionality of such an enactment must not only overcome the strong presumption in favor of its validity, but he must show that, by the natural and necessary import of the language, it is clearly in conflict with the supreme law. That has not been and cannot be done in this case. Not only is there an entire failure to confer judicial power upon these commissioners but there is also an entire absence of an attempt to interfere with the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution upon and belonging to the Judicial Department of the government. The Legislature has provided for the appointment and compensation of these commissioners. They are given no power except to "assist the court," under such rules and regulations as it may adopt in the performance of its duties.

The great burden of the work of this court is that which is necessarily done in sifting the causes, to ascertain, from the mass of matter brought here in each case, the truth and the law bearing upon it, preparatory to the processes of adjudication and judgment. To say that the court cannot be assisted in this preliminary work by men sworn to fidelity, learned in the law, unconnected with and unbiased in the causes, is to deny us unbiased assistance in the very direction in which we are bound to receive it, and do receive it, in every cause that comes before us, from counsel not equally free or likely to give us unprejudiced opinions and statements; and to deny us such assistance as courts of every grade have been accustomed, time out of mind, to receive, without objection, in this country and in England. It is no more unconstitutional for this court to receive such assistance from commissioners designated by itself, or from amici curia, than to accept similar assistance from the statements of fact and arguments of the counsel in the cause. As well might it be said that section 206 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the secretaries and bailiffs of this court shall hold their offices at the pleasure of the justices, and "shall perform such duties as may be required of them by the court or the justices thereof," is unconstitutional, and conferred upon those officers judicial power. "The power to hear (examine) causes, and report facts or conclusions to the court for its judgment is not judicial, within the meaning of the Constitution." Shoults v. McPheeters, 70 Ind. 378.

"No action which is merely preparatory to an order or judgment to be rendered by some different body can be properly termed judicial."

It is the inherent authority not only to decide, but to make binding orders or judgments, which constitutes judicial power; and the instrumentalities used to inform the tribunal, whether left to its own choice or fixed by law, are merely auxiliary to that power, and operate on persons or things only through its action and by virtue of it." Underwood v. McDuffee, 15 Mich. 861.

The only case cited by the relator in support of his argument against the constitutionality of this Act is that of State v. Noble, decided by the Supreme Court of Indiana, and reported in 118 Ind. 350, 4 L. R. A. 101. While this case, or that of any other state court of last resort, is not binding as authority upon this court, it would be strongly persuasive, if the Act of the Legislature under consideration was not so unlike our own as entirely to defeat the purpose for which it is cited here. There, as here, the Legislature provided for the appointment of a commission to assist the supreme court in the performance of its duties. But there it provided that the Legislature should appoint the commissioners, and in case of vacancy in the commission the same should be filled by appointment made by the governor, thus taking away from the judicial department the power to select its own assistants, and thrusting upon the court men selected by the political and executive departments of the government. Chief Justice Elliott, who wrote the opinion, is widely and favorably known, not only for his legal learning and ability, but for the tenacity with which he insists upon the independence of the several departments of the government, and resents any encroachment upon the powers and rights of the judiciary. The only question which he was called upon necessarily to decide in the case was as to the right of the Legislature to appoint, or to provide for the appointment of, by any other officer than the court itself, commissioners who should act as assistants to the court in the performance of its duties. This question he discusses ably, and finally declares: "It cannot be doubted that judicial power includes the authority to select persons whose services may be required in judicial proceedings, or who may be required to act as the assistants of the judges in the performance of their judicial functions, whether they be referees, receivers, attorneys, masters or commissioners. . . .

As the judicial power embraced the authority to select 'assistants and ministers' at the time the Constitution was adopted, that right was sanctioned and confirmed, for it was the power then existing that was so carefully and fully vested in the courts. It was, as we have shown, a well known and fully recognized principle that courts should, as part of the judicial power, have the right to choose their own assistants, and the Constitution has secured and confirmed that principle beyond the power of the Legislature to shake it." The court then discusses other features in the Act, not found in our own, conferring upon the commissioners certain powers not conferred by our Act, and which in their nature constitute a part of the judicial power of the court; and, in view of these several features, holds the Act to be unconstitutional. But, as we read it, there is nothing in the decision to indicate that the Act here under consideration would have been held by that court to be in conflict with the Constitution, or that the Legislature might not provide for the court itself appointing commissioners to assist it or its justices in the preliminary and preparatory work necessary to the final adjudication and determination of the causes before it.

2. In the investigation of the second question involved, one of the justices of this court longest in commission,—one who has been upon this bench ever since the organization of the court under the present Constitution,—and one of the commissioners longest in service, were called and examined as witnesses, and it was agreed that the other justices and commissioners would testify substantially the same way. From the testimony thus elicited it was distinctly and clearly shown that the answer of the defendants was and is true; that they do not usurp the functions of judges of this court, and do not exercise any judicial power whatever. They receive, not from the clerk—for they have no communication with him,—but from the secretaries of the court, such of the transcripts and briefs as the court shall have assigned to them, and make a critical examination of the transcripts, briefs and of the authorities cited by counsel, and report to the court the result of such examination, with their opinion thereon, accompanied with a citation of the authorities, and also with frequent references to folios of the transcript, to aid the court in its investigations. These reports and opinions have no force or effect whatever as judgments of the court, do not go to the clerk, but through the secretaries come back to the judges, and they never reach the office of the clerk of the court, or become in any manner public, unless, upon examination by the justices themselves of the record, the briefs and the opinions so furnished by the commissioners, they are approved and adopted by a constitutional number of the justices, and the judgment of the court is ordered in conformity therewith. Many of these reports and opinions are never approved and never see the light. Others of them are used in part, and only in part. In every case, when the judgment is rendered, it is the judgment of the court, and not of the commissioners. Nothing originates before these commissioners, and nothing terminates with their labors or their opinion.

The conclusions to which they arrive are but opinions submitted for our adoption, if we think they are founded in reason and law. Hence their reports and opinions are neither decisions nor infallible guides, but they are serviceable instrumentalities to aid us in performing our functions. The commissioners exercise no power proprio vigore. The court acquires the jurisdiction, and the court renders the judgment upon the controversy. Therefore the whole exercise of the judicial power is by the court, the commissioners acting only in an intermediate capacity, as auxiliary to the court in the ascertainment of certain facts and law necessary to its enlightenment in giving the proper decision and judgment.

Another objection urged against this commission is that the reports and opinions of the commissioners are likely to or may have an undue influence on the court, or the justices thereof, in their subsequent consideration of the cases, and in the rendition of judgments thereon. A complete answer to this, so far as this action is concerned, is that, if it has any force as an objection, it is not the fault of the Act, but of the court. It does not go to the question of the constitutionality of the law, nor does it tend to show that the commissioners are usurping judicial power. Neither do we see any good reason to apprehend that a careful and impartial collation of the facts and points in a case, with references to the transcript for the verification thereof, made by men skilled in that service, and entirely unbiased and uninterested in the cause, accompanied by an expression of opinion as to the law and reference to the authorities to sustain it, as well as a reference to the authorities claimed to be adverse to such opinion, is any more likely, or even as likely, to improperly influence the court in arriving at a judgment, as a similar service rendered by retained counsel, acting under the spur of retainer, and in the direct interest of their clients. And such assistance the court is constantly bound, under the law, to receive, and give to it most careful consideration. If this objection has any foundation in fact, it addresses itself to the Legislature, and not to the court.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, and it is further ordered that the remittitur herein issue forthwith.

We concur:

McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Thornton J.; Paterson, J.,

Beatty, Ch. J.:

I concur in the judgment of affirmance, and in most of the reasoning of Justice Fox's opinion, but I do not think that a determination now that the Act in question is unconstitutional would have the effect of invalidating judgments heretofore rendered in cases referred to the commission, and based upon their opinion or report. Therefore I do not rely at all upon the doctrine of stare decisis as a ground of my conclusions. And I do not agree that there is nothing in the opinion of Judge Elliott, in the case of State v. Noble, to indicate that he would have held our Act unconstitutional. On the contrary, he expresses views from which, in my opinion, such a conclusion must follow, but I do not assent to his views. It seems to me that the point at which he goes wrong is where he declares that the duty of writing its opinions is specifically imposed upon the supreme court by the Constitution. If I held to this view, I confess I could see no escape from the conclusion that the duties we assign to our commissioners, and which are performed by them, involve a delegation by us, and a usurpation by them, of judicial functions. But I see nothing in the language of the Indiana Constitution, as quoted by Judge Elliott, and nothing in the language of our own Constitution, to warrant the conclusion that the writing of opinions is specifically imposed upon the members of the court. The precise language of our Constitution is as follows: "In the determination of causes, all decisions of the court in bank or in departments shall be given in writing, and the grounds of the decision shall be stated." Article 6, § 2. In order to comply with this injunction, it is undoubtedly necessary that the court, or some member to whom the duty is assigned, shall in most cases prepare a written opinion; but there may be, and in fact are, many cases in which the labor of formulating a statement of the grounds of the decision has been performed in advance, or may be properly delegated to others. It not infrequently happens that the judge of the superior court prepares an opinion fully covering every proposition involved in a case, and that his opinion is found to be in all respects correct. In such cases there is certainly no necessity for the preparation of a new opinion here, which could differ in form only from the opinion of the trial judge. On the contrary, this court may, and frequently does, adopt the opinion of the trial judge as its own, and for the reasons therein stated affirms the judgment or order appealed from. Burrell v. Ilaw, 48 Cal. 223; Meredith v. Sacramento Co. 50 Cal. 438; Williams v. Williams, 73 Cal. 101.

Many similar instances might be cited from the reports of this and other States, and in this case we might well have adopted the opinion of Judge Wallace of the superior court as the ground for affirming his judgment. Sometimes a proposition covering the whole or one or more branches of a case is found to be so aptly and correctly stated in the printed argument of counsel that the court can do no better than to adopt it as the ground of its decision. Sneath v. Griffin, 48 Cal. 438; Brown v. Burbank, 64 Cal. 101.

Can it be said that this is a violation of the Constitution? I certainly think not. The object of the constitutional requirement is not to compel the judges to formulate opinions in their own language, but to put upon record the grounds of their decisions, for the guidance of the public in their business transactions. The cases which are referred by us to the commission are those which are fully presented on the papers. The object of the reference is to obtain a report containing a brief and logical statement of the material facts exhibited by the record, and of the legal propositions upon which the judgment depends. When that report is submitted in the form of an opinion by one or more of the commissioners, with a suggestion that for the reasons stated a particular judgment should be given, it then becomes the duty of the court to compare the report with the record, and with the printed arguments of counsel, and to determine for itself whether the reported opinion ought to be adopted, modified or rejected. If upon such examination the court finds that the facts and the law have been correctly stated by the commission, and it adopts the opinion as its own, the case is not different from those in which the opinion of the trial judge is adopted. The court, though not the author of the opinion, by adopting it makes it its own. "But," it is asked, "if the court, after receiving the report of the commission, re-examines the case for itself, what is the use of the commission? It saves the court no labor, and does nothing to facilitate the disposition of causes." This is a wholly mistaken assumption. The examination of the record of a case and the argument of counsel, for the purpose of ascertaining the material facts and the law bearing upon them, is a very large part of the labor of decision, but it is by no means all. There are some persons in whom the literary faculty is highly developed, to whom the writing of opinions may be a trifling task, but I apprehend that, according to the experience of most judges, the putting of their opinions in form, even after their minds are fully made up, is a very serious labor, requiring the expenditure of a large portion of the time at their disposal. By the labors of the commission this time and much serious labor is saved to the court in a large proportion of the cases referred to them, without any abdication or delegation by the court of its constitutional functions.

CITIZENS STREET R. CO., Appt.,
v.

James E. TWINAME.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Damages for loss of services of plaintiff's wife by reason of personal injuries are not confined to the value of her services within the household, but may include the value of her services as manager of her husband's business where she was thus engaged at the time of the injury, without any contract or expectation of pay for her services.

2. A married woman's right to carry on business on her own account does not prevent her from giving her services to her husband in carrying on his business, or prevent him in that case from recovering the value of such services in an action to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon her.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon plaintiff's wife through defendant's alleged negligence. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. F. Winter, John S. Duncan and H. C. Allen for appellant.

Messrs. Miller & Elam for appellee.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellee against the appellant in the court below for damages sustained by the appellee on account of alleged injuries received by his wife while she was a passenger on appellant's car. By the complaint the appellant sought to recover for medical attendance furnished, and loss of service and the society of his wife. It is alleged with particularity in the complaint that before and at the time of the injury the plaintiff was carrying on a large and profitable millinery business, in which his wife was acting as the manager, and that the business was rendered more lucrative and profitable by reason of her personal services in the management of said business, and her services were of great value to the plaintiff, to wit, $2,000; that by reason of the injury she had been unable to perform such duties as she was accustomed to perform in the management of said business, whereby the plaintiff had suffered damage. Issue was joined by answer in general denial, and trial had resulting in a verdict and judgment for the appellee. On the trial of the cause evidence was admitted, over the objection of the appellant, as to the value of the services of the wife of the appellee in the capacity in which she served the appellee as fore-woman, and the court instructed the jury to the effect that, if the plaintiff was the sole owner of the store, and his wife served him as fore-woman or manager of the store, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover whatever loss, if any, he had sustained on account of being deprived of his wife's services, in whole or in part, in his household affairs or business, by reason of her disability.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the plaintiff cannot recover for the services of his wife as a clerk or assistant in his business; that the right of the husband to recover damages for loss of services of the wife is limited to services within the household; that by the Statute (§ 5180, Rev. Stat. 1881) "a married woman may carry on any trade or business, and perform any labor or services, on her sole and separate account. The earnings and profits of any married woman accruing from the trade, business, services or labor, other than labor for her husband or family, shall be her sole and separate property," and that the wife is entitled to recover for her own services. This Statute in no way changes the situation between husband and wife. It neither attempts to exonerate her from the performance of any proper services for the benefit of the husband, either in the household or in his business, nor does it attempt to create any liability on the part of the husband to pay for such services. It very properly makes the wife the sole owner of her earnings, when she performs services for persons other than her husband, and of profits made from any trade or business carried on by her. It enables the wife, if she chooses so to do, to carry on a trade or business on her own account, and to perform services for persons other than her husband, and in such cases she is the owner of the profits and earnings.

The Statute was passed to remedy an evil, and, when the wife is compelled to support herself or her family by engaging in business on her own account, or performing labor for persons other than her husband, or where circumstances exist making it desirable, and for the best interest of the family, that the wife engage in business, to give to the wife in such cases the same right to control her business and earnings as if she were sole; but it in no way affects or changes the marital relations, and the Statute has no application in a case where the wife is not carrying on a separate trade or business, or performing services for persons other than her husband. The wife has the same right to give to her husband her services either in the household or in his business as she had before the passage of the Statute, and the same obligation rests upon her to discharge her duty to her husband, and upon the husband to discharge his duty and obligation to his wife, as did before its passage. We have under consideration a case not in any way affected by the Statute. The husband was engaged in the millinery business, and his wife, by reason of their marital relations, devoted her energy and services to the business for the benefit of the husband without any contract or expectation of pay for her services, and she sustained an injury on account of the negligence of the defendant, and by reason of which the husband was deprived of her services in his business, which the wife was accustomed to perform, but was prevented from performing by reason of the injury. There might be circumstances existing which would entitle the wife, in an action for damages, to recover for the value of her own services, but prima facie the husband is entitled to recover for such services, and especially this is true when the wife is not engaged in carrying on any trade or business on her own account, or performing labor for persons other than her husband, and, on the contrary, is voluntarily rendering service for the benefit of the husband; and he is entitled to recover as well for one class of services as another. In other words, the husband is entitled to recover for the damage sustained on account of the loss of the services of the wife, and the value of her services, and loss sustained by reason of her inability to perform them, must necessarily depend on the character and value of the services which she is capable to perform, and is accustomed to perform for the husband. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Cosby, 107 Ind. 82, 4 West. Rep. 464; Belford v. Crane, 16 N. J. Eq. 265, 84 Am. Dec. 155, and note, 163; Cramer v. Reford, 17 N. J. Eq. 367, 90 Am. Dec. 594, and note, 601; Oregin v. Brooklyn Crostoven R. Co., 75 N. Y. 192; Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580 [24 L. ed. 179]; Harrington v. Gies, 45 Mich. 374; 9 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, p. 817, § 8. There was no error in the rulings of the court in the admission of the evidence or instructions to the jury.

It is contended by counsel for appellee that the record is informal, and presents no question for the decision of this court; but, taking the view we have of the only material question involved, and having to affirm the judgment, we do not deem it necessary to pass upon the question presented by the appellee as to the sufficiency of the record.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

G. C. RICKETTS

v.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO R. CO., Plff. in Err.

(....W. Va....)

- *1. A railroad company chartered by a State cannot, without distinct legislative authority, by lease, or any other contract or arrangement, turn over to another company its road, and the use of its franchise, and thereby exempt itself from responsibility for the conduct and management of the road.
2. Where a railroad company, chartered by this State, permits a foreign railroad company to operate a part of its road in this State under a verbal arrangement, and the two railroads form a continuous line through and beyond the limits of this State, the domestic company will be liable for injuries sustained on that portion of its road so operated by the foreign company.
3. Upon the trial of an action for damages it is error for the court to permit the counsel for the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, in argument, to read to the jury, upon the question of the measure of damages, extracts from reported cases, showing large damages held not excessive.
4. A railroad company cannot be made responsible for exemplary damages on account of injuries done by one of its servants, even though the act was wanton and malicious, unless the act was expressly or impliedly authorized or ratified by the company.

The term "exemplary damages" is synonymous with and means the same thing as "indeterminate damages," and they can be awarded by the jury in a proper case.

Pegram v. Stortz, 81 W. Va. 220.

This is a case calling for exemplary or indeterminate damages.

The jury are the judges as to the quantum of damages, and unless there is something so enormous about the verdict as to suggest the idea of fraud, corruption or bias, the courts will not disturb the verdict, though the court might have found a smaller amount.

If the instructions all together properly state the law, then mere inaccuracy of statement or loose expression in a particular instruction will not warrant the appellate court in reversing the judgment of the court below, on account of such instruction.

Snyder, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action of trespass on the case, commenced on July 19, 1886, in the Circuit Court of Wayne County, by G. C. Ricketts, against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of an assault committed upon him by an employé of the defendant. There was a demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled, and afterwards a trial by jury on the issue of not guilty, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000. During the trial the defendant excepted to certain actions and rulings of the court, and to review said actions and rulings it has brought this writ of error.

All the evidence adduced on the trial is made a part of the record, and the first error complained of is that upon the facts disclosed the defendant is not liable for the alleged injury to the plaintiff, because the wrong, if any, was done by the Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy Railroad Company, and not by the defendant. The facts in respect to this question are as follows: The defendant is a domestic corporation, passing through this State, and connecting at the Big Sandy River, the state line, with the Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy Railroad Company, a Kentucky corporation; and by a verbal arrangement between these two companies the Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy Company operated that part of the defendant's road between the Big Sandy River and Huntington, a distance of about ten miles, in this State. These two roads, while existing under separate charters and organizations, were in fact operated as a continuous line of railroad from Newport News, in the State of Virginia, to Lexington, in the State of Kentucky, passing through Richmond, Va., Huntington, in this State, and Catlettsburg, in Kentucky. The evidence does not disclose the terms under which that part of the defendant's railroad between Huntington and the state line was operated, or how the expenses were provided for, or what division or disposition was made of the earnings. It does appear, however, that the defendant owns a large part of the rolling stock used on that part of its road; that at least some of the officers and servants in charge of that part of its line were paid by the defendant; and that the Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy Company had not complied with the provisions of the statutes of this State in such manner as to authorize it to operate a railroad in this State. The facts further show that on December 21, 1885, the plaintiff, at Catlettsburg, in Kentucky, purchased of an agent of the Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy Company a ticket from that place to Huntington; that upon said ticket he took passage upon a train to Huntington, and after passing on the train into this State he was found by the conductor in the ladies' car, smoking a cigar, and then and there a difficulty arose, which resulted in the alleged assault upon and injury to the plaintiff, for which he brought this action.

It seems to me that under this state of facts the defendant was liable to the plaintiff, if he was injured by reason of the misconduct or negligence of the officers or employees on the said train. The court, in its opinion in York & M. L. R. Co. v. Winans, 58 U. S. 17 How. 88, 39 [15 L. ed. 29], says: "Important franchises were conferred upon the corporation to enable it to provide the facilities for communication and intercourse required for the public convenience. Corporate management and control over these were prescribed, and corporate responsibility for their insufficiency provided, as a remuneration to the community for their grant. The corporation cannot absolve itself from the performance of its obligations without the consent of the Legislature."

And in Washington R. Co. v. Brown the court says: "It is the accepted doctrine in this country that a railroad corporation cannot escape the performance of any duty or obligation imposed by its charter, or the general laws of the State, by a voluntary surrender of its road into the hands of lessees. The operation of the road by the lessees does not change the relations of the original company to the public." 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 4:0[21 L. ed. 675]; 1 Redf. Railways, chap. 52, § 1, p. 616.

In Naylee v. Alexandria & F. R. Co. 88 Va. 707, the court decided that by executing a deed conveying its road, franchises, etc., to trustees selected by itself, a railroad company cannot evade its legal liabilities for injuries subsequently done to persons and property by the negligent operation of its road. We think it may be stated, as the just result of the decided cases, and on sound principle, that a railroad corporation cannot, without distinct legislative authority, by lease, or any other contract, turn over to another company its road, and the use of its franchises, and thereby exempt itself from responsibility for the conduct and management of the road. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 118 U. S. 309 [30 L. ed. 92]; Grand Tower Mfg. & Transp. Co. v. Ullman, 89 Ill. 244; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 [25 L. ed. 950].

In order to understand the next error complained of, which relates to the instructions to the jury, it is necessary to state that the evidence for the plaintiff tended to prove that the plaintiff was a passenger on the train, and, finding no fire in the smoking-car, he went into the ladies' car, and was there smoking a cigar, but, upon being informed by the conductor that it was a violation of the rules of the company to smoke in that car, he desisted; that soon after a brakeman on the train struck him on the face, knocked him down, and injured him very seriously. The brakeman who assaulted the plaintiff was only acting as brakeman on the passenger train for that trip, his general employment and duties being that of brakeman on freight trains; and it is not shown that he was thereafter allowed to do service on any passenger train. It is proper to state also, that the evidence of the defendant tended to show that the plaintiff persisted in smoking in the ladies' car after repeated requests to stop it, or go into the smoking-car; and that he was the aggressor, and his misconduct the prime cause of the combat which resulted in the injury of which he complains.

While arguing the case to the jury, the plaintiff's counsel was allowed by the court, against the protest and objection of the defendant, to read from the American Reports verdicts in which large damages had been found by juries in cases similar to the one on trial. At the instance of the defendant, the court afterwards instructed the jury "that in case they find for the plaintiff they are not to take into consideration, nor be influenced by, the verdicts of the juries in the cases read to them by the attorney for the plaintiff, in the argument of this case, in fixing the amount of damages the plaintiff is entitled to." The plaintiff in error insists that it was error to permit the counsel for the plaintiff to read the said verdicts to the jury, and that the instruction of the court to disregard them did not cure the error and wrong done thereby.

In 1 Thompson, Trials, § 947, the law is stated as follows: "Counsel have no right, in argument, to introduce any evidentiary matters to the jury, which have not been regularly offered and admitted in evidence, in presenting the evidence in support of the action or the defense. . . . Applying these principles, it is held, even in those jurisdictions where counsel are permitted to argue the law to the jury, that they cannot be allowed, under pretense of reading legal authorities to the jury, to read passages from such books which bear upon questions of fact which are before the jury for consideration, thus introducing to the minds of the jurors evidentiary matters which have not been regularly admitted by the presiding judge." Phentiz Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501; Baldwin's App. 44 Conn. 87.

In Evansville v. Weller, 86 Ind. 414, which was an action against a city for damages resulting from injuries caused by a defective sidewalk, the court held: "Upon the trial, in such action, it is error to permit counsel for the plaintiff, over objection, in argument to the court in the presence of the jury, upon the question of the measure of damages, to read extracts from reported cases showing large damages held not excessive; but such error is cured by a direction of the court to the jury to the effect that the case before them must be determined upon the evidence, uninfluenced by the damages given in other cases."

It is difficult, if not impossible, to discover how, or in what way, the reading of verdicts in other cases could enlighten the court or the jury upon the principles of law involved in the discussion of the question of damages. It is also impossible to resist the conclusion that the extracts which the counsel read were not read with a view to enable the court to rightly decide upon the law as to damages, but that the purpose was to reach and influence the jury in the amount of damages they should find in the case on trial. As the reading of such extracts could not enlighten the court as to its duties, and it being clearly improper matter to be read to the jury, it was necessarily error to permit it to be read by counsel; and the court should have sustained the objection of defendant's counsel. It is unnecessary, in this case, to decide whether or not the instruction of the court to disregard said extracts in making up their verdict cured the error, because the judgment here must be reversed for another error. It may be proper to say, however, that as a general rule such error may be cured by such an instruction; but whether it will or not must depend upon the propriety of the verdict, and other facts in the particular case. The safer rule, therefore, seems to be to exclude such matters in the first instance, and not depend upon nullifying their prejudicial effects by an instruction.

From what has preceded, it sufficiently appears that the plaintiff in error was not prejudiced either by the refusal or the giving of any of the instructions, unless there was error in the giving of the following: "The court instructs the jury that if they find the defendant guilty they are, in estimating the damage, at liberty to consider the health and condition of the plaintiff before the injury complained of, as compared with his present condition, in consequence of said injuries, and whether said injury is in its nature permanent; and the reasonable expense incurred by the plaintiff, if any, in curing, or endeavoring to cure, the injuries he received; also, the damages suffered, if any, from the loss of time and inability to attend to business, resulting from the injuries received; also, the bodily and mental pain and suffering, if any, resulting from the injuries received, and for the outrage and indignity put upon him, and to allow such damages as in the opinion of the jury will be a fair and just compensation for the injury which the plaintiff has sustained,* and that if they believe that this assault was made in a malicious, unlawful, wanton and unnecessary manner, then they will be warranted in giving the plaintiff exemplary damages."

It seems to me that there is no valid objection to all that part of said instruction which precedes the star, as above printed; but I am of opinion that the sentence following the star is erroneous. There was no evidence in this case proving, or even tending to prove, that the conduct of the brakeman in assaulting and injuring the plaintiff was either authorized or ratified by the company.

In Downey v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 28 W. Va. 782, 748, this court, after referring to the fact that there was some diversity in the decisions, says: "But the better and more reasonable doctrine seems to be, that the railway company is not to be held liable in exemplary damages for injuries caused by the negligence of its servants, unless it be shown that the servants' act was willful, and was either authorized or ratified by the company; but such authorization or ratification can be evidenced either by an express order to do the act, or an express approval of its commission, or by an antecedent retention of a servant of known incompetency, or by a subsequent retention or promotion of the negligent servant." Patterson, Railway Acct. Law, § 392, p. 471.

As before stated, the evidence in this case shows that the brakeman who caused the injury complained of was only acting as brakeman on the train for that trip; and there is no evidence even tending to show that his conduct was either authorized or approved, or that he was incompetent, or of known bad character. In the absence of any such authorization or approval of the act of the brakeman, even if it was wanton and malicious, the Company cannot be made responsible for exemplary damages. The extent to which it could be held liable would be for compensatory damages, such as are designated in the first part of the instruction. The character of the damages for which the defendant could be made liable having been specifically and fully covered by the first portion of the instruction, it was error to tell the jury, as the concluding sentence of the instruction in effect does, that they might, if they believed the assault was wanton and malicious, then, in addition to such damages as were characterized in the first part of the instruction, assess the defendant with exemplary or punitive damages. Pegram v. Storts, 81 W. Va. 230.

For this error the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and a new trial directed.

WRITS of error to the Court of Common Pleas of Northampton County to review judgments in favor of relators in proceedings by quo warranto to compel respondents to show by what authority they exercised the offices of directors of the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County. Affirmed.

The first case arose out of the following state of facts:

At a regular meeting of the members of the institute, which was organized to promote agricultural and mechanical science and domestic economy by exhibitions, premiums, lectures, essays or such other lawful means as might best accomplish those objects, held January 11, 1887, the members proceeded to elect five directors to succeed five others whose terms of office expired on that date.

Fourteen of the stockholders of the institute were present at that meeting, five of whom voted for the relators and nine for the respondents. The proxies of six others of the stockholders, some of whom were nonresidents of the State, were held by one of the stockholders present, and he cast the votes upon them for the relators. Of the individual stockholders present and voting, the majority voted for the respondents. Of the individual stockholders present in person and represented by proxy a majority voted for relators. A majority of the stock voted by stockholders actually present was voted for respondents. A majority of all the stock voted by the stockholders present and by proxy was voted for the relators.

Upon this state of facts the relators were declared elected. Relators are all residents of the State of New Jersey and were so at the time of their election, but they are all stockholders in the corporation.

On the 5th day of February, 1887, an adjourned meeting of the board of directors was held at which the president pro tem. announced that inasmuch as certain persons not citizens of Pennsylvania had been returned as elected to the board of directors, and inasmuch as the by-laws of said institute rendered it impossible for such persons to sit as directors, he declared the seats vacant and announced that it was in order to supply four places in the board by election. Relators thereupon withdrew from the meeting and left the room and the board proceeded to the election of four directors to fill vacancies. They elected respondents as such directors, and they have since acted as such and were so doing at the time of the issue of this writ.

Upon this state of facts the court below decided that relators were the properly elected directors and were entitled to such offices, and that respondents were intruding themselves into, and unlawfully holding and exercising, the offices of directors, and gave judgment excluding respondents from such offices and declaring relators entitled thereto. The respondents thereupon took this writ assigning for error, among other things, that the court erred in holding persons not citizens of the State entitled to vote for directors: in holding that stockholders had a right to vote by proxy; in holding that stockholders were entitled to cast one vote for each share of stock held by them, and in not deciding that the by-law which gives that right is void; in deciding that persons not citizens of the State could legally hold the office of director under the by-laws of the institution.

The second case above entitled arose out of an election which took place in the year 1888 to fill the vacancies caused by the expiration of the terms of certain directors in that year, and the questions raised upon such election were similar to those in the preceding case.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The assignments of error in these cases are forty-four in number, but they have been properly treated by counsel on both sides as raising but seven questions. The first of these is stated in the words following: "Can a person not a citizen of Pennsylvania become a member of the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County?" As applicable to these cases, the words "citizen of the United States" may properly be substituted for the word "person," in the question as stated by the plaintiff in error. Our question would then stand thus: "Can a citizen of the United States, who is not a citizen of Pennsylvania, become a member," etc. Before proceeding to answer the question, we must also know what are the requisites to membership in this corporation, as laid down in the charter or by general law. Turning to article 8 of the charter, we find the only provision which relates to this subject. This declares that "members shall severally subscribe at least one share of stock, amounting to $25;" and in the same connection it is added, "the aggregate subscriptions of which shall constitute the capital stock of the association." A member must therefore be a stockholder, and the capital stock is made up of the shares subscribed for by the members. There is no provision in the charter which contemplates the possibility of members who are not stockholders, or of stockholders who are not members. Throughout the charter the word "members" is uniformly used where stockholders are spoken of, the only exception being found in article 7. This article declares that the association may be dissolved "by two thirds in number and value of the members and stockholders," and then provides that in case of such dissolution the funds shall be "divided among the members in proportion to the amount of stock held by them." This is the only place where the word "stockholders" appears in the charter, and it is very clear that it is here used in the sense of "shares of stock." The meaning of the provision is that, in order to dissolve the corporation, two thirds in number of the stockholders must agree to such action, and two thirds of the shares of stock must be represented by them. Two thirds in number of the stockholders cannot dissolve the association, nor can less than two thirds in number, representing two thirds of the shares; but there must be an agreement of two thirds in number of persons, and two thirds in number of shares held, before dissolution can be lawfully ordered. We conclude, therefore, that a member of this corporation is necessarily a stockholder, and that a stockholder is, ipso facto, a member.

Returning, now, to our question, which concerns the rights of a holder of shares of stock, let us substitute the word "stockholder" for the word "member," and the final form of the question will be: "Can a citizen of the United States, who is not a citizen of Pennsylvania, become a stockholder in the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County?" We answer, first, there is nothing in the charter that forbids it. It is true that the preamble or declaration with which the charter begins sets out the fact that the persons by whom the application is signed are citizens of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; but it contains no engagement that they shall remain so, or that upon removal into another State their stock shall escheat to the Commonwealth, or be forfeited to the association. The charter invests the association with the powers of a corporation, including the power to issue stock, but it lays no restrictions upon the stockholders. Nor, in the second place, is there anything in the general law as it stood when this charter was granted, or as it stands now, that forbids it.

The Act of April 6, 1791, authorized the governor, and that of October 13, 1840, authorized the courts, to incorporate associations for literary and other purposes, "when any number of persons, citizens of this Commonwealth, are associated, or mean to associate," for such purposes. The power of the courts was further enlarged by the Act of February 20, 1854, so as to embrace associations for the promotion of agriculture. The charter of this association was granted by the courts of Northampton County on April 28, 1856, under the authority conferred by the Acts of 1840 and 1854. It may be conceded that a petition for incorporation, purporting to be signed by citizens of New Jersey, or of any other State except Pennsylvania, would have been refused by the court. The advantages of corporate powers provided for by the General Laws as they then stood were reserved, in the first instance, for citizens of the State; but, when granted to citizens, no restrictions were put upon their exercise that affected the negotiable character of their stock, or the rights or powers of stockholders. The corporation, once created, was clothed with the power to issue stock. In the absence of any express provision to the contrary, the stock so issued was, like the stock of other business corporations, and like all varieties of personal property, freely alienable by the owner by gift or sale, by bequest or intestacy. Nothing less than an explicit provision in the charter or in the General Law could deprive the shares of their character as personal goods, or the owner of his power to dispose of his own property. As we have seen, no such restriction is to be found in either. If we now turn to the General Law as it stands at present, we shall find that non-residents may become corporators.

Section 8 of the Act of April 29, 1874, declares that "the charter of an intended corporation must be subscribed by five or more persons, three of whom, at least, must be citizens of the Commonwealth." Two, therefore, of the original corporators may be persons who are neither citizens of Pennsylvania, nor residents within its jurisdiction. In section 7 of the same Act it is made the duty of the directors to procure certificates of stock, and deliver them, duly signed and sealed, to each person entitled to receive them, according to the number of shares held by such person. The section then proceeds as follows: "Which certificates or evidences of stock shall be transferable at the pleasure of the holder; . . . and the assignee or party to whom the same shall have been so transferred shall be a member of said corporation, and have and enjoy all the immunities, privileges and franchises, and be subject to all the liabilities, conditions and penalties, incident thereto, in the same manner as the original subscriber or holder would have been."

This was a mere declaration of the law as it then stood, and not the introduction of a new rule. But the Act of April 17, 1878, is a legislative step in advance. It authorizes any corporation, authorized to hold exhibitions of natural and artificial articles and products, to mortgage its real and personal property and franchises, and provides that the purchaser or purchasers at public sale under such mortgage "shall be, and they are hereby, constituted a body politic, with all the rights, immunities and privileges of the corporation whose property and franchises may be thus sold."

From this glance at the General Law as it now stands, it is very clear that the restriction upon the rights of stockholders in this association contended for by the appellant, and which we have found wanting in the charter and the General Law as it stood when the charter was granted, has not been supplied by the statutes now in force. Our first question may, then, be answered in the affirmative. A citizen of the United States may become a stockholder in the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County although he is not a citizen of, or resident in, this State. For the same reasons the second and third questions must be answered in the affirmative. The nonresident stockholder takes his shares with all the rights and privileges which pertain to them in the hands of a citizen, and he may vote upon them, and, where no other qualification than ownership of stock is required of the directors, he may become a director. We put the right of the stockholder, not so much on the provision of the Constitution of the United States which was discussed with so much learning by the judge of the court below, as upon the nature of stock as a personal chattel and the right of an alien friend at the common law to deal in personal goods, embark in trade, loan money, sue and be sued for the collection of debts, and the protection of his person and personal estate.

The fourth and fifth questions relate to the right of a stockholder to cast more than one vote if he owns more than one share of stock, and his right to vote by proxy. A corporation is a voluntary association of persons engaged in a common enterprise. When the methods of voting are not fixed by General Law, the corporators may make the law for themselves, subject to the qualification that such laws and regulations as they make shall not conflict with the laws of the State or of the United States. The General Law did not touch either of the questions now raised, and for that reason the corporators or stockholders took them up, and made a law for themselves, covering both subjects. They have provided that stockholders shall have one vote for each share held by them up to ten shares, and they have fixed the proportion which his votes shall bear to his shares above that number. This is a reasonable regulation, it is uniform in its operation, it conflicts with no law, and it is binding on all the shareholders. The same thing may be said in regard to voting by proxy. It was competent for the members of this association to consider what was most convenient for themselves, and best calculated to secure the votes of all the shareholders at the annual elections. They had the power to refuse to receive votes unless offered by the voters in person, but, upon consideration, they decided that votes might be cast by proxy. This also was a reasonable regulation, uniform in its application, works no wrong to any shareholder, and conflicts with no law of the Commonwealth. It is therefore a valid and binding law, made by the shareholders for their own government.

The sixth and seventh questions may be considered together, as they relate to the power of the directors to fill vacancies. Article 1, § 7, of the by-laws is as follows: "When any director shall die, resign, neglect to serve or remove out of the county, the board may proceed to supply the vacancy," etc. How is the power thus confined to be exercised? The death of a member of the board of directors would ordinarily be a matter of sufficient notoriety to justify the prompt filling of the vacancy. A resignation made to the board affords evidence of a vacancy, upon which action may be taken at any time. Removal for neglect to serve is in the nature of a penalty, and cannot be imposed without inquiry into the facts. The alleged delinquent, if within convenient reach, should have notice that he is charged with neglecting to perform his official duties, and be heard, if he so desires, in his own defense. The only other ground on which a vacancy may be declared is the removal by one who was a resident of the county when elected a director, to another county or State. Such a removal ordinarily operates to transfer the business and social interests of the person from his old to his new home. Old forms of activity and old business relationships are discontinued, and new ones, in a new neighborhood, take their places. But a removal out of the county does not necessarily produce these results in all cases. It may not be intended to be permanent. It may not interfere with the ability or inclination to discharge acceptably all the duties of a director. The question in each case is whether a vacancy exists in fact. If it does, when the fact is ascertained the vacancy may be filled. The subject of the section is the filling of actual vacancies happening intermediate the annual elections. The board cannot create a vacancy. They cannot oust a director because they differ from the stockholders as to his eligibility, nor because he fails to attend a called meeting, nor because he is not a citizen of the Commonwealth. Legal questions must be settled in the courts. Questions of fact, such as the existence of an actual vacancy by removal after election or neglect of duty by a member of the board, may be settled by the directors, and the resulting vacancies, if any, may be filled by them; but this is the extent of their power in the premises.

One who is not a citizen of the United States, but who is and for many years has been a resident and property holder in this State, can become a stockholder, is entitled to vote at the stockholders' meetings and may be legally elected as a director, of a corporation organized under the state laws.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas of Northampton County to review a judgment in favor of respondents in a proceeding by quo warranto to compel them to show by what authority they exercised the offices of directors of the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County. Reversed.

Robinson was one of the original relators in the case of Hemingway v. Com., ante, p. 357. He was not a citizen of the United States but for many years had resided in this State and had become a property owner herein. The court below decided upon that state of facts that he was ineligible to the office of director in the institute and rendered judgment against him, whereupon he took this writ.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward J. Fox and Edward J. Fox, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. William Fackenthal, J. W. Wilson and B. F. Fackenthal for defendants in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the case of Detwiller v. Com., ante, p. 357, in which an opinion has been filed at the present term, we have considered the question: "Can a citizen of the United States, who is not a citizen of Pennsylvania, become a stockholder in the Farmers & Mechanics Institute of Northampton County?" We are now to push our inquiries one step further, and determine whether er one who is not a citizen of the United States, but is, and for many years has been, a resident and property holder in Pennsylvania and in Northampton County, can become a stockholder in the same association; and whether, if he may become a stockholder, he is entitled to vote as such at the stockholders' meetings; and, finally, whether he may be legally elected a director of the association. For the reasons given in Detwiller v. Com., supra, we think he may become a stockholder. The stock being personal property, he may acquire it by gift or purchase. An alien could at common law buy personal goods, and sell them; and, except in the case of an alien enemy, there was no restriction upon trade with aliens. If he can acquire the stock, he can acquire with it all the rights and privileges which its ownership confers, among which is the right to have a voice in the control of the enterprise, and the selection of those who are to conduct its affairs. He may therefore vote in the same manner, and with the same effect, as any other stockholder may do. Why may he not become a director? The office is not a political one. If it was, he would, of course, be ineligible to it, and disqualified for voting for anyone else to fill it, because of his want of citizenship. But the charter makes but one qualification, and that is found in the 5th article: "The members of this association shall elect fifteen of their number to be a board of directors, who shall, within ten days after their election, divide themselves into three classes of five each, . . . and annually thereafter five new directors shall be elected to serve for three years." A director must be a stockholder. No other qualification is required. We are not to inquire how many shares he holds, whether he was an original incorporator, or in what manner he acquired title to his stock. The single question which the charter raises is whether he is a stockholder.

The learned judge who tried this case in the court below thought that the right of the citizens of New Jersey to become stockholders, to vote and to hold office in this association rested on the Constitution of the United States, and, logically enough, held that one who was not a citizen of the United States could not become a director; but we think the right of all persons, not alien enemies, to buy and hold, use and enjoy, personal property, whether corporate stocks or articles of merchandise, is older than the Constitution, and that citizenship of the United States is not necessary to its exercise. Even as to real estate, the distinction between a resident alien friend and a citizen has disappeared in Pennsylvania and nearly every other State in the Union. The words of our Act of 1807 are: "It shall and may be lawful for any alien or aliens, actually resident within this Commonwealth, and not being the subject or subjects of some sovereign state or power which is, or shall be at the time or times of such purchase or purchases, at war with the United States of America, to purchase lands, tenements and hereditaments within this Commonwealth, and to have and to hold the same in fee simple, or for any lesser estate, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as any natural-born citizen or citizens may or can do." The conditions annexed to this section were modified by subsequent legislation, so that now the only limitations are that the purchase shall not exceed 5,000 acres in extent, or $20,000 in annual value. An examination shows that in thirty-eight States resident alien friends are put upon the same footing with natural-born citizens as to the right to acquire, use and dispose of real estate. In one or two others an exception is made excluding the Chinese from the privileges conferred on other resident aliens, and in two more no provision is found upon the subject. In Pennsylvania, therefore, a resident alien friend can deal as freely in all forms of property, whether personal or real, "to all intents and purposes, as any natural-born citizen or citizens may or can do." He may embark in business, become a stockholder in a joint-stock association or corporation, become a manager or director, when not expressly made ineligible, and use, enjoy, control and direct his property, of whatever nature or kind, in the same manner as any natural-born citizen may do.

The judgment of the court must therefore be reversed as to the appellant, and he be restored to the position to which he was regularly elected by his fellow stockholders; the costs of the appeal to be paid by the appellees.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Re the Judicial Settlement of the Account of George W. CHAUNCEY, as Trustee under the Will of Mary L. Kirby, Deceased.

(.....N. Y.....)

Where for a number of years the income from a decedent's estate is insufficient to pay in full a specific annuity given by his will for the support of the annuitant and made payable out of the income alone, a surplus in subsequent years, when such income is more than sufficient, should, in the absence of any manifestation in the will of a different intent, be paid to the annuitant in satisfaction of the previous deficiencies, and not to the next of kin.

(January 14, 1890.)

A PPEAL by James E. Delaney from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing a judgment of the Kings Special Term rendered upon the settlement of a trustee's account directing the payment to him of certain money. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. Charles H. Otis for George W. Chauncey, trustee.

Mr. Jesse Johnson for appellant.

Mr. William C. Holbrook for Mary E. Van Aulen, respondent.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case regards the disposition of the surplus income arising in certain years from a trust fund created for the purpose of paying annuities. It is claimed by the annuitant that such surplus is applicable, in the first instance, to the satisfaction of deficiencies in the annuity occurring in previous years from the insufficiency of annual income to pay them in full, and by the next of kin that it goes to them as property remaining undisposed of by the will. The portion of the will under which the question arises reads as follows: "Third. I give, devise and bequeath unto my executors hereinafter named, and to the survivor of them, all the rest, residue and remainder of the estate, real and personal, of which I may die seised and possessed, in trust, nevertheless, to and for the uses and purposes following, that is to say: To receive the rents and profits of such part thereof as shall consist of real estate, and to invest and keep invested, upon bond and mort- gage of real estate, or in the public funds of the United States, State or City of New York, as they may deem most safe and productive, such part thereof as shall consist of personal estate, and apply said rents and profits of real estate, and interest or income of personal estate, to the use of my said husband, William L. Kirby, during his natural life, except that they shall apply to the use of James E. Delaney, who was brought up by me, the sum of $500 per annum thereout until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and from and after that time the sum of $1,000 per annum thereout during the lifetime of my said husband William L. Kirby, and from and after the decease of my said husband the sum of $2,000 per annum thereout during his natural life."

With the exception of a trivial legacy of wearing apparel and silver plate to a relative, the above contains the sole disposition of property made by the will, and the testatrix therefore died intestate as to the corpus of her estate, and as to so much of the income thereof as should not be needed for the satisfaction of the annuities charged thereon. So long as William L. Kirby lived, no question could arise over the disposition of surplus, as he was entitled to the whole income after payment of the annuity to Delaney. Delaney arrived at his majority before the death of the testatrix, and no payments accrued to him under the $500 provision. William L. Kirby survived his wife only two years, and during that period Delaney received substantially the amount of his annuity, and the question in the case arises, therefore, over the payment of annuities after that period under the $2,000 provision. For a number of years after the death of William L. Kirby, the annual income from the fund was insufficient to pay the annuity in full to Delaney; but in the course of time the income so increased that it exceeded the amount of the annuity, and the disposition of this surplus is the subject of the present controversy. Should it be first applied to the satisfaction of the deficiencies of previous years, or does it go to the next of kin as property undisposed of by the will? No such question could, of course, arise under a provision which gave the annual income, or an income not exceeding a certain amount, to one or more legatees, from a certain fund; but it is contended that under the circumstances of this case, where a fixed sum is given as an annuity for support, and there is no language in the will showing a different intent, the legatee is entitled to have his annuity made up to its full sum by the accumulations of subsequent years.

Upon a previous appeal to this court [84 N. Y. 16], upon questions arising under this will, it was held that the legacy to Delaney was not a demonstrative legacy, and was therefore not payable from the corpus of the fund, in case of a deficiency of income to satisfy the full sum of the annuity. This was obviously correct, since the will plainly provided that the annuity was payable from income alone, and the intention of the testatrix could not be violated by applying the fund itself to the payment of charges which had been otherwise imposed. This decision, however, does not affect the determination of this controversy. That is to be solved by an examination of the will, and such information as to the intention of the testatrix as may be gleaned from a consideration of both its positive and negative provisions, as well as of its omissions.

We do not think much light can be derived from the particular form observed by the testatrix in creating the trust, as it was inartificially drawn, and must be construed according to its legal effect. In terms, she creates a trust in the residue of her estate for the benefit of her husband, but excepts from his bequest the payment of certain annuities to Delaney. In legal effect, the trust was intended first to provide for the payment to Delaney of the annuity given to him, and the balance of the income alone was payable to the husband. The trust was therefore to pay from the income of her estate, to Delaney, $500 per annum during his minority, $1,000 a year thereafter during the life of William L. Kirby, and $2,000 a year after his death; and during William L. Kirby's life to pay to him the balance of the income beyond what was necessary to satisfy Delaney's claim. These sums were not by the will, in express terms, made payable from the annual income, but constituted a charge upon the aggregate income of the estate. It is obvious that the legacy to Delaney was distinguishable from the provision for the benefit of the husband; for in the one case the husband was to have the gross income, less the charge upon it, whatever it might be, and subject to all casualties that might affect it, and he could in no event have more than this sum. Delaney was, however, to have a fixed sum, which could not be increased beyond the allotted amount. These sums were evidently graduated for his support, as they varied according to his probable requirements, and were increased as advancing years might add to his probable wants and necessities. It was not intended as an exception from the gift to the husband, to be governed by the characteristics and conditions applying to that gift; for it was in terms to continue after his death, and to exist as a continuing and independent trust for Delaney's benefit so long as he should live. It was, in the natural course of events, contemplated that Delaney should survive the husband, and that his annuity should outlive that to Kirby. The intent clearly implied that it was given for support; implies, also, an intention that it should be payable periodically and absolutely, to meet the requirements of daily necessities.

This intention might be temporarily defeated by the casualties affecting all financial transactions; but, so long as the property remained and yielded an income, it was the manifest intention of the testatrix to give it, to the extent indicated, to the child she had reared, and had made the object of her love and protection. Aside from her husband, she mentioned no other object of bounty in her will, except Delaney; and no intention can be derived therefrom that she intended to die intestate as to any part of the income of her estate, while the specific provisions thereof remained unsatisfied. In making these provisions she was not weighing out the payment of a debt, or the satisfaction of legal obligations, but was providing for the necessities of one whom she supposed had a moral claim upon her bounty and protection. She was endeavoring to preserve the object of her regard from future want and dependence. She could have had no intention of depriving him of the amount deemed necessary by her for his support, for the benefit of strangers, when the casualties of one year impaired the income of the fund which might, by the prosperity of another year, be rendered sufficient to meet all of the obligations which she had charged upon it. The trust was created for the sole purpose of paying the income thereof, during the lifetime of her husband, to him and her adopted child; and it cannot be supposed that she intended to scrimp them in the interest of persons whom she did not regard of sufficient consideration to be even referred to in her will. She must, in the natural course of events, have contemplated that accident, mismanagement or misfortune, might, for one or more years, through the influence of events which could not have been foreseen or guarded against, render it impossible to pay promptly the charges fixed upon the income of the trust; and it is inconsistent with the design of a provision for support to suppose that she intended, in such event, that the object of her care and affection should be left without income for the benefit of persons whom she did not know. It is impossible for the wisest and most prudent manager to place pecuniary investments entirely beyond the reach of financial hazard and casualties, but, by placing the corpus of her estate in trust, she doubtless hoped to preserve a principal which should, at least in the course of years, realize the sums she had charged upon it; and we can find no intent in the will that such income should be payable to strangers, so long as the fixed charges made by her should remain unsatisfied.

The contention of the next of kin would lead to the establishment by the trustees of a financial year which should be inflexible, and, whenever the year terminated, should require them to close the books, and begin a new and independent term for the receipt of income. In such event, the lapse of a year without the receipt of income would cause the loss of the annuity to the devisee, no matter how productive the fund might prove for succeeding years. This result must be worked out by reference to the intention of the testatrix, if sustainable at all; but we have heard no reasons drawn from the provisions of the will which support such a theory. It is claimed by the next of kin that the case of Casamaijor v. Pearson, 8 Clark & F. 100, is an authority for their contention. We do not so read that case. The facts are somewhat complicated and voluminous, but they may be summarized so as to show the principle governing the decision. The testator gave his whole estate to trustees, among other purposes, to invest a sufficient sum to pay two annuities of £400 each to F. and P. during their respective lives, if the funds should prove sufficient to pay them in full, and, if not, to divide it proportionately between them; but, if the fund proved more than sufficient, to vest the surplus, and divide it, with the capital sum set apart for the annuities, as the same should become tangible by the death of each annuitant, among residuary legatees. In this case the intention of the testator was clearly manifested, as there was an express provision that in case of insufficiency of income there should be paid to the annuitants only so much thereof as was annually realized from the fund invested; and all surplus accumulations, as well as the corpus of the estate, were given expressly to residuary legatees. We do not doubt the case was well decided, and in accordance with the expressed intention of the testator.

The question here involved is not new in this state, and has, as we read the authorities, been expressly decided in favor of the annuitants. Seccart v. Chambers, 2 Sandf. Ch. 382. In that case, the testator, having a wife and two small children, and also four adult children by a former wife, after giving legacies to the latter, directed his executors to convert all the residue of his estate, and invest it in stock, or on real security, so to remain until the death or marriage of his wife, and until the youngest child became of age. Out of the interest and income they were to pay to his wife an annuity so long as she remained sole, and to his two infant children each an annual sum, in half-yearly payments, varying according to their age from time to time. Each was to have £1,000 on her marriage, and when the youngest became of age, and the widow's annuity ceased, the residue was to be divided equally between them. The will further provided, in the mean time, that all the surplus interest and income, after paying the annuities, should be divided among the four adult children semi-annually. The income of the residue of the estate was insufficient to pay the three annuities during ten years that the widow survived. After her death it was more than sufficient to pay the two infants' annuities. It was held that the surplus then arising must be applied to the discharge of the three annuities which occurred prior to the widow's death before any of it could be divided among the adult children. This conclusion was reached in analogy to the principle that legacies for the support and maintenance of a wife and children do not abate with the general legacies. It was further held that the direction for half-yearly payments of annuities and distribution was a regulation, under the general intent of the will, as to the time of payment of the annuities, and for a division after they were fully paid, and that testator's intent would be violated by a division of the surplus of any half year, leaving any portion of the annuities unpaid which fell due previously. We entirely agree with the conclusions reached by the learned assistant vice-chancellor in that case, and consider them in point here. This case differs from that only in the fact that no specific disposition of the surplus is made by the will, which leaves it free from the difficulty suggested of an ulterior disposition of the fund in question. We are of the opinion that, in case there had been a surplus of income in any year after full payment of preceding annuities, it would have been competent for the trustees to have paid it over for distribution among the next of kin, as a fund would thereby have been created which was not disposed of by the will; but that no such distribution could properly be made while any part of such annuities remained unpaid.

The case of Stewart v. Chambers was followed by the learned surrogate of New York in Cochrane v. Walker, 4 Dem. 164. The views expressed are fully sustained by recent English authorities. Bolith v. Coulton, L. R. 5 Ch. 684, and Pitt v. Lord Dacre, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 295, may be referred to as supporting the doctrine contended for.

The case of Baker v. Baker, 6 H. L. Cas. 616, is not in point. The question in that case was whether the annuity was a demonstrative legacy, payable out of the corpus of the fund, and it was held that it was not; and in that respect agrees with the view of this court upon the construction of the will under consideration. Delaney v. Van Aulen, 84 N. Y. 16.

In accordance with these views, the order of the General Term should be reversed, and the judgment of the Special Term affirmed, with costs of the appeal in this court and the supreme court.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented by this appeal is whether a bank with which a customer has left for collection his draft upon a party residing at some distant point can be held responsible for the failure and default of a correspondent to whom the bank has forwarded the draft for collection. It must be admitted that there is apparently a great conflict of precedents upon this precise question, and it is possible that, as contended by the appellant, the weight of the authorities, numerically speaking, is with the proposition that when, under such circumstances, a bank has exercised ordinary care and prudence in the selection of a correspondent to whom it transmits a draft, bill or note for collection, and remittance of the proceeds, its liability terminates, because, as it is necessary and customary, and in the usual course of business, for banks to collect through correspondents, of which necessity, custom and course of business the owners and holders of paper have full notice and knowledge, it must be held that they have assented to and authorized the work of collection through others. The question involves a rule of general application and of commercial law. As it concerns trade between different and distant places, and, in the absence of a statute or contract or usage which has obtained the force of law, is not to be determined according to the views or interests of any particular persons, classes or localities, it should be decided according to those principles which govern and best promote the general welfare of the entire commercial community, and in accordance with the general principles which apply to all who contract to perform a service. When the appellant received the draft for collection, it entered into a contract, by implication, to perform such duties as were necessary for the protection of its customer. It agreed to collect the paper itself, not to procure the services of another to make the collection. The plaintiffs had no voice in the selection of appellant's agent or correspondent, and it is difficult to see why banks and banking houses should be excepted from the operation of a cardinal and well-established principle of law that every person is liable for the acts of such agents as may be appointed or designated by him to transact such business as he has undertaken to perform for others. The appellant, having undertaken the collection of the paper, stands in the attitude of an independent contractor who, having unrestrained liberty so to do, has designated a sub agent, and is therefore answerable for his neglect, failure or default. It is true that in the adjudicated cases cited by the appellant strong arguments are found, and cogent reasons stated, in support of its position; but we are of the opinion that the conclusion we have reached is the sounder one upon principle. It is also sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the courts of last resort of several of the States, including that of the great commercial center, New York. It is also the rule in England. Pittsburgh Exch. Nat. Bank v. New York Third Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 276 [28 L. ed. 722]; Allen v. Merchants Bank, 22 Wend. 215; Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. (.....Iowa.....)

A provision in a mortgage that the whole sum secured shall become due on any default in payment, will not make notes which are not at that time due according to their terms, due within the meaning of the rule which gives priority to those first maturing. The priority is to be determined by the order in which they fall due according to their terms.

A PPEAL by intervenor from a judgment of the District Court for Black Hawk County sustaining a demurrer to his petition of intervention by which he sought to have the proceeds of a mortgage foreclosure applied to the satisfaction of his claim pro rata with those of other creditors. Affirmed.

Statement by Given, J.:

On July 14, 1885, Nellie Goodwin and her husband executed and delivered to E. W. Burnham a mortgage for $3,100, covering what is known as "Burnham's Opera-House," in Waterloo, Iowa, and securing the payment of three promissory notes, as follows: One for $1,000, due August 1, 1886; one for $1,000, due August 1, 1887; and one for $1,100, due August 1, 1888. Mr. Burnham soon thereafter sold the two notes first named to the plaintiffs, Leavitt & Johnson, with proper indorsements, and about the same time sold the third or $1,100 note to the intervenor, J. M. Reynolds, Jr. The first note was not paid when due, but one year's interest was paid on all of the notes. The second not being met when due, the plaintiffs in September, 1887, commenced this proceeding to foreclose said mortgage, and demanded that their lien be the first and prior lien on the mortgaged property, and that their notes be paid in full from the sale of the mortgaged premises. On October 10, 1887, the intervenor, who is the appellant herein, filed his petition of intervention, setting forth the fact that he is owner and holder of the third note, and that the same then was, by the terms and conditions of said mortgage, due and payable; it being provided in said mortgage: "But should said party of the first part fail to pay said notes or the interest when due, or fail to keep said property insured, as above provided, then the whole sum remaining unpaid shall become due, and this mortgage may be foreclosed." That by virtue of such provision said third note became due upon default made in the payment of the first notes, causing the whole debt to at once become due at the time of such default. The petition of the intervenor asks that he have judgment for the amount due upon his note, and that upon sale of the mortgaged premises the proceeds thereof be divided pro rata between the holders of the several notes, and that plaintiffs' claim to priority be denied, and that the intervenor's right in the mortgaged premises be decreed equal to that of the plaintiffs. To this petition of the intervenor plaintiffs demurred. The court sustained the demurrer, and denied to intervenor the pro rata distribution asked in his petition, and entered judgment against him for costs of intervention. From this ruling and judgment the intervenor appeals.

Messrs. Mullan & Hoff, for appellant:

In the case at bar priority as to time of maturity of the notes secured by the mortgage is taken away and absolutely removed by the provisions of the mortgage. The moment that the first note became due and was unpaid, either as to principal or interest, every other note secured by the mortgage also became due. The holders of all are placed upon the same footing as to the time when they have the right to commence an action to subject the property to the payment of their respective notes. Consequently there can be no priority as to the lien of one note over the others upon the mortgaged property, but each holder, having at the same instant the same right to subject the property to the payment of his debt, must share pro rata in the security.

Grandy*, 101 N. C. 86.

Where all the notes mature at the same time, they are equal liens; and if by the terms of the notes and mortgage, default in the payment of the first note or of the interest, when due, renders all the notes due and payable, they become equal liens upon default, and are payable pro rata instead of pro tanto from the proceeds of the sale.

NOTE.—Several notes secured by one mortgage; priority.

Where a mortgage is given to secure several notes, but contains no stipulation as to the order in which the notes should be paid, and there is no agreement as to such order, there can be no priority of rights in favor of different assignees of such notes, but they are entitled to participate ratably in the fund derived from the security. Penzel v. Brookmire, 51 Ark. 106.

Several notes maturing at different dates, secured equally by a trust deed on the same land, are entitled to share the security pari passu. Shields v. Dyer, 86 Tenn. 41.

Mr. O. C. Miller, for appellees:

It is the settled law of this State that where several notes secured by the same mortgage become due and payable at different dates, the holder of the note which matures first has the prior right to subject the mortgaged property to the payment of that part of the debt evidenced by such note.

Field*, 38 Mo. 320; Humphreys v. Morton, 100 Ill. 598.

Given, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Different rules are observed in different States in applying the security, when several obligations falling due at different times are secured by the same mortgage. The States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Kentucky and others, have adopted what is termed the "pro rata theory;" that is, the security is divided among the holders of the different obligations according to the sums due thereon, neither having priority over the other. In this State, and in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama and some other States, the pro tanto or priority rule is followed, under which the notes first maturing are treated as prior, and to be first paid in full out of the security. Isett v. Lucas, 17 Iowa, 506, and cases therein cited.

There is some discussion as to the respective merits of these rules. While much can be said for and against either, we deem it of more importance that the one adopted in the State shall be continuously followed than as to which should be adopted. The pro tanto rule was adopted in this State as early as 9 Iowa, and has been followed ever since. See Grapengetler v. Fejervary, 9 Iowa, 163.

The question here presented is not as to which of these rules should be adopted in this State, but whether the provision in the mortgage that default in the payment of the principal or interest, when due, shall cause the whole sum remaining unpaid to become due, renders all the notes due at one time, in case of default, so that neither is entitled to priority. Where several notes, secured by the same mortgage, fall due at the same time, neither would be entitled to priority. Appellant's contention is that, under the provision of the mortgage above quoted, the failure to pay the first and second notes when due rendered his note due at the same time, and therefore he is entitled to a pro rata share of the security.

These notes were not made payable on or before, but on, the day named in each. Hence the maker could not have stopped the running of the interest by tendering payment before maturity, and the holder could not be compelled to receive payment before maturity, but had a right to stand upon his contract, and receive his interest up to the maturity of his note. Can it be said that, by defaulting the payment of the first note, the last was rendered due, so that the maker might have stopped the running of the interest by tendering payment? We think not. The evident purpose of such a provision in the mortgage is that, in case of default and foreclosure on the installment first falling due, the surplus of the security may be applied on the remaining obligations, instead of being held idle until maturity. The default in the first renders subsequent notes due or not, at the election of the holder. If he prefers, he may waive his right to the mortgage security, and stand upon the terms of the note, or he may elect to treat his note as due, and demand his share of the security. To apply the rule contended for by the appellant, in a State where the pro tanto rule is the established law, would add an element of uncertainty to mortgage securities that would seriously affect their value. Such a rule would render it uncertain whether, under mortgages like this, the security would be applied pro rata or pro tanto. Take a case of three notes and mortgage like those under notice, as illustration. A party knowing that, under the laws of the State, the notes are entitled to priority according to the order of their maturity, and knowing the security to be sufficient for the first two notes, but insufficient for the whole, purchases and pays for the two notes first falling due on that basis. If the maker may, by defaulting, deprive these notes of their priority, then surely they would not be purchased so readily, nor at such a price.

The rule contended for would render it possible for the mortgagor and holder of the notes last falling due to defeat the holder of the first notes of his priority, by the maker's failing to pay the interest on the last note, whereby all become due, and the holder of the last be entitled to a pro rata share of the security. Notes of this description, secured by mortgages and deeds of trust, enter largely into the business transactions of the State, and the courts should hesitate before pronouncing a rule that would render it uncertain whether security for such notes would be applied pro rata or pro tanto. Our conclusion is that the maturity of the notes, by reason of default in making prior payment, is not such a falling due as should change the rule for the application of the security. We are aware that in Bank of U. S. v. Covert, 18 Ohio, 240, and in Pierce v. Shaw, 51 Wis. 316, the contrary doctrine was held. We have examined these cases with care, and, with the profoundest respect to those courts, must say that we cannot concur in the conclusions. One of the grounds upon which the pro tanto rule is supported is that making the notes mature at different times evidences an agreement that they are to have priority in the order in which they fall due. Hence cases of default like this are not such a falling due as expunges from the contract the agreement as to priority.

We think there was no error in sustaining plaintiffs' demurrer to intervenor's petition, and therefore the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Noah S. Hunt, who died in the City of New York November 12, 1886, by his will, made in 1879, after providing for the necessities of some of his brothers and sisters during their lives, out of the income of specific sums, gave the principal of those sums to certain persons described by him as his nephews and nieces, naming the brother or sister from whom they descended, and in the tenth clause said: "I give and bequeath unto Alice, Thomas and Frederick, the three children of my deceased niece, Mary Jane Gray, late wife of the Reverend Thomas M. Gray, each the sum of two thousand dollars: provided, always, nevertheless, and it is my will, that if my sister Jane Noe shall survive me, then, and in such case, at least one-half part, and more if she shall need or require it, of the interest or income of the legacies hereinbefore given to her said grandchildren Alice, Thomas and Frederick Gray, shall be paid by my executors, their survivors or survivor, to my said sister Jane, or be applied to her use during the residue of the term of her natural life; and that the residue, if any, of such interest or income of such legacies, respectively, be paid to the said children of my deceased niece, Mary Jane Gray, respectively, to whom the principal thereof is hereinbefore given. . . . And, in the event of the

A residuary legacy to testator's nephews and nieces, providing that "in case any one or more of the children of my deceased brothers and sisters mentioned in this clause of my will shall die or have died before me, leaving lawful issue surviving at the time of my death, then and in that case such issue of my deceased nephew or niece shall receive the share which his or her ancestor would have received,"—gives to the issue of a nephew or niece who had died before the making of the will the share which the parent would have taken if living. Hayward v. Barker, 118 N. Y. 366.

A devise of lands to testator's nephew, as trustee for one B, "to her use during her natural life; after her decease to the use of the lawful begotten heirs of her body, each one to share and share alike; . . . in case of the death of B and all her children, all the property willed to her to revert to my nephew,"—7 L. gives the land to the nephew upon the death of B after the decease of all her children, although one of them leaves children who survived B. Lockman v. Hobbs, 98 N. C. 541.

If the testator uses legal or technical phrases only, his intentions should be construed by legal rules; but if he uses common words his intentions will be regulated according to the common understanding thereof. Wallace v. Minor (Va.) 10 S. E. Rep. 423.

The question in expounding a will is not what the testator meant, but what is the meaning of his words. Hancock's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 529, 112 Pa. 532; Weidman's App. 42 Leg. Int. 83.

death of any of them, the said Alice, Thomas and Frederick Gray, before my decease, leaving no issue her or him or them surviving, who shall be living at the time of my death, then, and in any and every such case, I do give and bequeath the legacy aforesaid of such decedent unto the survivors or survivor of them, the said Alice, Thomas and Frederick, if more than one, in equal shares. But in case any such decedent shall leave surviving him or her any issue who shall be living at the time of my death, such issue of the deceased shall be entitled to take the legacy of the deceased parent of such issue, if more than one, in equal shares." The eleventh clause is not material here, and the twelfth clause is in these words: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my estates and property, of every name, nature and description, including the principal sums to be invested for the payment of interest or income thereof unto my nephews James H. Cory and Samuel H. Clark, and my niece Sarah Jane Bradford, as they shall severally, by the death of either of them, fall into my said residuary estate, I do give and devise and bequeath unto my nephews and nieces hereinbefore named, except the said James H. Cory, Samuel H. Clark and Sarah Jane Bradford, in such proportionate shares as the legacies hereinbefore given and bequeathed to them, respectively, shall bear to each other."

He appointed executors, who entered upon the duties of their office, and in due time applied to the Surrogate's Court of the County of New York for a judicial settlement of their account. It was found that, after complying with the earlier provisions of the will, a surplus remained for distribution under the twelfth or residuary clause, and as to that the surrogate determined that "Frederick F. Gray, Thomas M. Gray and Alice Gray, the children of testator's deceased niece Mary Jane Gray, are not nephews and nieces of the testator, within the meaning and intent of the testator as expressed in the twelfth clause of his will, and are not entitled to participate in the distribution of his residuary estate" thereunder. From that determination the three persons named appealed to the supreme court, where the judgment or determination was affirmed.

We are of opinion, both upon principle and authority, that in so doing no error was committed. There is no doubt that the intention of the testator, as manifested by the entire will, should govern. This is the appellants' contention, and it is a sound canon of construction. In a will, as in a statute, the spirit is to prevail, and the letter is not to be adhered to if a different signification can be gathered from the whole context of the instrument. But where the language of the testator is clear, intelligible and unambiguous, there is no room for its application. That is the case here. From a variety of beneficiaries the testator selects a certain class, described by him as "nephews and nieces," and not all of that class, but only those "before named;" and, giving to those words the natural and ordinary signification, they include only the children mentioned in the preceding clauses of the will, and described as nephews and nieces. The record shows that he left a brother, Isaac J. Hunt, who had several children, all of whom were, of course,

"nephews and nieces" of the testator, yet one only of these seems named in the will; and it might, I think, with equal plausibility, be said that those not named should be included as that persons, although relatives, but not answering the description adopted by the testator, be held to be entitled. As to the appellants, they are called by the testator, not "nephews" or "nieces," but "children" of his "deceased niece," and in the same clause are twice referred to in that manner,—a discrimination in language and a choice of words of description which indicate no intention to include the persons named with nephews and nieces, but the contrary. It is obvious the testator had in his mind the different degrees of relationship of his various beneficiaries, and the selection of different words to describe them cannot be attributed to mistake or inadvertence. To hold otherwise would not preserve his intent, but defeat it.

The authorities are also the same way.

In Falkner v. Butler, Amb. 514, the testator empowered his wife to appoint his estate to be paid to his sisters and their children. The court held that "the power was confined to nephews and nieces, and could not be extended to great nephews and great nieces."

In Shelley v. Bryer, Jac. 207, the residuum of the estate of the testator was "to be divided equally between his nephews and nieces who might be then living." Some doubt was created by the codicil, but it was held that the terms "nephews and nieces" were not ambiguous, and unless extended by some peculiarities, could not include great-nephews or great-nieces; and so upon the will alone there was no ambiguity, and, notwithstanding the doubt raised by the codicil, it was so decided in view of both instruments. To the same effect is Orook v. Whitley, 7 DeG. M. & G. 490.

In Cromer v. Pinckney, 8 Barb. Ch. 466, the general rule is repeated that the testator must be presumed to have used words in their ordinary primary sense or meaning, and that the words "nephews and nieces," in their primary sense, mean the immediate descendants of the brother or sister of the person named, and do not include grand-nephews and grand-nieces or more remote descendants.

The principle of construction applied by this court in Low v. Harmony, 72 N. Y. 408, leads to the same conclusion. The testator in that case had in one clause made provision for the appellant, describing her as the daughter of his late daughter Sarah Ann, and in a later clause gave his residuary estate to his "wife and living children." It was held that this language manifested an intention not to include the representatives of a deceased child. These cases are applicable here.

It follows that whether we take the plain language of the tenth and twelfth clauses, or search for the intention of the testator in the context of the will, the result is the same. From neither source can it be implied that the testator intended the children "of his deceased niece" to share in the bounty bestowed upon the nephews and nieces theretofore named by him.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Burgess, etc., of the BOROUGH OF MILLVALE, Appts.,
v.
EVERGREEN R. CO.

1. The title of an Act showing a purpose to charter a "passenger-railway company" is sufficient to support a statute which really charters a steam-railroad company for carrying both passengers and freight.
2. If the title fairly gives notice of the subject of the Act, so as reasonably to lead to an inquiry into the body of the bill, it is all that is necessary. It need not be an index to its contents.
3. The terms "railway" and "railroad" have the same meaning.
4. The title of a supplemental statute which refers to the subject matter only by reference to the title of the principal Act is sufficient if the legislation in the supplement is germane to the subject of the original bill.
5. The adoption by a railroad company, having the powers conferred by the General Railroad Law, of a narrow gauge at the time it builds its road, will not prevent it from thereafter adopting any gauge in ordinary use, or which any company can adopt under the General Railroad Law, where there is no limit as to gauge in its charter.
6. Power given to a railroad company by the Legislature to construct and operate its road in the streets of a town or city is altogether independent of the municipality.

CERTIORARI sur appeal by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, of Allegheny County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from extending its tracks, and from changing the gauge of the same, and also to compel the removal of tracks from certain streets. Affirmed.

An Act of the Assembly was approved May 18, 1871, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Lawrenceville & Evergreen Passenger Railway Company." The company was authorized among other things to construct a railway commencing at a certain point in the City of Pittsburgh, and thence along a designated route to Evergreen Hamlet, in Rose Township in the County of Allegheny, and the company was given power to use steam as a motive power over any portion of its road outside the limits of the City of Pittsburgh, and with the consent of certain persons named to use such motive power within the city. It was also given power to carry freight and passengers, and to extend its road by consent of a majority of the stockholders to Perrysville.

Subsequently an Act was approved March 9, 1872, entitled "A Supplement to An Act to Incorporate the Lawrenceville and Evergreen Railway Company, Approved May 18, 1871."

By such supplement the company was authorized to extend its road to the coal fields of Butler County, and it was provided that the company should have all the powers and privileges in locating, constructing and operating its road as were contained in the Act regulating railway companies, approved April 19, 1841, and the several supplements thereto.

Some time in 1872, the company built a narrow-gauge steam railroad commencing at a point in the Borough of Millvale, and thence along certain streets of said Borough to Evergreen Hamlet.

Subsequently the company began to construct its road in the direction of the City of Pittsburgh in order to reach the terminus provided in its original Act of Incorporation and undertook to change the gauge of its entire road to the ordinary broad-gauge in use by railroad companies.

The complainants filed this bill to restrain such action upon the ground that the acts under which the railway company undertook to act were both unconstitutional, and also upon the ground that the company was not authorized by the terms of such acts to operate its road or to extend or alter the gauge thereof in the manner contemplated.

The rights of the Lawrenceville & Evergreen Railway Company have all become vested in the Evergreen Railway Company.

The case was referred to a master, who reported that the bill should be dismissed. Exceptions filed to the master's report were dismissed by the court and a decree entered dismissing the bill.

The complainants thereupon took this appeal.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Railway Company" was originally incorporated as a "passenger railway" company.

A supplement to an Act of Assembly must be germane to the Act. And the Act of March 9, 1872, having no new or distinct title, but being entitled merely as "a supplement," and being for an object foreign to the original Act, is not germane to it and hence cannot stand.

State Line & J. R. Co's App. 77 Pa. 429; Craig v. First Presbyterian Church, 88 Pa. 42.

The object of this supplement was to clothe this Passenger Railway Company with all the powers of an ordinary "railroad company" incorporated under the General Railroad Law of 1849. It is therefore not germane to the original Act, hence cannot stand.

Western Pennsylvania R. Co's App. supra.

The Act contains more than one subject, to wit: passenger railway and railroad, and, only one of these subjects (passenger railway) being expressed in its title, so much of the Act as relates to other subjects is in conflict with the Constitution.

If it be contended that the only subject of the original Act and its supplement is "railroad," the subject then is different from and not clearly expressed in the title, and the title is misleading and not in conformity with the Constitution.

Corporate franchises can only be plainly and unequivocally conferred; and where a doubt exists as to the powers claimed by a corporation against the public, the construction is most strongly against the corporation in favor of the public.

Allegheny Co. Home's App. 77 Pa. 77. See Hesonville M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 89 Pa. 210.

It is difficult to find any powers in the Act of February 19, 1849, which the Company did not already have under the Act of 1871, except the right of eminent domain. The supplement is therefore clearly germane to the contents of the original Act, and, if so, is valid.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Notwithstanding the very ingenious and elaborate argument of the learned counsel for the appellant, we feel constrained to concur with the master and court below in their view of the contention between these parties.

It is very earnestly argued for the appellant that both the original Act of Incorporation of the defendant Company, and the supplement thereto, are in hostility with the provisions of the Constitution, and therefore void. The 7 L. R. A.

basis of the argument as to the Act of Incorporation is that the title of the Act conveys a purpose to charter a passenger railway company, whereas the text of the Act really charters a steam-railroad company, and the two are so inconsistent that the text must fall. If it were true that a passenger railway could only be a railway laid upon the streets of a municipality, of a very limited extent, propelled only by horse power, without authority to carry anything but passengers and limited to the use of a particular kind of rail upon which steam cars and engines could not be propelled, there would be considerable force in the argument. But there is no such definition of a passenger railway, and there never was. It is true that when passenger railways located upon the streets of cities and towns were first built and used, they were, in point of fact, usually characterized by some of the above qualifications. But that circumstance proves nothing as to the extent or kind of the corporate franchises in any particular case. There was no general law at that time under which this class of railroad companies could be incorporated, and hence, there were no means of determining what the corporate franchises were, except by an examination of the Act of Incorporation in each instance. These were altogether without uniformity. The language of the learned master in his report in this case describes them correctly when he says: "They all, like the defendant Company, existed and held their franchises under, and by virtue of, special Acts of Incorporation, and while usually confined by the terms of their charters to the streets of a particular town or city, such limitation was neither necessary nor universal, while the powers conferred differed in scope in almost every instance; some companies, for example, being confined to the transportation of passengers only, and the use of horse power as a motor, while others were permitted to carry freight as well as persons, and also to use steam as a motive power."

An inspection of some of the numerous charters for this kind of roads, granted about the years 1857 to 1860, will show the greatest possible variety of conditions annexed to the grant of corporate powers in different charters. There being, then, no specific definition of the term "passenger railway," either prescribed by statute or existing in the common understanding, it follows that no necessary inference of a restricted franchise flows from the use of the term in the title of an Act.

In the case of Allegheny County Home's App. 77 Pa. 77, we said: "It will not do, therefore, to impale the legislation of the State upon the sharp points of criticism, but we must give each title as it comes before us a reasonable interpretation, ut res magis valeat quam pereat. If the title fairly gives notice of the subject of the Act so as reasonably to lead to an inquiry into the body of the bill, it is all that is necessary. It need not be an index to the contents, as has often been said."

The title to the present Act of Incorporation gave notice that a company bearing the name of the "Lawrenceville & Evergreen Passenger Railway Company" was to be incorporated. It was only the name of the company and not its purpose or object that was described.

The terms "railway" and "railroad" company have no different signification. They are defined synonymously in the dictionaries, and are used in the same sense in the common language of men. In the General Act of 23d May, 1878 (Pub. Laws, 111), authorizing the incorporation of street railway companies, the terms "railway" and "railroad" are used indiscriminately as representing the same thing. Thus in the title it is "railway companies" that are mentioned. In the second section it is provided that $2,000 of stock for every mile of "railroad" shall be subscribed. The sixth section provides that the president and directors of any "railroad" company organized under the Act shall have power to borrow money. The seventh section directs notice to be given for payment of installments by publication in one or more newspapers published in the county where such "railroad" shall be located. This form of expression is repeated in the twelfth section and in the thirteenth the corporation created under the Act is called "railroad corporation." In the fifteenth section it is referred to as "passenger railway company," and, in the seventeenth, as "street passenger railway," when the structure itself is described. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that in the legislative sense these several modes of expression are used to designate the same thing.

So far as the judicial sense of the community of meaning of these terms is concerned, it is strongly expressed in the case of Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 89 Pa. 210, in which we expressly held that city passenger railways were included within the term "railroads" employed in the Act of May 16, 1861, and that the provisions of said Act relating to the merger apply to said railways.

The Act of 1861 is entitled "An Act Relating to Railroad Companies." It was argued then as now that this title did not embrace street or passenger railway companies, and hence there could be no merger of such under the provisions of the Act. But we held differently. Mr. Justice Trunkay, in delivering the opinion of this court, said: "In 1861 all railroads were incorporated by special laws, and in so far as each law did not prescribe specially, reference was made to the provisions of the Act of February 19, 1849. This was common in charters for passenger railroads as well as others. In the statutes one class was generally styled railroads, and the other more frequently, but not always, railways. These words are popularly used as synonymous, and Webster defines both alike, but this matters little. A slight examination will show that the Legislature did not use the words in a distinctive sense." After referring to several charters which combine both classes of roads into one corporation the opinion proceeds: "These instances sufficiently indicate that the Legislature indiscriminately used the words in their popular sense. It is true that railroads were used in the country prior to their use on the streets of towns, and that many differences necessarily exist in their regulation and management. It is useless to name points of likeness and unlikeness, for there are many of each, and these vary in the same road when one part is in the country and the other in a city. Recently narrow-gauge railroads have been introduced, not laid on streets of cities, nor tunnelled through hills and mountains, but running over the latter. All three kinds are railways—are railroads. Then as respects the title of the Act of 1861, it embraces railways on streets as well as those through or over hills and mountains."

The foregoing expressions must be regarded as qualifying certain remarks contained in the opinion of this court in the case of Com. v. Central Pass. R. Co. 52 Pa. 508, in which a distinction between passenger railway companies and railroads generally was apparently asserted, of such a character as that legislation intended for one class could not, or would not, embrace the other. We say "apparently" because such was not the real meaning of the court, as the learned counsel for the appellant seem to think. Our brother Strong, who delivered the opinion, was simply interpreting the actual character of a passenger railway company, in which there was nothing that gave it the right to use steam as a motor, or the right to carry freight as well as passengers, or, by consequence, the right to use the heavy, high rails used on steam roads for running locomotives and heavy freight trains. All this was literally true, and those conclusions were strictly correct, but what was said on this subject was said exclusively with reference to the facts of that case, and by way of illustration, the difference between the heavy rails, which rise several inches above the surface of the street, and do constitute a material obstruction to the travel, and the rail in ordinary use on passenger roads was selected and emphasized, but that was all. It was never intended to say or to intimate that there might not be different kinds of rails for passenger railway tracks, or that one kind of rail might not be used even though it were in a slight degree more obstructive than another, if in other respects it were a suitable rail for such use. We think the learned counsel for the appellant over-estimate the meaning of the language quoted in their argument from the opinion in the case referred to.

If now we turn to the language of the Act of Incorporation of the appellee in this case we find it does, in the most express and emphatic manner, confer upon the appellee the right to use steam, as a motor power, on and over any part of their road outside the limits of the City of Pittsburgh, and within those limits if certain consents are obtained. We find also that express power is given to carry freight as well as passengers over the road, and to construct such turn-outs and switches as may be necessary, and pass over and across any other railroad at grade. In all these respects the grant of powers differs from that of the Central Passenger Railway Company, and it is seen at once that there is an absence of analogy between that case and the present. It is true that in this case as in that there is no provision as to the kind of rails that may be used, but as the powers conferred are those of steam railroads, both as to the motive force and the kind of traffic to be transported, there is a perfectly legitimate inference that such rails may be used as are ordinarily used in the transportation of freight as well as passengers, in cars moved by steam power. No such inference was legitimate in the Central Passenger Railway Case because there were no such powers expressly granted, Railway Company" was originally incorporated as a "passenger railway" company.

A supplement to an Act of Assembly must be germane to the Act. And the Act of March 9, 1872, having no new or distinct title, but being entitled merely as "a supplement," and being for an object foreign to the original Act, is not germane to it and hence cannot stand.

State Line & J. R. Co's App. 77 Pa. 429; Craig v. First Presbyterian Church, 88 Pa. 42.

The object of this supplement was to clothe this Passenger Railway Company with all the powers of an ordinary "railroad company" incorporated under the General Railroad Law of 1849. It is therefore not germane to the original Act, hence cannot stand.

Western Pennsylvania R. Co's App. supra.

The Act contains more than one subject, to wit: passenger railway and railroad, and, only one of these subjects (passenger railway) being expressed in its title, so much of the Act as relates to other subjects is in conflict with the Constitution.

If it be contended that the only subject of the original Act and its supplement is "railroad," the subject then is different from as not clearly expressed in the title, and the Act is misleading and not in conformity with the Constitution.

one, and any company failing to perform this duty would very quickly have received forcible and emphatic admonition to that effect, both from juries and courts.

It is also alleged in the plaintiff's bill that all the acts of the defendant both in laying its original track, and in operating the same, and now in the proposed change of gauge, and extension of its road, were and are done without the consent of the plaintiff, and against its earnest protest, and that the construction and operation of the road upon the streets of the Borough is a great public nuisance, and dangerous to the lives of the citizens, and a hindrance to business in the streets. Of course if by the terms of the charter it were necessary to obtain the consent of the borough authorities to construct and operate the road of the defendant upon the streets of the Borough, this point would be well taken, and would prevail. But no rule is better settled than that the power of the Commonwealth over the streets and roads within its territory, including those of its cities and towns, is paramount to that of the local authorities, and that right when granted to a railroad company is altogether independent of the municipality within which it is to be exercised.

Said Black, Ch. J., in Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 354: "The right of the supreme legislative power to authorize the building of a railroad on a street or other public highway is not now to be doubted. . . . If such conversion of a public street to purposes for which it was not originally designed does operate severely upon a portion of the people, the injury must be borne for the sake of the far greater good which results to the public from the cheap, easy and rapid conveyance of persons and property by railway. . . . The right of a company thereupon to build a railroad on the street of a city depends, like the lawfulness of all its other acts, upon the terms of its charter. Of course when the power is given in express words there can be no dispute about it. It may also be given by implication."

In the leading case upon this subject, viz., Philadelphia & T. R. Co.'s Case, 6 Whart. 25, Gibson, Ch. J., said: "It would be strange, therefore, were the streets of an incorporated town not public highways, subject perhaps to corporate regulation for purposes of grading, curbing and paving, but subject also to the paramount authority of the Legislature in the regulation of their use by carriages, rail-cars or means of locomotion yet to be invented, and this without distinction between the inhabitants and their fellow-citizens elsewhere."

In Williamsport Pass. R. Co. v. Williamsport, 120 Pa. 1, 12 Cent. Rep. 289, the present Chief Justice said: "It is not denied that the charter of the appellant company gives it the power to lay its tracks upon the streets in question, and if it were denied it would not matter, as such power is expressly conferred. . . . There is nothing in the company's charter which makes the consent of councils a prerequisite to the exercise of its corporate powers in the extension of its road;" and we therefore held that the company was at liberty to extend its road without obtaining such consent.

In the present case the right to lay the track upon any public road then opened or thereafter to be opened is expressly given without any one, and any company failing to perform this duty would very quickly have received forcible and emphatic admonition to that effect, both from juries and courts.

It is also alleged in the plaintiff's bill that all the acts of the defendant both in laying its original track, and in operating the same, and now in the proposed change of gauge, and extension of its road, were and are done without the consent of the plaintiff, and against its earnest protest, and that the construction and operation of the road upon the streets of the Borough is a great public nuisance, and dangerous to the lives of the citizens, and a hindrance to business in the streets. Of course if by the terms of the charter it were necessary to obtain the consent of the borough authorities to construct and operate the road of the defendant upon the streets of the Borough, this point would be well taken, and would prevail. But no rule is better settled than that the power of the Commonwealth over the streets and roads within its territory, including those of its cities and towns, is paramount to that of the local authorities, and that right when granted to a railroad company is altogether independent of the municipality within which it is to be exercised.

Said Black, Ch. J., in Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 354: "The right of the supreme legislative power to authorize the building of a railroad on a street or other public highway is not now to be doubted. . . . If such conversion of a public street to purposes for which it was not originally designed does operate severely upon a portion of the people, the injury must be borne for the sake of the far greater good which results to the public from the cheap, easy and rapid conveyance of persons and property by railway. . . . The right of a company thereupon to build a railroad on the street of a city depends, like the lawfulness of all its other acts, upon the terms of its charter. Of course when the power is given in express words there can be no dispute about it. It may also be given by implication."

In the leading case upon this subject, viz., Philadelphia & T. R. Co.'s Case, 6 Whart. 25, Gibson, Ch. J., said: "It would be strange, therefore, were the streets of an incorporated town not public highways, subject perhaps to corporate regulation for purposes of grading, curbing and paving, but subject also to the paramount authority of the Legislature in the regulation of their use by carriages, rail-cars or means of locomotion yet to be invented, and this without distinction between the inhabitants and their fellow-citizens elsewhere."

In Williamsport Pass. R. Co. v. Williamsport, 120 Pa. 1, 12 Cent. Rep. 289, the present Chief Justice said: "It is not denied that the charter of the appellant company gives it the power to lay its tracks upon the streets in question, and if it were denied it would not matter, as such power is expressly conferred. . . . There is nothing in the company's charter which makes the consent of councils a prerequisite to the exercise of its corporate powers in the extension of its road;" and we therefore held that the company was at liberty to extend its road without obtaining such consent.

In the present case the right to lay the track upon any public road then opened or thereafter to be opened is expressly given without any and they could not be inferred from a charter which conferred only the power to carry passengers, and upon a passenger railway to be laid upon the streets of a city. It was therefore properly held that the right to lay a heavy T-rail, such as is used on steam roads authorized to carry freight as well as passengers, did not exist. In the present case the road is authorized to be built in the country, as well as in the city and town, and by the nearest practicable route between terminal points, with a right to occupy any public road then or hereafter to be opened, and in this respect also it differs from the Central Passenger Railway Case, and more nearly resembles the Hestonville Case. We are clearly of the opinion that the title of the Act of 1871 sufficiently expresses a purpose to charter a railroad company, and that there is nothing contrary to the Constitution in the text of the law.

But the Supplement of 1872 is also attacked for a similar reason, because the title contains no reference to the subject matter of the Act, other than by reference to the title of the principal Act. But the answer to this objection is that the rule governing such cases is, "that where the legislation in the Supplement is germane to the subject of the original bill, the object of such Supplement is sufficiently expressed in the title." State Line & J. R. Co's App. 77 Pa. 481.

This makes it necessary to consider only the character of the legislation contained in the Supplement. That legislation is all contained in two sections, the first of which authorizes the company by name to extend its road to the coal fields of Butler County, and the second confers upon the company all the powers and privileges of the Act of February 19, 1849. All this relates to the Lawrenceville & Evergreen Passenger Railway Company, and as that is the name of the company chartered by the Act of 1871, to which it is expressly declared to be a Supplement, and as the powers conferred are properly those which pertain to railroad companies, it cannot be doubted that the legislation of the Supplement is germane to the subject of the original Act of 1871.

In the case of Craig v. First Presbyterian Church, 88 Pa. 42, we held that, where an Act of Assembly is entitled a supplement to a former Act, and the subject thereof is germane to the subject of the original Act, its subject is sufficiently expressed to meet the requirements of art. 8, § 3, of the Constitution.

In view of these considerations and decisions, we are clearly of opinion that both the Act of 1871 and the Supplement of 1872 are lawful exercises of the legislative power not prohibited by the Constitution. It only remains to consider whether the matters complained of in the bill are authorized by the charter and its supplement. These matters are the construction of the road itself as a steam railroad, the change of gauge from a narrow gauge to the full width of the ordinary steam railroad, and the proposed extension of the road beyond its original limits. The road was built and run as a narrow-gauge steam railroad upon certain streets of the Borough of Millvale for a number of years prior to the filing of the present bill. A former bill for an injunction to restrain the construction of the road seems to have been filed and proceeded with to a final decision favorable to the Company, and adverse to the Borough. From that decision it seems no appeal was taken, and the occasion of the present bill appears to be the proposed widening of the gauge and extension of the road under the authority of the Supplement. As the authority to use steam as a motive power, and to carry freight as well as passengers, is clearly given by the charter, we think there is no merit in the objection to the right of the Company to construct and maintain the steam railroad which it has built and operated thus far. In point of fact the defendant Company has only exercised the powers expressly given to it, when it made use of steam as a motor, and when it carried freight as well as passengers. These powers carry with them the right to construct and to use the appliances ordinarily employed for those purposes. It is true no express power is given to use locomotive engines, or the heavy passenger and freight cars commonly used for the carriage of freight and passengers, nor is any express authority given to lay the T-rails which are also in common use in steam railroads. But as these are methods which experience has established as appropriate, and indeed essential, in the carriage of freight and passengers upon railroads, or railways, with steam as the motive power, they must be regarded as authorized by plain implication from the grant of the powers in question.

It is argued with much earnestness and force by the learned counsel for the appellant, that "corporate franchises can only be plainly and unequivocally conferred, and where a doubt exists as to the powers claimed by a corporation against the public the contention is most strongly against the corporation in favor of the public." In support of this contention the customary citations are submitted in the paper-book from Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co., 27 Pa. 339, that, "a doubtful charter does not exist; because whatever is doubtful is decisively certain against the corporation," and, "If you assert that a corporation had certain privileges show us the words of the Legislature conferring them."

Other citations from that and other cases are also presented. They are entirely correct, and when appropriate they are of controlling force. But they must not be misused. That each individual act done or proposed to be done by a corporation must be authorized by the express letter of its charter is sheer nonsense. Powers are conferred, and of course there must be no doubt as to them, but the means of carrying those powers into operation follow the grant of the powers, and do not require express mention. Take the present case as an illustration. The right to use steam as a motive power is expressly given, but no power is given to use locomotive engines; nevertheless it is too plain for argument that the right to use locomotive engines undoubtedly exists under the defendant's charter. For the right to carry freight and passengers over a railroad, or railway, is given, and to use steam as motive power, and in order to exercise that right with that motive power, locomotive engines are essential, probably indispensable. So, too, the right to lay a T-rail for such a railroad, while not expressly given, and while it is an obstruction to travel, is equally clear because they are in common use for such railroads. Yet it may be, perhaps is, possible to carry both freight and passengers over a flat rail bolted to longitudinal stringers, or the ordinary flange rail used in street passenger railroads. But that possibility will not take away the right to use the more obstructive rail, because the latter is the one in general use for the exercise of the power, which is conferred by the letter of the Statute.

It is true also that in the title of the defendant's charter it is named as a passenger railway company, and an inference is sought to be drawn that its powers of carriage must be subordinated or limited to those ordinarily exercised by that kind of companies. This would be certainly so if there were no other powers expressly conferred, but as such other powers are expressly conferred they necessarily carry with them all the customary modes in which such powers are exercised. So, too, it is urged that there was no power to change the gauge of the road from a narrow gauge of three feet to the wider one in ordinary use. But as all the powers conferred upon railroad companies generally by the Act of February 19, 1849, are extended to the defendant Company by the second section of its Supplement there is no force in the contention. There is no limit to the gauge of this Company's road in the charter or Supplement, and they would necessarily have the same right to adopt any gauge in ordinary use, or that they might desire, which any railroad company would have under the General Railroad Law of the State.

If it be said that the defendant adopted the narrow gauge at the time its road was built and has used it ever since until now, as is alleged in the bill, the reply is at once manifest, that it is not at all concluded by such original adoption and continuous use. It parted with no right thereby to make any change in the gauge of its track, or the character of its rail, which its own interests or the advance in the science of railroad building might suggest, always, of course, within the limits of its chartered rights. It might as well be argued against the proposed change of gauge, that because a particular kind of rail was in vogue and was actually adopted and used by a railroad company at and after the time of the construction of its road, it could never adopt another, but was concluded by its first choice, upon the theory of an exhaustion of its power. It will be seen at once that such an argument is entirely fallacious and untenable. Instead of such being the law, we have always held that railroad companies not only have the right, but are by law bound, to make use of the latest and best inventions and appliances tending to promote the comfort and safety of the public. This is notably the case in the matter of spark-arresters, and is equally applicable to couplings and other contrivances. The writer remembers when strap rails, laid upon longitudinal stringers and fastened down with spikes, were in common use on steam railroads, and he also remembers that snakeheads at the ends of the rails resulted from this method occasioning frequent accidents and loss of life. When the T-rails came into use it became the undoubted legal duty of the old companies to abandon the flat rail and use the new

It is also alleged in the plaintiff's bill that all the acts of the defendant both in laying its original track, and in operating the same, and now in the proposed change of gauge, and extension of its road, were and are done without the consent of the plaintiff, and against its earnest protest, and that the construction and operation of the road upon the streets of the Borough is a great public nuisance, and dangerous to the lives of the citizens, and a hindrance to business in the streets. Of course if by the terms of the charter it were necessary to obtain the consent of the borough authorities to construct and operate the road of the defendant upon the streets of the Borough, this point would be well taken, and would prevail. But no rule is better settled than that the power of the Commonwealth over the streets and roads within its territory, including those of its cities and towns, is paramount to that of the local authorities, and that right when granted to a railroad company is altogether independent of the municipality within which it is to be exercised.

Said Black, Ch. J., in Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 854: "The right of the supreme legislative power to authorize the building of a railroad on a street or other public highway is not now to be doubted. . . . If such conversion of a public street to purposes for which it was not originally designed does operate severely upon a portion of the people, the injury must be borne for the sake of the far greater good which results to the public from the cheap, easy and rapid conveyance of persons and property by railway. . . . The right of a company thereupon to build a railroad on the street of a city depends, like the lawfulness of all its other acts, upon the terms of its charter. Of course when the power is given in express words there can be no dispute about it. It may also be given by implication."

In the leading case upon this subject, viz., Philadelphia & T. R. Co's Case, 6 Whart. 25, Gibson, Ch. J., said: "It would be strange, therefore, were the streets of an incorporated town not public highways, subject perhaps to corporate regulation for purposes of grading, curbing and paving, but subject also to the paramount authority of the Legislature in the regulation of their use by carriages, rail-cars or means of locomotion yet to be invented, and this without distinction between the inhabitants and their fellow-citizens elsewhere."

In Williamsport Pass. R. Co. v. Williamsport, 120 Pa. 1, 12 Cent. Rep. 289, the present Chief Justice said: "It is not denied that the charter of the appellant company gives it the power to lay its tracks upon the streets in question, and if it were denied it would not matter, as such power is expressly conferred. . . . There is nothing in the company's charter which makes the consent of councils a prerequisite to the exercise of its corporate powers in the extension of its road;" and we therefore held that the company was at liberty to extend its road without obtaining such consent.

In the present case the right to lay the track upon any public road then opened or thereafter to be opened is expressly given without any qualification, and hence the consent of the Borough of Millvale to the construction and operation of the road over its streets need not be obtained and is a matter of indifference. But the charter does require that in order to cross the Ewalt Street Bridge the consent of the bridge company must be obtained, and the right to use steam power in the City of Pittsburgh also requires the consent of the bridge company, a majority of the property owners on Ewalt Street, and the councils of the city. The necessity of obtaining consent in these special instances intensifies the force of the proposition that consent is unnecessary for all the other purposes of the defendant in the exercise of its franchise; this being so, it will be seen at once that the Borough has no control over the construction or operation of the road within its limits. The power of the defendant in the exercise of its franchise is altogether independent of the Borough and is of just as high and authoritative origin as the right of the Borough to exist at all. The rights of both are derived from the same source, to wit, the legislative power of the Commonwealth, and the Company is not subject to the slightest obligation to go to the Borough for consent to exercise any part of its corporate franchise. Any other doctrine would subordinate the corporate franchise of the defendant to the will of the borough councils, and cannot be sanctioned for a moment.

Upon a careful consideration of the merits of the case we are persuaded that there was no error in the action of the learned court below, and we must therefore sustain its decree.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed at the appellant's cost.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN &
SOUTHERN R. CO., App't.,

v.

R. W. WORTHEN, Collector, etc., et al.

(.....Ark.....)

1. The separate classification of railroad property for purposes of taxation, and the provision of a tribunal for the valuation and assessment of such property different from that provided in the case of other classes of property, is not prohibited by the constitutional provision requiring the valuation of property for purposes of taxation to be equal and uniform.
2. A provision for intervals between the times for making the successive assessments upon the various classes of property which are different as to the respective classes, does not violate the constitutional requirement as to uniformity in the valuation of property for taxation.
3. That notice of the meeting of a board of commissioners for the purpose of assessing railroad property for taxation is not given to the railroad company will not render the assessment void as a taking of property without due process of law, where the time and place for the meeting of the board are fixed by statute; the notice contained in the statute is all that can be required.
4. The failure to provide for an appeal from the decision of commissioners placing a valuation upon railroad property for purposes of taxation will not render a Revenue Act void as violating the constitutional provision securing the equal protection of the laws, although the right to appeal in such cases is accorded to the owners of other property.
5. A mere discrepancy in judgment between the members of a board of assessment and the chancellor to whom application is made to enjoin the collection of the tax, as to the value of the property taxed, will not warrant an interference on the part of the latter.

Cockrill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal raises the question of the constitutionality of the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1883, creating the state board of railroad commissioners for the assessment of railway property for taxation. Mansf. Dig. § 5647 et seq.

It is an attempt to enjoin the collection of the taxes on account of the alleged invalidity or nullity of the assessment.

The legality of the proceedings of the board in assessing railway property was affirmed by this court in the case of Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Worthen, 46 Ark. 312, and by the Supreme Court of the United States in Huntington v. Worthen, 120 U. S. 97 [30 L. ed. 583], 7 L. R. A.

and thus the constitutionality of the Act creating the board was impliedly recognized by both tribunals; but the question was not argued in either case, and we are now asked to overthrow the Act because, (1) it authorizes the assessment of railways by a different instrumentality from that employed to assess other property; because (2) it authorizes the assessment of railway tracks, a term which includes the right of way, annually, whereas other real estate is assessed biennially; because, (3) it is said, the board meets without notice to the railway; and because (4) no appeal is provided from the assessment of the board, whereas that privilege is accorded to the owners of all other property.

Similar statutory provisions exist in many States of the Union, and numerous decisions are reported from various States and from the Supreme Court of the United States affirming the validity of the Acts, in some one of which every question here raised has been pressed upon the attention of the court, but no case is cited denying their legality.

The Constitution of this State provides that the value of property for taxation shall be ascertained in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, making the same equal and uniform. § 5, art. 16.

There is nothing in this or any other provision of the Constitution which either expressly or by necessary implication denies the Legislature the power to classify property for the purpose of taxation (Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Worthen, 46 Ark. 330); and, that classification is not prohibited by the Federal Constitution, so long as the law operates equally and uniformly upon all property of like kind, is definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 601 [23 L. ed. 669]; Cummings v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 160 [25 L. ed. 905]; Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 331 [29 L. ed. 416].

From the peculiar nature of railroad property, its dissimilarity in use and value from the mass of other property, and its continuous extent through different localities, it is commonly regarded by the States that it cannot in justice to the owners be as fairly and uniformly valued by the numerous local instrumentalities provided for assessing other property as by a state board created for the purpose. The industry of the attorney-general has furnished us references to the Statutes of a large number of States showing that the practice of assessment of railways as units by state boards is almost universal.

In considering a statute of the State of Kentucky, which pursued this system, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case cited, says: "There is nothing in the Constitution of Kentucky that requires taxes to be levied by a uniform method upon all descriptions of property. The whole matter is left to the discretion of the legislative power, and there is nothing to forbid the classification of property for purposes of taxation, and the valuation of different classes by different methods. The rule of equality in respect to the subject only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents of each class, so that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances. There is no objection, therefore, to the discrimination made as between railroad companies and other corporations in the method and instrumentalities by which the value of their property is ascertained. The different nature and uses of their property justify the discrimination, in this respect, which the discretion of the Legislature has seen fit to impose."

In a like case in California it was said: "The Constitution of the State requires all property to be assessed at its actual value. We are unable to see how the fact that the value of one kind of property is to be ascertained by one officer or board, and the value of another kind of property by another officer or board—each clothed with the duty and responsibility of ascertaining the actual value—can be held to operate a deprivation of legal protection to the owners of either kind of property. The state board in the one case, the assessors and county boards in the other, are but different instrumentalities through which the same result is reached, the fair and just valuation by reference to the same standard—and therefore the equal and uniform valuation—of property for purposes of taxation." San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 80.

Authorities might be multiplied to the same effect.

The objection of the railways to being placed in a class to be dealt with separately by the Legislature is thus seen to be without foundation in reason or authority. But the power thus to classify makes it competent for the Legislature to provide the periods for the assessment of each class as well as the mode. It is competent to provide that one kind of property shall be assessed every year, while the requirement reaches another only once in two years. Such a distinction between real and personal property is made without objection; but the difference between a railway with its equipments and real estate is perhaps not greater than that between real estate and some species of personalty. The fact that this Statute denominates railway tracks as real estate does not obliterate the difference between them and ordinary farm lands, any more than it would in fact convert railroads into personalty to call them so, as was done for the purpose of taxation by the Acts of 1871 and 1879,—Acts 1871, p. 185; Acts 1879, p. 40.

The nature of the property justifies classification and separation from the body of the real estate upon the grounds that justify the separate classification of realty and personalty. The requirement of an annual assessment of railways affords, therefore, no greater cause for complaint than does the like requirement for personal property, and the complaint of discrimination is groundless. Central Iowa R. Co. v. Wright Co. 87 Iowa, 199.

More baseless than either of these objections is the argument that the Company's property is taken without due process of law, because no notice is given the Company and no opportunity to be heard before the assessment becomes fixed. The time and place for the meeting of the board is fixed by the Statute, and notice by statute is practically sufficient, and all that can be required in such proceedings. Pulaski Co. Equalization Board Cases, 49 Ark. 518.

As was said in State Railroad Tax Cases, supra: "This board has its time of sitting, fixed by law. Its sessions are not secret. No obstruction exists to the appearance of anyone before it to assert a right or redress a wrong; and in the business of assessing taxes this is all that can be reasonably asked."

The objection urged here to the failure to provide for an appeal from the valuation fixed by the state board was disposed of in Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, cited above; and what is there said of the relative rights of the owners of railways and of the owners of other property, and of the power of the tribunals which fix the values of the several classes of property for taxation, is so nearly applicable under the laws of this State that we quote the language as disposing of the question: "The final point of objection seems to be reduced to this: In the case of ordinary real estate, it is said, when the assessor has made his valuation, it is submitted to a board of supervisors, who may change the valuation, but not so as to increase it without notice to the taxpayer, and an opportunity for a formal hearing, upon testimony to be adduced under oath, and with a right of appeal on his part, first, to a county judge, and, again, if the amount of the tax is equal to $50, to the circuit court. This is contrasted with the proceedings in the case of railroad property before the board of railroad commissioners, in which it is alleged there is no notice of an intended change in the valuation returned by the company, and no appeal allowed if it is increased.

"The discrimination, however, is apparent rather than real. An examination of the Statutes shows that the original valuation of the assessor, in case of ordinary real estate, is conclusive upon the taxpayer, no matter how unsatisfactory; and the appeal allowed is only from the action of the board of supervisors, in case they undertake to increase the valuation made by the assessor. But in the case of railroad property, no board has the authority to increase the original assessment made by the railroad commissioners, and there is therefore no case for an appeal similar to that of the owner of ordinary real estate.

"But were it otherwise, the objection would not be tenable. We have already decided that the mode of valuing railroad property for taxation under this Statute is due process of law. That being so, the provision securing the equal protection of the laws does not require, in any case, an appeal, although it may be allowed in respect to other persons, differently situated. This was expressly decided by this court in the case of Bowman v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 30 [25 L. ed. 989, 992]. It was there said by Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the court, and speaking to this point, that 'the last restriction, as to the legal protection of the laws, is not violated by any diversity in the jurisdiction of the several courts as to the subject matter, amount or finality of decision, if all persons within the territorial limits of their respective jurisdictions have an equal right, in like cases and under like circumstances, to resort to them for redress.' The right to classify railroad property, as a separate class, for purposes of taxation, grows out of the inherent nature of the property, and the discretion vested by the Constitution of the State in its Legislature necessarily involves the right, on its part, to devise and carry into effect a distinct scheme with different tribunals in the proceeding to value it. If such a scheme is due process of law, the details in which it differs from the mode of valuing other descriptions and classes of property cannot be considered as a denial of the equal protection of the laws."

The provision contained in the Kentucky Act for the enforcement of the tax by proceeding in an ordinary court of justice does not alter the case as to the questions presented, for in such proceedings the valuation fixed by the board is conclusive in the absence of a statutory provision authorizing inquiry into their finding, and it could not be assailed unless for fraud or want of jurisdiction (East St. Louis Com. R. Co. v. People, 119 Ill. 182, 8 West. Rep. 842), grounds upon which the court of equity could have acted in this case as readily as could the Kentucky tribunal in the case instanced. La Salle & P. H. & D. R. Co. v. Donoghue, 127 Ill. 27; St. Louis, B. & T. R. Co. v. People, Id. 627.

Much complaint is made in the abstract and brief of appellant over the fact that having the same mileage in 1885 and 1886 the board nearly doubled the assessment of the former year in the latter. No fraud is charged; and it is notable in this case, as in those of the individuals who complained, in the cases reported in Pulaski Co. Board of Equalization Cases, 49 Ark. 518, that the Board of Equalization had greatly increased their assessment, that there is not even a charge of over-valuation of property. The only inference to be deduced from the increase in the assessment, standing alone, as was said in the case of St. Louis B. & T. R. Co. v. People, supra, would be, that the assessment for the first year was too low or that the property had since increased in value, or that both facts existed.

A mere discrepancy in judgment, however, between the members of the board and the chancellor to whom the application may be made for injunction, would not warrant interference on the part of the latter.

The chancellor was right in declining to interfere with the collection of the taxes, and the decree is affirmed.

Alice F. BENNETT, App't.,

v.

Edward C. CHAPIN, Admr., etc.

1. When a person is, by the terms of an instrument, entitled absolutely to property, any provision therein postponing its transfer or payment to him is void.
2. Under a will providing that a daughter of testatrix shall receive from the executors a certain sum for her support until she arrives at the age of thirty-five years, at which time they shall transfer to her the entire estate, real and personal, but in case of her death before arriving at that age leaving no lawful issue her father shall take the property, but with no devise over except to the father if then living, she is entitled on her father's death to the immediate enjoyment of the entire estate although she has not yet reached the age of thirty-five years.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Ingham County dismissing the bill in a suit brought for the construction of a will and to obtain the payment of certain money thereunder, and if necessary for the sale of certain real estate. Reversed.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank E. Robeson, for complainant, appellant:

The clause prohibiting the sale unless for a specified sum, comes within the rule laid down in Mandelaum v. McDonell, 29 Mich. 78; and such restriction is void and of no effect except as a mere expression of the desire of the testatrix, but not binding on the executors.

An administrator de bonis non with the will annexed succeeds to all the powers of executor; and if the executor has been given authority outside of those special functions, he will succeed to them if authority of the will is commensurate.

Schouler, Exrs. § 418, and cases cited; 2 Redf. Wills, pp. 123, 124.

How. Stat., § 5844, provides: "And administrators with the will annexed shall have the same authority to perform every act, and discharge every trust, as the executor named in the will would have had," etc.

Where the powers conferred are not personal (that is, where from the language used it will not be held that the trust was conferred upon the individual named as executor), and make a trust incident to the performance of and execution of the duties of executor, etc., the powers will be held to be conferred upon the office, and not the individual as a personal trust.

Mr. Jay P. Lee, for defendant, appellee:

Where a personal trust is conferred upon an executor named in the will, the power will not pass to an administrator with the will annexed. And the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed does not succeed to powers and duties which lie outside the ordinary scope of an executor's functions, unless the testatrix has clearly granted commensurate authority.

Schouler, Exrs. and Adms. par. 418; Redf. Wills, pt. 2, p. 222; Ingle v. Jones, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 486 (19 L. ed. 621).

The powers conferred by § 5844, How. Stat., upon an administrator de bonis non, are such only as can be exercised by the executor as such, and a personal power or trust which might be exercised or performed by the executors independently of his office as executor will not pass by devolution to the administrator.

Conklin v. Egerton, 21 Wend. 430; Ross v. Barclay, 18 Pa. 179; Evans v. Chew, 71 Pa. 47.

The plain and unambiguous words of the will must prevail, and are not to be controlled or qualified by any conjectural or doubtful constructions growing out of the situation, circumstances or condition, either of the testator, his property or his family.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant, who is now about thirty-one years of age, is the only child and heir-at-law of Eliza J. Bennett, deceased, who departed this life in September, 1879, leaving a last will and testament. The main provisions of the will are as follows: "I, Eliza J. Bennett, of the City of Lansing, County of Ingham and State of Michigan, do make and publish this my last will and testament. First. I direct that my executors shall, during the minority of my daughter, Alice Florence, provide for her education, clothing and maintenance in a suitable manner, and that they shall thereafter pay to her the sum of $1,000 per annum until she shall have attained the age of thirty-five years: provided, that, in case she shall receive any funds from any other source at any time, my executors shall pay to her only such sum as may be necessary to make her total annual income $1,000: provided, further, that, if any portion of said yearly allowance shall not be expended within any one year, for the purposes aforesaid, the difference between the sum actually expended in such year and the sum of $1,000 shall in no case or in any event be subject to the order or control of my said daughter, but any such sum shall be treated in the same manner as any other funds that may remain in the hands of my executor. Second. If the executors shall at any time find it necessary, or shall deem it for the best interest of my estate to sell any of the realty, I desire sale to be made in the following order: First, my property at Grand Ledge, Michigan; second, lot No. ten (10), block sixty-six (66), in the City of Lansing; third, the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section thirty-six (36), in the Township of DeWitt, Michigan; fourth, lots two and three (2 & 3), of block sixty-seven (67), in the City of Lansing. And in no case shall said last-named lots be sold before my said daughter shall attain the age of thirty-five years, unless she shall become incompetent, from any cause, to earn a livelihood, and in no event for less than the sum of $15,000, by my executors. Third. My estate shall remain in the hands of my executors until my said daughter shall attain the age of thirty-five years, and whatever surplus there may be from year to year, after the payment of said $1,000, together with the taxes and other liabilities of said estate, shall be by them invested in first-mortgage securities on well improved farming lands. Fourth. If my said daughter, Alice, shall live to attain the age of thirty-five years I direct that my executors shall then transfer to her absolutely my entire estate both real and personal. Fifth. If my said daughter, Alice, shall die before attaining the age of thirty-five years, leaving such lawful issue, and such issue die, I give my entire estate to my well-beloved husband, Jacob B. Bennett, if he survive her or her issue as aforesaid. Sixth. If my said daughter, Alice, shall die before attaining the age of thirty-five years, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall take said property at the time my said daughter should have taken it had she lived. Seventh. I do hereby constitute and appoint Jacob B. Bennett and Schuyler F. Seager, of the City of Lansing aforesaid, executors of this my last will and testament."

This will was duly executed on May 30, 1876. Afterwards, and on July 19, 1879, the testatrix added the following codicil: "(1) I don't wish the property on Washington Avenue sold until such time as it will bring not less than $100 per foot front. (2) It is my wish that my daughter, Alice, should have such preparation as would enable her in any reverses of fortune to support herself by her own exertions. I therefore direct my executors to set apart from my estate a sum sufficient to give her a thorough course of kindergarten training; the money necessary for that purpose to be by them realized from the sale of properties other than the Washington Avenue lots."

This will and codicil were duly proved and allowed in the Probate Court for Ingham County on December 5, 1881.

Jacob B. Bennett, one of the executors named in the will, is the father of the complainant, but he and Mr. Seager, the other executor, are now both deceased. At the time of the probate of the will both executors refused to accept the trust, and thereupon the complainant was appointed administratrix with the will annexed, accepted the trust, and gave the requisite bond. She continued to execute the trust until November 16, 1888, when she filed her resignation with her final account in the probate court, and was duly released and discharged, and the defendant, Edward C. Chapin, duly appointed administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, and now continues to execute the trust. The complainant claims by her bill that up to about the month of September, 1884, she has heretofore been able to support herself by her own exertions, and by means derived from sources outside of said estate, and a small sum from said estate, to wit, the sum of \$589.19, but that since said time, and for the year last past, she has been in ill health, and unable to earn her own support, and has been obliged at times to appeal to the kindness of friends for support and assistance, so that at the present time she is indebted in personal obligations to friends that have assisted her in about the sum of \$1,500, and further says that the major portion of said indebtedness was incurred in fitting herself for the position of a teacher of kindergarten, and that she so fitted herself for such work, and has a portion of the time been able to pursue such employment, but, owing to her ill health, is no longer able to do such work; and further says that she no longer has any source of income from outside sources, and is wholly unable to support herself by her own exertions. That, under and by the terms of the first paragraph of said last will and testament, she is entitled to have paid to her from said estate, as she believes, the sum of \$1,000 per annum until she shall have attained the age of thirty-five years, or such sum as with any funds or support received from outside sources will make her annual income \$1,000. That there is no personality belonging to said estate other than a small sum, not exceeding the sum of \$250 per annum, arising from the rents of certain of the real estate mentioned in said last will and testament and codicil of said deceased, which said sum is not sufficient to meet the items of insurance and the taxes on said property. That of the real estate described in the second paragraph of the last will and testament of said deceased, the Grand Ledge property and lot No. 10, of block 68, of the City of Lansing, were disposed of by said testatrix in her lifetime, thus leaving as the real estate belonging to said estate the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 36 of De Witt Township, in the County of Clinton, and lots 2 and 3 of block 67, in the City of Lansing; and says that said forty acres in the Township of De Witt are worth, as she is informed and believes, not to exceed the sum of \$40, being wholly swampy and marsh, and covered with water the greater part of each year, lying in what is known as the "Big Marsh," in the said County of Clinton. That lots 2 and 3 of block 67 of the City of Lansing are located on Washington Avenue in said city and near the business portion of said city, and are worth about the sum of \$10,000. That she has at various times requested the defendant, as such administrator, to pay her the sum of \$1,000, or such portion thereof as is necessary for her support, which defendant refuses to do. The prayer of the bill is that the will may be construed and the rights of complainant and others thereunder may be determined and settled; that the powers and duties of the administrator de bonis non may be determined and he decreed to pay over to complainant a sum sufficient to pay her debts incurred in her support, and in educating and fitting her for a teacher of kindergarten, and such further sums from time to time as shall make her income the sum of \$1,000 per annum; and, if it shall appear that he has not sufficient funds wherewith to meet such payments, that he shall be directed to sell real estate as shall be necessary therefor. The bill also contains the general prayer for relief. The main facts stated in the bill are admitted by the answer, and the testimony of the complainant, which was taken in the cause, also supports the allegation of the bill. It is admitted that the complainant has only received from her mother's estate for her support the sum of \$599.19; also that the lots on Washington Avenue, described in the will, have a frontage of ten rods, and that the complainant is the sole heir of Jacob B. and Eliza J. Bennett. On the hearing in the court below the court dismissed the bill, with costs. Complainant appeals.

It is conceded that a power of sale was conferred upon the executors named in the will; that this power was general as to all the real estate, and limited only by the condition as to the price to be obtained for the Washington-

Avenue lots. It is contended, however, that this power was a personal one, conferred upon the husband of the testatrix and Schuyler F. Seager, the executors named in the will. In this contention there may be no doubt that counsel is correct. The language of the will is: "If the executors shall at any time find it necessary, or shall deem it for the best interest of my estate, I desire a sale to be made," etc. This language implies a personal confidence and trust in the judgment and honesty of the parties named, and it cannot be said that the testatrix intended by this provision to confer such discretionary power upon anyone whom the probate court might appoint, should the persons named fail to qualify or refuse to accept the trust. The administrator de bonis non with the will annexed does not execute the powers and duties which lie outside the ordinary scope of an executor's functions, unless, by the terms of the will, such authority is clearly granted. Schouler, Exrs. § 413; Redf. Wills, pt. 2, pp. 90, 222; Ingle v. Jones, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 486 [19 L. ed. 621].

Neither do we think such power is given to the administrator de bonis non by the provisions of § 5844, How. Stat., under circumstances where it clearly appears that the power is a personal one to the executors named in the will. This section provides: "When all the executors appointed in any will shall not be authorized according to the provisions of this chapter to act as such, such as are authorized shall have the same authority to perform every act and discharge every trust required and allowed by the will, and their acts shall be as valid and effectual for every purpose as if all were authorized and should act together; and administrators with the will annexed shall have the same authority to perform every act and discharge every trust, as the executor named in the will would have had, and their acts shall be as valid and effectual for every purpose."

The powers conferred by this section of the statute upon the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed are such only as can be exercised by the executor as such, and a personal power or trust which might be exercised or performed by an executor independently of his office as executor will not pass by devolution to the administrator. Cinklin v. Egerton, 21 Wend. 430; Ross v. Barclay, 18 Pa. 179; Evans v. Chew, 71 Pa. 47.

The will was executed on May 20, 1876, and Mrs. Bennett died in September, 1879. Before her death she had sold and disposed of all the property mentioned in the will except the forty acres of land in Clinton County and the Washington Avenue lots. These Clinton-County lands are of but little value. The only property remaining having any value are the lots in the City of Lansing, which are claimed to be worth the sum of $10,000. After providing for a sale of the property in the second paragraph of the will and the order of sale the testatrix proceeds as follows: "And in no case shall said last-named lots be sold [the Washington-Avenue lots] before my said daughter shall attain the age of thirty-five years, unless she shall become incompetent from any cause to earn a livelihood, and in no event for less than the sum of fifteen thousand dollars."

The codicil was added to the will on July 19, 1879. In this the testatrix refers again to these lots as follows: "I don't wish the property on Washington Avenue sold until such time as it will bring not less than $100 per foot front." Again, in the codicil, the testatrix refers to these Washington-Avenue lots. By the codicil she expresses a wish that her daughter may have a course of kindergarten training to enable her, in any reverses of fortune, to support herself by her own exertions. Her directions as to the training are as follows: "I therefore direct my executors to set apart from my estate a sum sufficient to give her a thorough course of kindergarten training, the money necessary for that purpose to be by them realized from the sale of properties other than the Washington-Avenue lots." These Washington-Avenue lots, it is conceded, have a frontage of 10 rods, or 165 feet, which, by the provisions of the codicil, were to be sold at the sum of $100 per foot, or at the sum of $16,500. The evidence shows the lots now to be worth only the sum of $10,000. What the lots may possibly be worth at the time the complainant reaches the age of thirty-five years (four years hence), it is of course impossible for any person now to determine. It was evidently the intent of the testatrix to preserve at least this portion of her estate until her daughter should attain the age of thirty-five years, and that, if then living, she should come into the possession and enjoyment of it. But the executors named in the will were given power to sell even this portion if her daughter should from any cause become incompetent to earn a livelihood, provided the sum of $15,000 could then be obtained therefor, or, under the codicil, the sum of $16,500. These conditions, upon which the executors named were empowered to make sale of these lots, may or may not have been impossible. From the evidence in the case the contingency has now arisen which was provided for in the will. The daughter has become incompetent to earn a livelihood, but the executors named refused to assume the trust, and they are both now deceased. The power was a personal one to them, and the administrator de bonis non, by the terms of the will, cannot exercise it, and the Statute itself confers upon him no such power. Neither can the lots be sold for the price fixed by the testatrix in the will. The claim of the defendant is that, under these circumstances, the lands known as the "Washington-Avenue lots" cannot be sold until the complainant arrives at the age of thirty-five years; that the administrator de bonis non cannot be empowered by the probate court to make the sale, and that a court of chancery giving this construction to the will cannot authorize the sale by the administrator; that in fact there is no power vested in the administrator to make sale to relieve the complainant in her distress until she shall attain the age of thirty-five years. This construction of the will is undoubtedly correct, there being no debts or legacies to be paid; yet, by the prayer of the bill, we are called upon to construe the will, and to determine the rights and interests of the complainant in the premises.

It is made apparent by the will that the complainant was the sole object of the testatrix's care and bounty, aside from her husband, who is now deceased. The executors named had a mere naked power of sale, coupled with no interest whatever in the estate. At the death of the testatrix the estate vested in the complainant in fee, the possession and enjoyment only being delayed until the complainant should arrive at the age of thirty-five years, and contingent at her death before arriving at that age that her father should take, if he survived her, provided complainant left no lawful issue, or, leaving such lawful issue, such issue dies. The father is deceased, and the complainant is the only heir-at-law of the testatrix. There was no devise over, should the complainant die before reaching the age of thirty-five, except to the father, if then living, and, the father being now deceased, no contingency can arise by which the complainant and her lawful heirs could be divested of the estate. Under these circumstances, what rule of law prevents the complainant taking possession? She has the absolute title in fee, and only waits the arrival of her thirty-fifth birthday to take possession. When she can sell and dispose of the whole estate, why should the administrator control it? There is no one interested in it except the complainant, and at her death the estate would only be cast upon her heirs-at-law, or the person whom she might designate by will to take after her death. The terms of the will, it is contended, place restraint upon the alienation. If the lands had been sold by the executors, the complainant, as devised under the will, would have been entitled to the proceeds. No one but the complainant had a right to insist upon the performance of this trust by the executors, and no one else could complain of the breach. The devise is not made to the executors for the benefit of the devisee, but directly to the devisee. The estate devised is not a conditional one to be forfeited, except by a condition which cannot now happen, or to revert to the heirs of the testator, or go over to others on any condition; nor is it one which is to vest at some future day, but is an absolute vested estate in fee which the complainant is entitled to take in possession at the age of thirty-five years. The restraint upon the alienation evidently was made solely for the benefit of the devisee. Why may she not now forego or release its performance? It may be contended that the executors named in the will, had they accepted the trust, and assumed control of the estate, might have insisted on holding the estate in possession until the period when the complainant, by the terms of the will, was to take in possession. This, however, was a mere naked trust, and one personal to the parties named. This trust they refused to accept, and the trustees are now dead. Who can complain if the devisee now takes in possession and sells and disposes of the entire estate? It is well settled that when a bare power of sale is given to the executors merely to sell the lands for the purpose of paying over the proceeds to devisees, whose right under the will to such proceeds is an absolute and vested right, all such devisees may collectively, before the power of sale is exercised, elect to take the land instead of the proceeds, and thus prevent a sale. But we are satisfied that restraint upon the alienation contained in this will is void. Such restraints are not favored in the law. It is true that many restrictions or qualfications upon the rights of the devisee or grantee may be made effectual by making the estate itself dependent upon such condition; but where the estate granted is absolute, such restriction can impose no legal obligation upon the devisees, or limit their power over the estate, when the observance or violation of the restriction can neither promote nor prejudice any interest but their own. This rule was very fully discussed by this court in Mandlebaum v. McDonell, 29 Mich. 87, and in support of this principle the court cited Hall v. Tufts, 18 Pick. 459; Blackstone Bank v. Davis, 21 Pick. 42; Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. Jr. 429; Doebler's App. 64 Pa. 9; Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 315.

Aside from these reasons, however, we think the restrictions upon the sale cannot be upheld. No such restrictions are valid. When a restriction in a conveyance of a vested estate in fee simple in possession or remainder is against selling for a particular time, such a restriction is invalid. When a person is entitled absolutely to property, any provision postponing its transfer or payment to him is void. Gray, in his rules against perpetuities, thus states the rule: "Suppose property is given to trustees in trust to pay the principal to A when he reaches the age of thirty. When any other person than A is interested in the property, when, for instance, there is a gift over to B if A dies under thirty, the trustee will retain the property for the benefit of B; but when no one but A is interested in the property should he die before thirty, his heirs or representatives would be entitled to it. When, in short, the direction for postponement has been made for A's supposed benefit, such direction is void, in pursuance of the general doctrine that it is against public policy to restrain a man in the use or disposition of the property in which no one but himself has any interest." The principle is generally held to be that all rights of property are alienable, and that a condition or restriction which would suspend all power of alienation for any length of time is inconsistent with the estate granted, and void. The husband of the testatrix died in 1884. There has been no period of time since then in which the complainant did not have the right to the immediate enjoyment of the estate, and to mortgage, sell or dispose of it as she saw fit, and appropriate the whole proceeds thereof, subject only to the debts of the testatrix, if any there be, and the expenses of administration, as during the life of her father they could, by their joint act, have conveyed it. The decree of the court below must be set aside, and a decree entered in this court in accordance with this opinion. No costs will be allowed, as the administrator seems to have acted in good faith and under what he believed to be the true construction of this clause in the will.

Morse, J., concurred with Long, J.

Champlin, J.:

I concur with Mr. Justice Long upon the ground that the will is void as contravening § 5581 of How. Stat.

Campbell, J.:

I think that, inasmuch as complainant is the only person interested in the land, the other questions are not important, and I concur in the result.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

METROPOLITAN EXHIBITION CO.

William EWING.

(....Fed. Rep....)

1. Although equity will not ordinarily attempt to enforce contracts which cannot be carried out by the machinery of a court, it may nevertheless practically accomplish the same end by enjoining the breach of a negative promise; and this will be done whenever the contract is one of which the court would decree specific performance if by such decree its observance by the party refusing to perform could be practically enforced.
2. If it appears that an ambiguous term in a contract has an established meaning among those engaged in the business to which the contract has reference, and unless it is given that meaning it is indefinite and equivocal, it should be treated in interpreting the contract as used according to that understanding.
3. There is no necessity to particularize, in a contract for the services of a ball player which gives the employer the right to "reserve" such player for the season next ensuing, the conditions or characteristics of the option, if when the contract is made the term has a well-understood definition.

4. The contract giving base-ball clubs the right to "reserve" their players for another season simply gives the clubs the right as against other clubs to secure the services of such players if the parties can agree, but places no obligation upon the players to enter into a contract for such season; hence the players cannot be compelled to enter into such future contracts by a decree of specific performance, and consequently they cannot be enjoined from entering into contracts with other clubs.

SUIT to enjoin the breach of an alleged contract for the performance of personal services requiring special aptitude, skill and experience. Injunction denied.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George F. Duysters and Joseph F. Choate, for complainant:

In a case on which the court would decree specific performance but for impracticability it will do what it may towards that end, by enjoining the party from doing some other act, whereby he may be compelled to do what he agreed to do.

When invoked, a court of equity will compel every person sui juris to the extent its resources will permit to perform just what he has promised another and in the particular way promised, in every case of a legal contract where a failure to perform would occasion such legal injury to the other person as may not be ascertained so as to be compensated in money, unless it shall appear that it is impossible, or that, at the time it was entered into, the contract was so unequal in its burdens and benefits and so unfair to the defendant as to suggest fraudulent practice.

Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ward (N. Y.) Jan. 29, 1890.

Mr. Henry Bacon, for defendant:

To sustain this action, the plaintiff must establish beyond question a contract entitling it to the services of the defendant for the season of 1890. If the contract is denied or is invalid, or if there are disputes as to the terms of the contract, a preliminary injunction will not be granted.

High, Inj. 2d ed. § 1120; Fredericks v. Mayer, 1 Bosw. 227.

From the beginning until the adoption of the present form of the players' contract the word "reserve" was, by the application made of it by the parties who invented the use of it in connection with base ball, restricted to the right of employment between the players and the parties to the National Agreement, and the word was carried into the present contract with precisely the same meaning.

To authorize the court to issue an injunction in this case it is required that the contract alleged by the complainant should be definite and certain as to what services are to be rendered. That by its terms the obligation of the complainant should be so certainly ascertained and stated as to be enforceable against him.

force a contract unless it is mutually fair and just.

The injunction can only be granted in this case to prevent irreparable damages. Where no damage or damages which may be ascertained and compensated for in money will be occasioned by the defendant's action, no injunction will lie.

Allegheny Base Ball Club v. Bennett, 14 Fed. Rep. 257; Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ward (N. Y.) Jan. 29, 1890.

Wallace, J., delivered the following opinion:

This action is brought to restrain a threatened breach of contract for the performance of personal services which require special aptitude, skill and experience. It is a case in which an action at law would not afford the plaintiff an adequate remedy for the breach and in which the power of the court should be exercised by preventive interposition if it is found that the contract is such as the plaintiff claims it to be. The circumstances are such that unless a preliminary injunction is granted the plaintiff will obtain no effectual remedy, because before the cause can be brought to final hearing the time will have passed within which the relief sought would be practically useful, and if it be then adjudged that the plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction the judgment will be declaratory merely. Although preliminary relief is not to be granted in a case in which it is doubtful whether the plaintiff will be finally successful, yet where the questions are such that they can be fully considered and as safely decided upon a motion for a preliminary injunction as at final hearing, it is the duty of the court to consider and determine them and not defer the party invoking its assistance to a time when a decree, if awarded, would be too late.

The contract upon which the plaintiff founds its claim for relief is in form between the New York Base Ball Club as party of the first part and the defendant as party of the second part; but there is no reason to doubt that the New York Base-Ball Club was the agent of the plaintiff in entering into the contract, that the plaintiff is the real principal, that the contract was intended to inure for the benefit of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff is entitled to enforce it against the defendant to the extent that the New York Base-Ball Club could do so.

The doctrine is now generally recognized that while a court of equity will not ordinarily attempt to enforce contracts which cannot be carried out by the machinery of a court, like that involved in the present case, it may nevertheless practically accomplish the same end by enjoining the breach of a negative promise, and this power will be exercised whenever the contract is one of which the court would direct specific performance if it could practically compel its observance by the party refusing to perform through a decree for specific performance. It is indispensable, where the contract does not relate to realty, that it be one for the breach of which damages would not afford an adequate compensation to the plaintiff. It must be one in which the plaintiff comes into court with clean hands, and which is not so oppressive as to render it unjust to the defendant to enforce it. It must be one in which there are mutual promises, or which is founded on a sufficient consideration. It must be one the terms of which are certain, and in respect to which the minds of the parties have distinctly met so that there can be no misunderstanding of their rights and obligations.

The contract is executed as of the date of April 29, 1890. It is a formal document, consisting of twenty articles by which the New York Base Ball Club employs the defendant and the defendant undertakes to perform professional services as a base-ball player for the club for the season (specified in article 2) beginning April 1, 1890, and ending October 31, 1890. Article 20 provides that the salary to be paid the defendant shall be $2,000 payable semi-monthly. Among other things the contract provides by different articles that the club may at any time terminate the contract on ten days' notice to the defendant, whereupon the obligations of both parties are to cease; that the club shall provide the defendant while "abroad" with proper board and lodging and pay all necessary traveling expenses; that if the defendant during the term of his employment be guilty of any excessive indulgence in liquor, or of gambling, or of insubordination, he shall be liable to certain specified penalties; and that if the club ceases to be a member of the National League of Professional Base-Ball Clubs either compulsorily or voluntarily the "defendant shall, if the right of reservation be transferred" by the club to any other club, receive from that club at least the same amount in salary that he receives by the present contract. It contains also the following provision: "Article 18. It is further understood and agreed that the party of the first part shall have the right to 'reserve' the said party of the second part for the season next ensuing the term mentioned in paragraph 2, herein provided, and that said right and privilege is hereby accorded to said party of the first part upon the following conditions, which are to be taken and construed as conditions precedent to the exercise of such extraordinary rights or privileges, viz.: 1. That the said party of the second part shall not be reserved at a salary less than that mentioned in the twentieth paragraph herein, except by the consent of the party of the second part. 2. That the said party of the second part, if he be reserved by the said party of the first part for the next ensuing season, shall not be one of more than fourteen players then under contract; that is, that the right of reservation shall be limited to that number of players and no more."

The plaintiff alleges that the defendant was one of fourteen players and no more so reserved under said contract; that on the 23d day of October, 1890, plaintiff exercised its option to reserve the defendant for the season of 1890 by giving the defendant due and timely notice in writing of its intention to do so; and that notwithstanding the exercise of this option the defendant has engaged his services for the season of 1890 to another organization to act for it as a base-ball player during that season. The plaintiff insists that by the terms of the contract it is entitled to the services of the defendant as a base-ball player for the season of 1890 upon the terms and conditions of the contract for the season of 1889, except the condition giving a right to reserve him for a subsequent season.

The case turns upon the meaning and effect of the clause and contract which gives the club the right to "reserve" the defendant for the season next ensuing. It is plain enough that the option is a right of reservation for the next ensuing season, only the season ensuing the term mentioned in article 2, and does not extend beyond the term from April 1, 1890, to October 31, 1890. It is equally plain that the salary for the ensuing season is to be the same as that for the season of 1889 unless the parties mutually consent to a change. But what is the character of the option which the plaintiff is permitted to exercise? What is the right to "reserve" the defendant? If it is the right to retain and have his services as a base-ball player for the season of 1890 when is the right of election to be manifested, and upon what terms are these services to be rendered? Can the club wait until April 1, 1890, before it manifests its intention to exercise the option? Is the club to pay the defendant's board and lodging while he is "abroad" serving the club during the season of 1890? Can the club discharge him at any time during that season on ten days' notice? Are the penalties for intoxication, gambling or insubordination enforceable during the season of 1890? In short does the contract embody the definite understanding of the parties to it in respect to their reciprocal rights and obligations after the season of 1889 shall have ended?

If the term "the right to reserve" has no defined meaning, and there were no extrinsic sources by which to ascertain the sense in which it is used by the parties, it would be an ambiguous phrase. As applied to a contract for personal services the right to reserve would convey a very unintelligible conception of the conditions and incidents of the service to be rendered or enjoyed. A contract by which one party agrees for an equivalent to reserve himself for another for a stated period, or to reserve himself as a lawyer, or doctor, or artist or laborer for a specified term, would very inadequately express a promise to devote his professional or manual services exclusively to the other during that period; and the promise of a base-ball player to reserve himself for a particular club for a given season would hardly, without more, convey any definite meaning of the understanding of the parties. It certainly would not bind him to submit to any special rules or regulations respecting the performance of his services not expressly consented to, or not to be necessarily implied from the nature of the employment and the situation of the contracting parties. If it had been the meaning of the contract to allow the club to renew the engagement of the defendant for a second season upon the same conditions as those for the first season, that intention could have been easily and unequivocally expressed. As it is, it is left wholly to implication, unless the "right to reserve" is a term having a defined and specific signification. This ambiguity suggests such grave doubt as to the meaning of the clause that in two adjudged cases in which it has been considered by the courts, the judges have thought it too indefinite to be enforceable.

In Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ward, in the Supreme Court of this State, Mr. Justice O'Brien was of the opinion that the failure to provide for the terms and conditions of the contract for the second season rendered the clause so indefinite and uncertain that it could not be the basis of equitable relief, or that it meant that every player is bound for the ensuing season upon the same terms and conditions as those of the first season, including the signing of a new contract containing the option to reserve.

In Philadelphia Ball Club v. Hallan, in the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, Judge Thayer was of the opinion that the failure to designate the terms and conditions of the new engagement under which the player is to be reserved rendered the contract of reservation wholly uncertain and therefore incapable of enforcement.

Where the terms employed to express some particular condition of a contract are ambiguous and cannot be satisfactorily explained by reference to other parts of the contract, and the parties have made other contracts in respect to the same subject matter, and apparently in pursuance of the same general purpose, it is always permissible to examine all of them together in aid of the interpretation of the particular condition; and if it is found that the ambiguous term has a plain meaning by a comparison of the several contracts and an examination of their provisions, that meaning should be attributed to it in the particular condition. So also if it appears that the term used has an established meaning among those engaged in the business to which the contract has reference, and unless it is given that meaning is indefinite and equivocal, it should be treated in interpreting the contract as used according to that understanding. And in construing a contract the court is always at liberty to look at the surrounding and antecedent circumstances, and avail itself of the light of any extrinsic facts which will enable it to view the contract from the standpoint of the parties at the time when it was made. In the present case it will satisfactorily appear by resort to these sources of interpretation that the term "right to reserve" is used in the contract in the sense that obtains in base ball nomenclature; and that it is intended to signify an option the character of which was well understood by base-ball clubs and professional players when the present contract was made. Obviously the right to reserve, given by the eighteenth clause of the contract, is the same thing as the right of reservation mentioned in that part of the contract which provides that the present club may disband and transfer its right of reservation to some other club.

The agreement is in a form common to all contracts between base-ball clubs organized under what is known as the "National Agreement" and professional players, a form which is prescribed by the National Agreement. The National Agreement is a compact between the various base-ball associations constituting the National League Base-Ball Clubs and the American Association of Base-Ball Clubs, made with a view to regulate the rights and obligations of the members as respects one another. One of its paramount features consists of provisions regulating the privilege of clubs to "reserve" a stated number of players. The provisions are framed to prevent any club of the National League or the American Association from engaging a player already reserved by another, and to render the player so reserved ineligible for employment by any other club. They require each club on the 10th day of October, in each year, to transmit to all the other clubs a reserved list of players, not exceeding fourteen in number, then under contract, and of such players reserved in any prior list who have refused to contract for another year; and declare such players ineligible to contract with any other club. Inasmuch as the parties to the National Agreement comprise all, or substantially all, the clubs in the country which employ professional players, this National Agreement by indirection, but practically, affects every professional player, and subordinates his privilege of engaging as he chooses to the option of the club by which he is under reservation. As is stated in a recent publication, edited by a prominent professional player, "the most important feature of the National Agreement unquestionably is the provision according to the club members the privilege of reserving a stated number of players. No other club of any association under the agreement dare engage any player so reserved. To this rule more than any other thing, does base ball, as a business, owe its present substantial standing. By preserving intact the strength of the team from year to year it places the business of base ball on a permanent basis and thus offers security to the investment of capital. The reserve rule itself is a usurpation of the players' rights, but it is perhaps made necessary by the peculiar nature of the ball business, and the player is indirectly compensated by the improved standing of the game. The reserve rule takes a manager by the throat and compels him to keep his hands off his neighbor's enterprise."

In the contracts between clubs and players as framed prior to November, 1887, there was no provision by which the player consented to the option for reserve on the part of the club. But the contracts did contain a condition that the player should conform to and be governed by the constitution and provisions of the National Agreement, and the player thereby assented to become ineligible for engagement by any other club of the league during the season of his engagement by a particular club, or while the option of re-engaging him for an ensuing year on the part of that club remained in force. Changes were made from time to time in various features of the National

Agreement. The players were obliged to inform themselves of the latest changes in order to understand the precise terms of their contract with the clubs. They became unwilling to consent to a form of contract by which they were to be subjected to conditions not mentioned in the contract itself. In November, 1887, a committee representing the professional players met a committee representing the parties to the National Agreement for the purpose of agreeing upon certain changes to be made in the form of the contract. The committees finally agreed that the obnoxious clause in the contract should be omitted, and the clause now found in the eighteenth article should be inserted. This was the origin of the clause giving to the club by the contract itself the option of reserve. The clause was manifestly inserted in order to give by an express condition the right of reservation to the clubs which theretofore the players had only given by agreeing to be bound by the terms of the National Agreement. By ascertaining what that right of reservation was it can be plainly seen what the parties had in mind in using the term in the present contract. If when the contract was made the term had a well-understood definition there was no necessity to particularize in the contract the conditions or characteristics of the option.

Reference has already been made to the provision of the National Agreement requiring each club on the 10th day of October in each year to transmit to all the other clubs a reserved list of players, and declaring such players ineligible to contract with any other club. This provision is to be read in connection with another provision of the National Agreement which provides that no contract shall be made "for the services of any player by any club for a longer period than seven months, beginning April 1, and terminating October 31; and no such contract for services to be rendered after the expiration of the current year shall be made prior to the 20th day of October of such year." The two provisions, read together, allow a period of ten days to intervene between the time when a club can exercise the privilege of placing a player upon its reserved list and the time when it can make a contract with him for services to be rendered in an ensuing year, thus emphasizing a distinction between the right to treat the player as reserved and the contract which is to fix the terms upon which the reservation is to be complete. The effect of these provisions is that when the club has exercised its privilege of reservation no other club is permitted to negotiate with the player, but the club which has placed him upon the reserved list, and no other, is then at liberty to enter into a contract with him to obtain his services for an ensuing year. Consequently the right of reservation is nothing more or less than a prior and exclusive right, as against the other clubs, to enter into a contract securing the player's services for another season. Until the contract is made which fixes the compensation of the player, and the other conditions of his service, there is no definite or complete obligation upon his part to engage with the club; he agrees that he will not negotiate with any other club, but enjoys the privilege of engaging with the reserving club or not as he sees fit. Read with this understanding, the clause in question by which the privilege of reserving the defendant is given to the club, expresses definitely the terms of the option. If the club exercises the right of reservation it agrees in advance that the player shall receive at least as large a salary as he has received during the current year, and leaves it open to him to contract on that basis for the next season or to insist on a larger salary. All the other terms of the engagement are matters of negotiation between the club and the player. The law implies that the option of reservation is to be exercised within a reasonable time, but when this has been done the right to reserve the player becomes the privilege, and the exclusive privilege as between the reserving club and the other clubs, to obtain his services for another year if the parties can agree upon the terms. As a coercive condition which places the player practically, or at least measurably, in a situation where he must contract with the club that has reserved him or face the probability of losing any engagement for the ensuing season, it is operative and valuable to the club. But as the basis for an action for damages if the player fails to contract, or for an action to enforce specific performance, it is wholly nugatory. In a legal sense it is merely a contract to make a contract if the parties can agree. It may be that heretofore the clubs have generally insisted upon treating the option to reserve as a contract by which they were entitled to have the services of the player for the next season upon the terms and conditions of the first season, and even requiring him to enter into a new contract containing the option for reservation; and it may be that the players have generally acquiesced in the claims of the clubs. However this may be, the players were not in a position to act independently, and if they had refused to consent to the terms proposed by the clubs they would have done so at the peril of losing any engagement. The facts therefore are not such as to permit any weight to be given to the acts of the parties as evincing their own construction of the contract.

It follows that the act of the defendant in refusing to negotiate with the club for an engagement for the season of 1890, while a breach of contract, is not the breach of one which the plaintiff can enforce.

Cruelty, which is a statutory ground of

divorce, may be set up by a plea of recrimination as a bar to a bill for divorce on the ground of adultery.

PETITION for a divorce upon the ground of adultery. Dismissed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Stephen A. Cooke and Louis L. Angell for petitioner.

Mr. George J. West for respondent.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are satisfied from the evidence adduced in this case that the respondent has been guilty of adultery, as charged in the petition. We are also satisfied that the petitioner has, as is alleged in the recriminatory answer filed by the respondent, been guilty of extreme cruelty to the respondent, by profane and insulting language habitually used towards her, and by abusive physical violence upon her. In these circumstances should the petition be granted?

The English rule, prior to the passage of Stat. 20 and 21 Vict., chap. 85, § 81, doubtless was that cruelty could not be pleaded in bar to a charge of adultery. Harris v. Harris, 2 Hagg. Eccl. 876; Cocksedge v. Cocksedge, 1 Robt. Eccl. 90; Eldred v. Eldred, 2 Curt. Eccl. 876.

But this was at a time when there was no judicial dissolution of valid marriage, and divorces from bed and board were only for the two causes of adultery and cruelty. Now, by virtue of the Statute referred to, the divorce and matrimonial court has a discretionary power to allow or disallow the recriminatory defense of cruelty, in cases where the petitioner proves adultery. Peerman v. Peerman, 1 Swab. & T. 601, 602.

Ordinarily, however, it seems that even under this Statute, a divorce from the bond of matrimony for adultery will not be granted where the party complaining has been guilty of the less offense of cruelty. Ratcliff v. Ratcliff, 1 Swab. & T. 467-478; 2 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 82.

In this country, while the decisions are not entirely in harmony as to the doctrine of recrimination, we think the decided weight of authority is to the effect that the court cannot distinguish between different matrimonial offenses to which the law attaches the same consequence. Says 2 Bishop, Marriage and Divorce, § 87: "The matrimonial relation is one of mutual dependence and duty; and it would seem to be within all legal analogies, and all sound canons of morality, to refuse to hear a plaintiff complaining of the defendant's infraction of one of the links of this common chain, when he had equally broken another. Moreover the law is for the assistance of those who obey it, not those who violate it; and when two parties are both in the same wrong, the court helps neither." See also § 93 of same volume.

In this State the Statute has specified certain acts of conduct which shall constitute grounds of divorce, among which is extreme cruelty; and, so far as the matrimonial contract is concerned, we do not think the court can distinguish between them, whatever difference there may be in a moral point of view. See Conant v. Conant, 10 Cal. 249; Nagel v. Nagel, 12 Mo. 58; Christianberry v. Christianberry, 3 Blackf. 202; Mattoz v. Mattoz, 2 Ohio, 283; Hall v. Hall, 4 Allen, 89; Clapp v. Clapp, 97 Mass. 681; Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 894. See also the unreported opinion of this court 7 L. R. A.

on file in Goodell v. Goodell, Providence County, October Term, 1886 (Divorce, No. 7,487).

We therefore decide that the plea of recrimination, being fully sustained by the evidence, is a bar to the petitioner's suit for divorce.

A general devise to testator's widow, subject to the payment of debts, funeral charges and the expenses of administration, in full confidence that she will make every needful provision for his children, will not include a trust estate.

(November 23, 1889.)

PETITION by appellee for a new trial in the Court of Common Pleas for Newport County, of an appeal from the laying out and extending of a certain highway, upon which judgment had been entered quashing such proceedings. Judgment set aside.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Recent decisions; devise to wife.

A testator by his will gave his entire estate to his wife, "to be disposed of by will" or in any manner she might deem best. The wife died, leaving the property undisposed of. It was held that, under the will, she acquired an absolute estate in the property, and at her death it descended to her heirs and distributees. Bass v. Bass, 78 N. C. 874.

A testator by will gave all of his property, real and personal, to his wife, giving her full power and authority to sell the whole or any part of the real estate, with provision for division of any of the estate left after her death. The wife rented and sold the real estate, but did not consume the proceeds. On her death the estate was distributed under the will. Exceptions by the next of kin of the widow were dismissed. Brookley's App. (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 927.

A will giving a testator's wife whatever property he may have at the time of his death, both real and personal, gives her an estate in fee simple which is not reduced to a life estate by clauses in which he says: "I charge my wife with the raising and education of my children, such education to be the best her means will afford; and, 'If any of our children should voluntarily refuse, they are not to receive any advantage in property in consequence of such refusal;' and, 'My wife may give to any of our children, at any time and in a form and manner she may think best, any portion of property she may think proper, provided those to whom she had given shall be charged the full amount in the settlement of the estate.'" Howze v. Barber, 29 S. C. 466.

Testator used this language: "I give to my wife . . . the entire control and use of my property of every nature during her life, after paying any debts I may owe, to be by her controlled, used and disposed of as she may think best, as fully as I could do the same were I living." It was held that the will conferred upon the widow the absolute ownership of the property, and that subsequent bequests made in the same instrument were void, because repugnant to the absolute gift to the wife. Re Will of Burbank, 69 Iowa, 878.

Durfee, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for the new trial, in the court of common pleas, of an appeal taken to said court from the doings and decree of the town council of the Town of Tiverton, laying out and extending a highway in said Town. The appeal was taken by Ellen K. Buffum, as owner of the land over which the highway was laid. The reasons of appeal alleged by her are that the highway was unnecessary; that the three men appointed to make it out did not attempt to agree with her in regard to her damages; that no notice was given to her of the doings of said council or three men; and that no damages were awarded to her for the land taken. The appeal came on for trial in the Court of Common Pleas at the November Term, 1888, and thereupon the appellant moved to quash the proceeding, because no notice had been given her as required by Pub. Stat. R. I., chap. 64, § 6. The appellee admitted that the notice had not been given, and claimed that the appellant had no interest in the land taken, and was therefore not entitled to notice. The appellant, to support her claim, put in evidence a deed from one Benjamin Barker, formerly an owner of the land, to one Benjamin Buffum, made and duly recorded in 1874, conveying the land to said Buffum in trust for the uses and purposes set forth in a declaration of trust of even date therewith (which declaration was not recorded), and also the will of said Buffum of later date than said deed, he having deceased.

The provision of the will, under which the appellant, who is the widow of said Buffum, claimed, was as follows, to wit: "I give, devise and bequeath, subject to the payment of my just debts, funeral charges and expenses of settling my estate, all my property and estate of every name and nature, wherever situate, to my wife, Ellen K. Buffum, her heirs and assigns, forever, in full confidence that she in her wisdom will make every needful provision for my children." The appellee contended that no title to the land in question passed by the will, and offered to prove that Barker had continued to occupy it ever since the trust deed was executed. The court, being of opinion that the legal title was in the appellant by virtue of said deed and will, and that she was therefore entitled to notice, quashed the proceedings, in compliance with the appellant's motion, and gave her judgment for costs. The appellee excepted.

It seems to be well settled now, both in England and in this country, that trust estates will pass under a general devise, unless it can be gathered from the expressions of the will, or from the purposes of the testator, or from the limitations imposed, that the testators did not intend to have them pass. 2 Jarman, Wills, *695; 1 Lewin, Tr. *227; Hill, Trustees, *283; Perry, Tr. §§ 336, 337.

The devise here was general, but was made subject to the payment of debts, funeral charges and the expenses of administration. What effect has such a charge on the construction of the devise?

In Re Bellis' Trusts, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 504, decided 1877, the question was examined by Jessel, M. R., with characteristic fullness and ability, and he gave it as his conclusion that, according to English authority, trust estates will not pass under a general devise, where there is a charge of debts or of legacies, or of debts and legacies, citing Roe v. Reade, 8 T. R. 118; Re Horsfall, McClell. & Y. 292; Doe v. Lightfoot, 8 Mees. & W. 553; Hope v. Liddell, 21 Beav. 183, and dissenting decidedly from a different decision by Vice-Chancellor Mallins in Re Brown & Sibly's Contract, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 156.

We do not think there can be any doubt of the correctness of Jessel's decision on English authority. Under that decision, if we are warranted in following it, the trust estate in question here did not pass by the will of Benjamin Buffum. We see no reason why we should not follow it, since it commends itself, and we know of no American decision which is in conflict with it. And see Merritt v. Farmers F. Ins. & Loan Co. 2 Edw. Ch. 547.

Here, moreover, the property is devised by the testator to his widow, "in full confidence that she, in her wisdom, will make every needful provision for his children;" which clearly imports that he devises it to her in full confidence that out of it she will provide, so far as needful, for his children as well as for herself. The inference is that the devise was not intended to include the trust estate.

Ordered that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, quashing the proceeding appealed from, be, and the same is hereby, set aside and reversed, and that a trial of said appeal be, and the same is hereby, quashed in the Court of Common Pleas.

Per Curiam:

The plaintiff, as executor of the last will and testament of Robert W. S. Hopkins, sues the defendants in trover for the conversion, by the defendant wife, of a negotiable promissory note which belonged to the testator in his lifetime. The note was payable to the testator or order, and was put by him, without indorsement, into the possession of the female defendant, who was his daughter. The plaintiff, after his appointment as executor, demanded it of her, and she refused to give it up, claiming that her father had given it to her to keep as her own. On trial in the court of common pleas, after testimony had been put in on both sides, the court ruled that such a note would not pass by delivery, without indorsement, as a gift inter vivos, though it might as a gift causa mortis, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants excepted, and have petitioned this court for a new trial. We think the court below erred. The modern cases hold that such a note, or, at least, the beneficial interest in such a note, will pass by gift, without indorsement, so as to entitle the donee to collect the money due on it for himself, and, if need be, to sue on it for himself; in the name of the donor, or of the donor's legal representative. We do not find that the cases distinguish in this respect between gifts inter vivos and gifts causa mortis, though it may be that, in a doubtful case, the jury would regard the want of an indorsement with more suspicion if the gift were inter vivos than if it were causa mortis. We refer for our authority to the following cases: Snellgrove v. Bailey, 3 Atk. 214; Duffield v. Elces, 1 Bligh (N. R.) 497; Roberts v. Roberts, 15 Week. Rep. 117; Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 261; Sessions v. Moseley, 4 Cush. 87; Bates v. Kempton, 7 Gray, 332; Hale v. Rice, 124 Mass. 293; Brown v. Brown, 18 Conn. 410; Bedell v. Carll, 33 N. Y. 581; Westerlo v. De Witt, 36 N. Y. 340; Young v. Young, 85 N. Y. 422, 430; Crittenden v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 41 Mich. 442; Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 833. And see note by Jno. F. Kelly to Flanders v. Blandy, 26 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 590, 591.

In the course of the trial the female defendant offered herself as a witness to testify to declarations made by the testator in regard to the note. The testimony was objected to, and ruled out, the defendants excepting to the ruling. The defendants contend that the testimony should have been admitted, because the action is for a conversion committed, not in the lifetime of the testator, but since his decease. We think the ruling was right. Our Statute enabling parties to testify on their own offer does not extend to cases where an executor or administrator is on one side, and the party offering to testify is on the other, except when the cause of action is a contract originally made with a person still living and competent to testify, or when the testimony offered relates to matters occurring after the death of the testator or intestate. The second exception is therefore overruled.

The third exception is also overruled, and the first exception is sustained, and the case remitted to the Court of Common Pleas for a new trial.

1. The right to kill a dog, given by Pub. Stat., chap. 93, § 6, to a person whom the dog had suddenly assaulted, need not be exercised instantly, but the person has a right to go for a weapon and return and kill the dog.
2. The fact that a person assaulted by a dog followed it into the shop of a third person, where the dog was kept for the owner at his request, and killed it there does not make him liable to the owner of the dog, where the Statute gave him a right to kill it.
3. A man bitten in consequence of his interference between two fighting dogs to separate them is not suddenly assaulted within the meaning of Pub. Stat., chap. 93, § 6, so as to give him the right to kill the dog.

(December 7, 1892.)

PETITION by plaintiff for a new trial of an action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of his dog by defendant, in which judgment in favor of defendant had been entered upon a verdict directed by the Court of Common Pleas for Providence County. Granted.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. William W. Douglas and Samuel T. Douglas for plaintiff.

Messrs. Francis Colwell, Walter K. Barney and Albert A. Baker for defendant.

Durfee, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for the new trial of an action which the plaintiff brought against the defendant for killing his dog. The action was brought and tried in the court of common pleas. The defendant, on trial in that court, did not deny killing the dog, but set up in defense that the dog had previously attacked and bit him. He testified that September 14, 1887, he was going through East Street, in the City of Providence, in the early evening, with his own dog, a small spaniel, when the plaintiff's dog, a bull terrier larger than the spaniel, attacked it; that he separated the two dogs, and held the plaintiff's dog until his own could get away; that he then let the plaintiff's dog go, whereupon said dog jumped at him and bit his hand quite severely. At the time this occurred the plaintiff's dog was kept for the plaintiff, at his request, by one Andrew L. Carroll, at his shop near by. The defendant, after receiving the bite, went home, got a pistol, returned to Carroll's shop, where the dog then was, and shot it. The defendant contended that he had a right to shoot it, under R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 93, § 6, which provides that "any person may kill any dog that may suddenly assault him, or any person of his family or in his company, while the person so assaulted is out of the inclosure of the owner or keeper of such dog." The plaintiff did not seriously deny that the dog bit the defendant, but he submitted testimony to show that the dog did not bite him at the time and in the manner as the defendant testified. Carroll testified that he helped separate the dogs, and that the defendant got bitten in separating them; that he took the plaintiff's dog by the collar while the two were engaged, and held it so until he got it into his shop, and chained it there, so that it could not have jumped at the defendant and bit him after the separation. Another witness of the occurrence testified that he did not see the plaintiff's dog spring at the defendant. The court ruled that the defendant had a right, under the Statute, to kill the dog; that the dog had forfeited its life by biting him; that he had a right to go for his pistol, get it, return and shoot the dog; and that it did not matter, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, that the dog was in Carroll's shop when shot. The court then directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff excepted, and now asks for a new trial for error in said rulings and direction.

The plaintiff contends that the defendant, if bitten as he testified, should have killed the dog instantly, in order to have the protection of the Statute. We see nothing in the Statute which so limits the right to kill which is given by it. Men do not ordinarily, when they walk the streets, carry with them a weapon which would make it safe for them to attempt to kill a dog which had attacked them, especially if it were powerful and ferocious. The right given by the Statute is given to any person, not only in case he is himself assaulted, but also in case any member of his family is assaulted. Suppose a child on his way to or from school is assaulted by an ugly dog and bitten. Is it reasonable to hold that in such a case the Statute does not enable a father to kill the dog, unless he happens to be where he can do it instantly? It does not seem so to us. The Statute, so construed, would scarcely go further than the common law in any respect, and in some respects not so far. Woolf v. Chalker, 81 Conn. 121; Credit v. Brown, 10 Johns. 365; Putnam v. Payne, 18 Johns. 312; Maxwell v. Palmerton, 21 Wend. 407.

The plaintiff contends that, even if the defendant had a right to kill the dog, he had no right to enter Carroll's shop and kill it there, and he is therefore liable in this action. We do not think the argument is tenable. If it be meant, as we suppose it is, that the defendant committed a trespass on Carroll's shop by entering it and killing the dog there, he is liable to Carroll, not to the plaintiff, for it, and we do not see how the plaintiff can take advantage of it. If a boy, having committed some act of filial disobedience, should take refuge in a neighbor's house or barn, and his father, following, should administer the merited chastisement there, we do not think the father would be any more liable to his son therefor than if he had administered it at home, whatever action his neighbor might have against him. Nor do we see that it helps the matter any for the plaintiff that, when the dog was shot, Carroll was the keeper of it for him.

The plaintiff contends that the defendant fails to justify himself under the Statute, because he was bitten in consequence of his interference between the two dogs to separate them. As we have seen, the testimony on this point was contradictory. According to the defendant's testimony, the conflict between the dogs had ceased, his own dog having run home, when he was bitten; the plaintiff's dog turning upon him to inflict the bite, after he had let go its collar. If this was so, it seems to us that the defendant was "suddenly assaulted," within the Statute. The plaintiff's testimony goes to show that the defendant received the bite while he was endeavoring to separate the dogs, before their struggle was over. The defendant attempted to effect the separation with his hands, and a bite from one dog or the other would be so likely to occur that it might well have been anticipated as a probable result of the attempt. The question is, then, whether, if the defendant was bitten in such circumstances, he can be said to have been suddenly assaulted, within the meaning of the Statute. We think not. In such circumstances, the bite may have been the result of the mutual animosity of the two dogs, or of one of them towards the other, without animosity towards the person receiving it. The suddenness of assault required by the Statute would be wanting. At any rate, if there were circumstances which would bring the case within the Statute, notwithstanding that the bite occurred from such an attempt, it would, in our opinion, be incumbent on the defendant to show them. We think, therefore, that, in view of the testimony given by the plaintiff's witnesses, the case should have been left, under proper instructions, to the jury, and that the court erred in peremptorily directing a verdict for the defendant.

To prevent any possible misapprehension, we will add that, in so deciding, our purpose is not to question in the least the defendant's right to interfere for the protection or rescue of his own dog, or to recover damages for injuries received while so interfering, but only to determine, as best we can, the limit of his right under the Statute to kill the offending dog.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

TRUSTEES OF UNITARIAN SOCIETY in Harvard

v.

Larkin T. TUFTS, Exr. etc., of Mary E.
Pearson, Deceased:

(....Mass....)

- 1. A legacy of a certain number of shares of certain stock is specific where another clause of the will disposes of certain other shares of the same stock, and both bequests dispose of the exact number of shares of such stock standing in the name of the testator, and a subsequent clause gives "the balance of my stock as per my stock book, my furniture and all other property not otherwise disposed of by me," and the general course adopted by the testator in making the will was to take up different items of his property as it then stood and dispose of them.
- 2. A specific legacy of stock standing in the name of the testator is adeemed by a sale of the stock subsequently to the making of the will, and the fact that the will is republished by a codicil afterwards executed is immaterial.

ON report from the Superior Court for Worcester County (Staples, J.) of an action to recover a certain legacy in which judgment had been ordered for plaintiff. Judgment for defendant.

The material portions of the will are as follows:

"Item 4. I give to the Trustees of the Unitarian Society of Harvard, Massachusetts, ten shares of the stock of the Worcester & Nashua Railroad Company, the income thereof to be applied to the payment of the salary of the pastor of said Society, for the time being, with the provision that said Trustees shall out of said income keep the cemetery lot belonging to the Pearson family in said town, in order, and keep the shrubbery from over-topping the monument in said lot, and paint the lettering on said monument once in ten years, to them and their successors.

"Item 5. I give to the Universalist Society of Skowhegan, Maine, ten shares of the stock of the Worcester & Nashua Railroad Company, the income thereof to be applied towards the payment of the minister's salary for the time being, to them and their successors."

"Item 8. The balance of my stock as per my stock book, my furniture and all other property not otherwise disposed of by me, I would have sold and the proceeds thereof disposed of as follows:" giving specific directions.

Then followed a number of clauses disposing of specific items of property belonging to the testatrix, such as portraits, jewelry, clothing, books, furniture, etc.

Subsequently to the publication of her will testatrix sold her Worcester & Nashua Railroad stock and invested the bulk of the proceeds in Kansas school bonds and western land mortgages.

Subsequently she executed a codicil in which she stated: "I make this codicil to my last will heretofore made and published by me and dated October 21, 1832, which will I hereby ratify and confirm in all respects save as the same may be changed by this instrument."

This suit was brought by the Trustees of the Unitarian Society in Harvard to recover the legacy given to them by the fourth clause of the will.

At the trial in the superior court the judge ruled that the legacy was not adeemed by the sale of the stock, and ordered judgment for plaintiffs, and at defendant's request reported the case for the determination of this court; if the ruling was right the judgment was to stand, otherwise such ruling to be made as the court should deem just and proper.

Messrs. Verry & Gaskill, for plaintiffs:

There is no case in Massachusetts where a legacy of stock has been held specific, unless just the number of shares which the testator possessed at the time was given to the partic-

NOTE.—Legacies, specific and general, distinguished.

Whether a legacy is specific or general depends on the intention of the testator, to be derived from the language used in the bequest, construed in the light of all the provisions of the will. Davis v. Crandall, 2 Cent. Rep. 143, 101 N. Y. 311.

The character of a legacy depends upon whether the testator intended that the legatee should have the legacy, although the fund designated for the payment thereof should fail. If he did, it is general; if he did not, it is specific. Tichenor v. Tichenor, 3 Cent. Rep. 71, 41 N. J. Eq. 39.

Directing that a certain sum be kept invested and when the legatee reaches the age of twenty-five that it be equally divided between her and another is a general legacy. Langstroth v. Golding, 3 Cent. Rep. 104, 41 N. J. Eq. 49; 1 Roper, Leg. 356; Brown v. Knapp, 79 N. Y. 136; Gillaume v. Adderley, 15 Ves. Jr. 384; Le Grice v. Finch, 3 Meriv. 50; Sparrow v. Josselyn, 16 Beav. 135; Mytton v. Mytton, L. R. 19 Eq. 80; Bevan v. Atty-Gen. 4 Giff. 361.

A clause in a will bequeathing "the sum of $18,000 first to be taken out of the proceeds of the sale of realty" is not a specific legacy. Hutchinson v. Fuller, 75 Ga. 83.

In case of specific legacies in a will, with a residuary clause providing for a distribution among heirs, children of brothers and sisters take per capita, not per stirpes. McKelvey v. McKelvey, 1 West. Rep. 63, 43 Ohio, 213.

A legacy of a portion of a debt secured by note of the debtor is specific. Davis v. Crandall, supra.

A specific legacy can be taken into possession only by assent of the executor; but this may be either express or implied. An assent to the interest of the tenant for life in a chattel will inure to vest the interest of the remainder, as both constitute but one estate. McClanahan v. Davis, 49 U. S. 8 How. 170 (12 L. ed. 1038).

Whether a legacy is demonstrative or specific must be decided by the intent of testator; and where a legacy is held demonstrative, the general intent is shown to have it paid without reference to the fund on which it is primarily charged. Stevens v. Fisher, 3 New Eng. Rep. 303, 144 Mass. 114.

The term "legacies" prima facie comprehends annuities. Hawk, Wills, 228.

A gift of the profits and dividends of stock for life will not be held to carry dividends declared after the death of the beneficiary, although made from profits accruing during his lifetime. Re Kernochan, 7 Cent. Rep. 90, 104 N. Y. 613.

ular legatee, or unless some other facts appeared to aid that construction.

White v. Winchester, 6 Pick. 48; Metcalf v. Framingham, 128 Mass. 373.

English cases do not seem to adopt that principle.

Robinson v. Addison, 2 Beav. 515; Harvey v. Lloyd, 17 Week. Rep. 990; Jackson v. Hurlock, 2 Eden, 263; Bronsdon v. Winter, 1 Amb. 57. So, too, Tyft v. Porter, 8 N. Y. 516.

But even if so, the effect of it is overcome in this case:

1. By the nature and purposes of the gift.

Johnson v. Goss, 128 Mass. 438.

2. By the ratification and republication of the will by her codicil.

Claven v. Foster, 14 Pick. 543; Brimmer v. Solier, 1 Cush. 118.

Even if the republication cannot revive a specific legacy, yet it is evidence bearing upon the intent of the testator.

Roome v. Roome, 3 Atk. 181; Ravenscroft v. Jones, 4 De G. J. & S. 223.

Mr. J. H. Butler, for defendant:

The bequests to the plaintiff and the society in Skowhegan were special, and by sale of the stock so bequeathed said legacies were adeemed, and the proceeds of such sale, so far as not used by testatrix, belong to the residue which is claimed by the residuary legatees.

Redfield & Williams, Exrs. 4th ed. 142; Pub. Stat. chap. 127, § 8; White v. Winchester, 6 Pick. 48; Richards v. Humphrey, 15 Pick. 135; Foot v. Worthington, 22 Pick. 299; Pollard v. Pollard, 1 Allen, 490; Richardson v. Hill, 124 Mass. 228; Metcalf v. First Parish in Framingham, 128 Mass. 370; Ashburner v. Macquire, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. (part 1)* 267, 4th Am. ed. 600; 1 Jarman, Wills, pp. 42-45, 130-150; Bosley v. Wyatt, 55 U. S. 14 How. 390 (14 L. ed. 463); Pickering v. Langdon, 22 Me. 418; Kip v. Van Cortland, 7 Hill, 346; Vandemark v. Vandemark, 26 Barb. 416; Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 253; Ford v. Ford, 23 N. H. 212.

That testatrix provided for care of a tomb, requiring a trifling expense, does not make the bequest general, any more than the provision for paying the minister's salary.

White v. Winchester, 6 Pick. 48.

Bequest of stock.

Bequest of stock "now standing in my name" gives the stock as standing on the books at the date of executing the will, rather than at that of testator's death. Fidelity Ins. Co's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 61, 108 Pa. 339.

Such a bequest is a specific legacy, as being a particular thing, specified and separated from all other things constituting the testator's estate. Walker's Estate, 3 Rawle, 220; Blackstone v. Blackstone, 8 Watts, 335; Ludlam's Estate, 13 Pa. 183, 3 Clark, 276; Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 258.

To constitute a specific legacy it is sufficient if it can be specified and distinguished from the rest of the testator's estate, at the time of his decease (Fontaine v. Tyler, 9 Price, 94; Stephenson v. Dowson, 3 Beav. 342; 2 Redf. Wills, 133); and legacies which would have been specific before the statutes are specific still. Bothamley v. Sherson, L. R. 20 Eq. 304.

In Hepburn v. Skirving, 4 Jur. N. S. 651, the bequests were of "all the shares which I now possess in the G. Bank," and of "the shares I am possessed of in the A. Bank," and of "the money I possess in the company's fund."

In Langdale v. Briggs, 3 DeG. M. & G. 391, the be-

The language of the codicil in confirmation of the will of Mrs. Pearson is in the usual form, and confirmed the will as it then stood, with the bequest to plaintiff and the other society adeemed. These legacies were at that time as effectually revoked by the sale as they would have been had she on the day of sale revoked them by codicils. And confirmation of a will by a codicil does not re-enact bequests revoked by former codicils.

Schouler, Admrs. and Exrs. §§ 881, 461, 476; Brimmer v. Solier, 1 Cush. 118; Hosea v. Jacobs, 98 Mass. 65.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We must hold the legacy in the fourth clause of the will specific, although we cannot but fear that if the testatrix had been fully advised of the consequences of making a legacy specific, she would have changed her will.

The legacy is of "ten shares of the stock of the Worcester & Nashua Railroad Company." By the fifth clause of the will the testatrix gives ten shares to another legatee, and she gives none of it to anyone else. At the time of making her will, she owned twenty shares of the stock. We will assume, for the purposes of our decision, that the mere coincidence between the amount given and the amount owned would not make the legacy specific, both being round numbers. See Tyft v. Porter, 8 N. Y. 516; Bronsdon v. Winter, 1 Amb. 57; Purss v. Snaphin, 1 Atk. 414; Robinson v. Addison, 2 Beav. 515, 520.

This might be admitted, perhaps, without at all questioning White v. Winchester, 6 Pick. 48. But White v. Winchester, and Metcalf v. First Parish in Framingham, 128 Mass. 370, 373, show that such a coincidence is an important fact to be considered in connection with the language of the will. See Johnson v. Goss, 128 Mass. 438, 436.

Turning to the language, we find nothing conclusive in the fourth clause. The word "the" preceding "stock" is ambiguous and may as well refer to the stock of the company in general as to the stock owned by the testatrix. But if "my" were used instead of "the," the quests were of "the estates of which I am seised;" in Lilford v. Keck, 30 Beav. 300, "all lands of or to which I am seised or entitled in fee simple;" in Trinder v. Trinder, L. R. 1 Eq. 665, "my shares in the Great Western Railway;" in Wagstaff v. Wagstaff, L. R. 8 Eq. 229, "all my ready money, bank and other shares, and any other property, that I may now possess;" in York v. Brown, cited in Everett v. Everett, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 431, "all his messuages, farms, lands and hereditaments situate in the parish of Great Bowden;" in Bothamley v. Sherson, L. R. 20 Eq. 304, "all my stock in the Midland Railway Company."

The several bequests in all these cases have, under the Wills Act, been construed to have reference to the death of the testators, although the words employed were in the present tense, qualified even by the word "now."

In other cases the qualifying word "now" served merely as descriptive of the subject matter of a bequest. Re Midland R. Co. 34 Beav. 525; Saxton v. Saxton, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 359; Miles v. Miles, L. R. 1 Eq. 462; Castle v. Fox, L. R. 11 Eq. 542; Garrison v. Garrison, 29 N. J. L. 154; Struthers v. Struthers, 5 Week. Rep. 803.

legacy would be specific. Metcalf v. First Parish in Framingham, 128 Mass. 370, 378; Foots, Appellant, 22 Pick. 299, 303. See Johnson v. Goss, 128 Mass. 433, 435.

The same principle applies upon equally strong grounds when a testator, after giving legacies of stock generally, gives the rest of the stock "standing in my name." Sleech v. Thornton, 2 Ves. Sr. 560. See Metcalf v. First Parish in Framingham, 128 Mass. 370, 372; Millard v. Bailey, L. R. 1 Eq. 378; Theobald, Wills, 8d ed. 100.

In this case the eighth clause of the will gives "the balance of my stock as per my stock book, my furniture and all other property not otherwise disposed of by me." This language, taken with the facts, makes it pretty plain that the stock disposed of by the testatrix in the fourth clause was stock then belonging to her, and the conclusion is fortified by the other clauses which show that the general course which she adopted in making her will was to take up different items of her property as it then stood and to dispose of them. The words used describe a specific legacy too clearly to be controlled by the fact that the proviso discloses a motive which might be conjectured to be independent of the form in which the property was invested.

The republication of the will by the codicil does not change or enlarge the meaning of the words of the will on which the plaintiff must rely in order to recover the legacy. It follows that the legacy was adeemed by the sale of the stock. Pattison v. Pattison, 1 Myl. & K. 12; Macdonald v. Irvine, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 101, 108. See Sidney v. Sidney, L. R. 17 Eq. 65, 68.

Judgment for defendant.

John R. ROOKE.

1. That an instrument may be a promissory note it must contain on its face an express promise to pay money; hence an instrument in the following form: "I. O. U. the sum of $17.05 for value received," signed by the maker, is not a promissory note.

2. Interest will be allowed in a suit to recover the amount due under an instrument which is a mere acknowledgment of debt only from the service of the writ, if there was neither prior demand made, nor stipulated time for payment, nor contract or usage requiring payment of interest, and if defendant was not a wrongdoer in acquiring or retaining the money.

ON plaintiff's exceptions to a judgment of the Superior Court of Middlesex County disallowing his claim to interest upon a certain instrument in writing in the form of a due bill. Overruled.

The action was of contract on the following instrument:

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In order to constitute a good promissory note there should be an express promise on the face of the instrument to pay the money. A mere promise implied by law founded on an acknowledged indebtedness will not be sufficient. Story, Prom. Notes, 14; Brown v. Gilman, 13 Mass. 168.

While such promise need not be expressed in any particular form of words the language used must be such that the written undertaking to pay may fairly be deduced therefrom. Commonwealth Ins. Co. v. Whitney, 1 Met. 21.

In this view the instrument sued on cannot be considered a promissory note. It is an acknowledgment of a debt only, and although from such an acknowledgment a promise to pay may be legally implied, it is an implication from the existence of the debt and not from any promissory language. Something more than this is necessary to establish a written promise to pay money. It was therefore held in Gray v. Bowden, 23 Pick. 282, that a memorandum on the back of a promissory note in these words: "I acknowledge the within note to be just and due," signed by the maker and attested by a witness, was not a promissory note signed in the presence of an attesting witness within the meaning of the Statute of Limitations.

In England an I. O. U., there being no promise to pay embraced therein, is treated as a due bill only. The cases which arose principally under the Stamp Act are very numerous and they have held that such a paper did not require a stamp as it was only evidence of a debt. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 35; 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 88; Fesenmayer v. Adcock, 16 Mees. & W. 449; Melanotte v. Teasdale, 13 Mees. & W. 216; Smith v. Smith, 1 Post. & F. 539; Gould v. Coombe, 1 C. B. 543; Fisher v. Leslie, 1 Esp. 426; Israel v. Israel, 1 Campb. 499; Childers v. Boulnois, Dow. & Ry. N. P. 8; Beeching v. Westbrook, 8 Mees. & W. 411.

While in a few States it has been held otherwise, the law as generally understood in the country is that in the absence of any statute a mere acknowledgment of a debt is not a promissory note, and such is we think the law of this Commonwealth. Gray v. Bowden and Commonwealth Ins. Co. v. Whitney, supra; Daggett v. Daggett, 124 Mass. 149; Almy v. Winslow, 126 Mass. 842; Carson v. Lucas, 13 B. Mon. 213; Garland v. Scott, 15 La. Ann. 143; Ourier v. Lockwood, 40 Conn. 849; Brenzer v. Wightman, 7 Watts & S. 264; Biakup v. Oberle, 6 Mo. App. 583.

Some States have by statute extended the law of bills and promissory notes to all instruments in writing and whereby any person acknowledges any sum of money to be due to any other person. 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 88; Ill. Rev. Stat. 1880; Colo. Gen. Laws, 1877; Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876; Iowa Rev. Code 1850; Miss. Rev. Code 1823.

We have no occasion to comment upon those instruments in which words have been used or superadded from which an intention to accompany the acknowledgment with a promise to pay has been gathered, or where the form of the instrument fairly led to that conclusion. Daggett v. Daggett and Almy v. Winslow, supra.

No such words exist in the instrument sued, nor is it in form anything but an acknowledgment. The words "for value received" recite, indeed, the consideration, but they add nothing which can be interpreted as a promise to pay. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether, if the paper were a promissory note, interest should be calculated from its date. Upon this point we express no opinion. If it is to be treated as an acknowledgment of debt only, as we think it must be, the plaintiff is not entitled to interest except from the date of the writ. Even if it were the duty of the defendant to have paid the debt on demand, yet, if no demand was made, if no time was stipulated for its payment, if there was no contract or usage requiring the payment of interest and if the defendant was not a wrong-doer in acquiring or detaining the money, interest should be computed only from the demand made by the service of the writ. Dodge v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 868; Hunt v. Nevers, 15 Pick. 500.

"In general," says Chief Justice Shaw, "where there is a loan without any stipulation to pay interest, and where one has the money of another, having been guilty of no wrong in obtaining it and no default in retaining it, interest is not chargeable." Hubbard v. Charlestown Branch R. Co. 11 Met. 124; Calton v. Bragg, 15 East, 223; Shaw v. Picton, 4 Barn. & C. 728; Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005; Walker v. Constable, 1 Bos. & P. 806.

Alice S. WASON et al.

(....Mass....)

1. The donor of the income of a trust fund to a person for life may qualify the gift by a provision that the right to receive the income shall be inalienable; such qualification need not be in express terms, but it will suffice if the intention to make it can be clearly gathered from the NOTE.—Devise of income of trust fund; late cases.

An absolute devise of principal to be held in trust for the children of the testatrix, and also a distinct direction that the income shall be paid to them; but in case of their death during the lifetime of the husband of the testatrix, the income to be paid to her husband during his life,—is an absolute gift of the principal for the benefit of the children, subject only to the gift of the income to the husband during the remainder of his life in case he survived the children. Thomas v. Thomas (N. J.) 18 Atl. Rep. 365.

A will gave $1,000 to the testator's wife; also "the whole interest and income of $6,000 to be paid to her each and every year during her life," and so much of the $6,000 itself as should be required to support her in a manner becoming her station in life, if the "said interest or income" should prove insufficient to effect that purpose; and then provided that the personal estate should be sold or rented "to raise funds to pay debts, legacies and expenses." It was held that the widow was entitled to the instrument of grant when construed in the light of the circumstances.

2. When so much of the income of a trust fund is given to a person as shall be necessary for his support his right thereto is in its nature inalienable and the intention of the donor that it shall not be alienated is presumed; hence, such income cannot be reached by a creditor of the donee, and the court will not for his benefit fix the amounts and times of future payments and decree that they shall be fixed sums which can be reached by him.
3. Where a fund is given to a person absolutely, subject to a charge for the support of another during life, the court will not interfere at the suit of a third person to change the relation of the parties or the character of the fund.

ON reservation from the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Devens, J.) upon bill and demurrer of a suit brought by a creditor of Alice S. Wason to reach funds alleged to belong to her and to be in the hands of the other defendants, and to have the same applied in satisfaction of her debt. Demurrer sustained.

The bill alleged that Thomas W. Wason, deceased, left a will which was duly admitted to probate by which he gave to his son the income of certain stock during his life, the principal of which was to be held by the executors during the life of the son, and, at his decease, the same was to go to whatever child or children of his should survive him, provided that if such son should leave a widow she should be entitled to support out of the income so long as she should remain his widow. That the son died leaving a wife surviving him, who still remained his widow and was the Alice S. Wason made a party to this bill. The probate court appointed trustees to execute the provisions of the will, who were also made parties to the suit. The son left one child, for whom guardians were appointed, who, together with the son, were also made parties to the suit.

The bill further alleged that the money accrued as income on the trust property to which Alice S. Wason was already entitled under the will, would not be sufficient to pay her indebtedness to the complainant. The bill contained interrogatories as to the character and amount of the income which was, or which might become, due to Mrs. Wason, and contained a prayer that the court would direct the trustees to pay over such sums of money as had already accrued for the settlement of complainant's debt, and that they should retain what might thereafter accrue, and apply it in the same way until the said indebtedness was satisfied; and that the trustees might be enjoined from applying any part of the income in any other way until such indebtedness, interest and cost should be paid in full and satisfied.

Demurrers were filed to this bill and the case was thereupon reserved by assent of the parties for the consideration of the full court.

Messrs. Champlin, Ryther & Wentworth and Edward I. Baker, for plaintiff:

Under the will of Thomas W. Wason, Alice S. Wason is a beneficiary, and thereunder acquired either a valuable equitable interest in the fund bequeathed to the child or children of George W. Wason, out of which she is entitled to her support, or a valuable right against the legatees, which, if denied her, "she could enforce by a proper bill in equity."

Hyde v. Wason, 131 Mass. 450.

This equitable interest of said Alice, in the absence of peculiar circumstances taking the case out of the general rule, may be reached by whole of the income and interest, without deduction of taxes or expenses. Re Cushing's Will, 2 New Eng. Rep. 471, 58 Vt. 393.

Where one clause of a will created a trust for three persons in equal shares in all the property covered by a power possessed by testatrix; and another clause provided that the share "allotted" to one of them should be held in trust for her during life to receive the net income; and a clause following provided that the trustee should have power to make division of the property, receive the interest, income, rents and profits, pay taxes, etc.,—although the power to make division could apply only to the first trust, the other enumerated powers were given in respect to both of them. Jenks v. Lyman, 127 Ill. 341.

Where a will provided that $1,000 of the annual income from testatrix's estate should be devoted to the maintenance and education of her five children, and that any excess should be applied to the payment of incumbrances, etc., and it appeared that testatrix never contemplated that the income would be less than $1,000, and made no provision for supplying any possible deficiency,—it was held that a shortage or deficiency of income in any one year could not be paid out of a surplus arising in after years. Brewster's App. (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 102.

A devise to a son of a share to be retained by a trustee for and during the son's natural life, the interest thereof to be paid to the son yearly, and after his death his share to be equally divided among his children if he should have any, or to their issue, creates only a life estate in the son. McDevitt's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 33, 113 Pa. 103.

Precatory words in will.

It is perfectly well settled that what are denominated precatory words, expressive of a wish or desire, may, in given instances, create a trust or impose a charge. Phillips v. Phillips, 112 N. Words of recommendation, request, entreaty, wish or expectation will impose a binding duty upon the devisee, by way of trust, provided the testator has pointed out with clearness and certainty both the subject matter and the object of the trust. Authorities cited in Noe v. Kern, 12 West. Rep. 234, 93 Mo. 367.

The words "wish" and "desire," used as expressing a desire for an act to be done by some person named, may be held to be precatory; but when used to express the intention of the testator, they are mandatory. Taylor v. Martin (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 139.

A will stating it to be the desire of the testatrix that the remainder of her estate be equally divided between her children, and that the executor will dispose of all her real estate as soon as it can be done without loss to the estate, does not operate by its own force to convert the land into money, and thus place it beyond the lien of a judgment against the land, recovered before a sale by the executor. Eneberg v. Carter, 98 Mo. 647.

A will in which testator says: "I desire the residue of my estate, real and personal, to be sold by my executors . . . at such time as they may deem best," and the proceeds to be divided, etc.,—makes an equitable conversion of the real estate. *Carr v. Where the paramount object and purpose of a bequest in trust is to provide for the support of the beneficiary, the power of alienation by anticipation is inconsistent with, and would directly defeat, this paramount purpose. The rights of the beneficiary and her creditors are limited by the will.

A court of equity ordinarily will not interfere with the discretion of a trustee. The discretion is destroyed, and the purpose of the testator defeated, if creditors can fix and control the manner and amount of the support.

If any income had accrued generally on the property in the guardians' hands, the same objections to Alice S. Wason's support therefrom, being reached by creditors, exist as already discussed.

Perkins v. Hays, 8 Gray, 405; Holdship v. Patterson, 7 Watts, 551; Braman v. Stiles, 2 Pick. 461.

Mrs. Wason's rights in the property are limited to what is needed for a reasonable support after her husband's death, and it nowhere appears that the items of plaintiff's bill were furnished for Mrs. Wason's support.

Clark v. Holbrook, 6 New Eng. Rep. 41, 146 Mass. 366, 369; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 183 Mass. 170; Foster v. Foster, 183 Mass. 179; Hall v. Williams, 120 Mass. 844.

The interest of the defendant is too uncertain and contingent to be reached by a bill in equity.

Baker v. Brown, 5 New Eng. Rep. 904, 146 Mass. 369, 372; Russell v. Milton, 183 Mass. 180; Bartholomew v. Weld, 127 Mass. 210.

W. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Adams, 183 Mass. 170, that the donor of the income of a trust fund to one for his lifetime qualify the gift by a provision that the right to receive the income should not be alienable. The language of the court in Baker v. Brown, 146 Mass. 369, 5 New Eng. Rep. 904, referring to that case, is applicable to the case at bar,—"Such provision need not be in express terms, but it is sufficient if the intention is clearly to be gathered from the instrument, when construed in the light of the circumstances. The only question in the present case is whether enough appears to show such intention."

The intention that the right given in the instrument under consideration should not be alienable, is obvious from the nature of the gift. There is no gift of the whole income, as in Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, nor even of the whole income for the support of the beneficiary, as in Maynard v. Cleaves, 149 Mass. 307, and in many other cases, but, at most, a right to so much of the fund as shall be needed for her support. When the whole income or a definite sum is given to the beneficiary for his support, the whole belongs to him, and is to be applied by him at his discretion, and the expression of the purpose for which it is given is not deemed to be the expression of an intention that the right to secure it shall not be alienable but when the right given is for a support out of a fund which is given to another, the right is in its nature inalienable, and the intention of the donor that it shall not be alienated is presumed. The right may be extinguished but it cannot be aliened, because a payment to an alienee cannot be a payment for the support of the beneficiary, and no payments are required to be made by the owner of the fund, except such as are for that purpose. The only escape from this conclusion is to hold that the court, on this bill by a creditor, will fix the amounts and times of future payments for support, and decree that they shall be fixed sums, due but not payable to the beneficiary, the right to which she can alien.

One answer to this is, that the court will not interfere to change the relations of the parties at the request of a stranger. The owner of the fund is not a trustee, and his mother is not a cestui que trust, who and whose representatives can call him to account as a trustee. He is the absolute owner of the fund subject to the charge of his mother's support. He owes a duty to his mother, and she has a right against him. So long as the parties are satisfied, there is no occasion for any court to interfere with them. If he fails to perform his duty, the court on her application will in some way protect her rights. It may require him to give security, or it may organize a trust fund and make him or some other person trustee, and thus change the relation of the parties and the character of the fund; but the court ought to thus interfere and act only at the instance of the party in interest and to protect her rights under the will, by carrying out the intention of the testator. It will not, without her complaint, and against her wishes, interfere at the suit of a third party to institute a trust and to change the character of the fund and the relation of the parties to it in order to defeat the intention of the testator, not only as to his daughter-in-law but also as to his grandson.

The whole fund is given to the grandson charged only with the support of his mother. Whatever is not required for her support is his to enjoy. What is paid to her creditors is not used for her support although it is paid by him. If the court should attempt to recoup his loss by limiting the amount which he should be liable to pay for his mother's support to the amount he is to pay to her creditors, while this would deprive her of a right of support under the will, it could not relieve him from his statutory obligation to support her. If, however, the relations of the parties, and the circumstances, were such that the court would fix and secure to Mrs. Wason the amount which should be paid to her for her support, it would take care that by so doing it did not change the condition of the property so as to defeat instead of carrying out the intention of the testator. If such action was sought by Mrs. Wason to protect her rights, the decree should be so framed as not to render the right alienable. When the parties do not desire the aid of the court, it will not interfere at the suit of a creditor to change the condition of the property and thereby give him rights which the will alone does not give him, and which the testator did not mean that he should have.

In accordance with the opinion of a majority of the court, the entry is—

A writ of ne exeat will not be issued to aid in the collection of a judgment which has been recovered at law against a woman.

NOTE.—Writ of ne exeat.

A writ of ne exeat cannot be granted for a debt due and recoverable at law. It applies only to equitable demands. Seymour v. Hazard, 1 Johns. Ch. 1, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 37; *Smedberg v. The bill must have been previously filed. Mattocks v. Tremain, 3 Johns. Ch. 75, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 547; Smedberg v. Mark, supra.

To sustain the writ, sufficient equity must appear on the face of the bill. Mere apprehension that defendant will misapply funds in his hands, or abuse his trust, is not sufficient. Woodward v. Schatzell, 3 Johns. Ch. 412, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 668.

A suit in this court, by a judgment and execution creditor, to reach equitable interests, things in action and effects, is an equitable and not a legal demand; and the defendant may be arrested on a ne exeat thereon. Ellingwood v. Stevenson, 4 Sandf. Ch. 368.

APPEAL by petitioner from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Mason, J.) dismissing a petition for a writ of ne exeat to aid in the collection of a judgment at law against a woman. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. J. J. Feeley for appellant.

No appearance for appellee.

Per Curiam:

If we assume that this appeal is properly before us, the decree of the superior court dismissing the petition must be affirmed. It appears that the petitioner has obtained in the superior court a judgment against the respondent in an action at law, that this judgment remains unsatisfied, and that the respondent, who is a woman, intends to come within the Commonwealth, and after remaining a few days to depart from it. The complaint of the petitioner is, that the statutes which prescribe the proceedings which can be taken against the person of a woman, in order to compel her to satisfy an execution issued on a judgment at law, do not afford an adequate remedy, and he asks that the chancery writ of ne exeat may issue that she may be arrested and compelled to give bail or security that she will pay the judgment. See Pub. Stat. chap. 162, §§ 3, 6-17.

The Statutes must be considered as providing the only remedies which the Legislature intended that a plaintiff should have to enforce an execution at law against the person of a woman, and the writ of ne exeat has never been issued in aid of legal, as distinguished from equitable, process, or for the purpose of obtaining security from a defendant in an action at law. 3 Dan. But in a proper case it is a writ of right and not discretionary. Ibid.; 2 Story, Eq. § 1469; Act of Congress Mar. 2, 1793, chap. 22, § 5.

It must appear that no adequate remedy is afforded at law, and the bill must be verified by one or more of the complainants. An affidavit by an agent or attorney, or by complainants themselves, that the allegations are true to the best of affiant's knowledge and belief, is insufficient. Old Hickory Distilling Co. v. Bleyer, supra; Orme v. McPherson, 36 Ga. 673; Hannahan v. Nichols, 17 Ga. 78; Hunter v. Nelson, 5 Blackf. 263; MacDonough v. Gaynor, 18 N. J. Eq. 249; Edwards v. Massey, 1 Hawks. 350; Ramsay v. Joyce, 1 McMull. Eq. 226.

A person cannot be prevented from going beyond the State's jurisdiction by injunction. Bleyer v. Blum, 70 Ga. 568.

In what cases will issue.

It will issue when the peculiar circumstances of the case bring it within the jurisdiction of the court of equity as in matters of account (Porter v. Spencer, 2 Johns. Ch. 169, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 835), or divorce (Bushnell v. Bushnell, 15 Barb. 400); or where courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction, it will be granted in aid of the action at law. Lucas v. Hickman, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 113, 19 Am. Dec. 44, 45; Rhodes v. Cousins, 8 Rand. 188, 18 Am. Dec. 719; Gilbert v. Colt, Hopk. Ch. 496, 14 Am. Dec. 500.

Where the original bill was sustainable, as to the issuing of the writ of ne exeat, the court, having gained jurisdiction, may retain it generally. Candler v. Pettit, 1 Paige, 169; Rathbone v. Warren, 10 Johns. 596.

An action for an account is an equitable demand for which it will issue. MacDonough v. Gaynor, 18 N. J. Eq. 250; Allen v. Smith, 16 N. Y. 413, 419; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1470-1473.

Such account must be one having items on one side and set-off on the other, and must be a series of transactions on both sides. Durant v. Einstein, 35 How. Pr. 241, 5 Robt. 437; Baker v. Biddle, Bald, 430; Bellamy v. Hawkins, 16 Fla. 738; McMartin v. Bingham, 27 Iowa, 237, 1 Am. Rep. 266; Phillips v. Phillips, 9 Hare, 471.

Where there are mutual accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant, or where each has received and paid on account of the other, and the legal remedies are inadequate, equity will exercise jurisdiction. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 472; Van Wyck v. Alliger, 6 Barb. 514; Dickinson v. Lewis, 84 Ala. 638; Avery v. Ware, 58 Ala. 473; Garner v. Reis, 25 Minn. 475; Wilson v. Mallett, 4 Sandf. 112; Salter v. Ham, 31 N. Y. 821; Walker v. Cheever, 35 N. H. 330; Gloninger v. Hazard, 48 Pa. 389; Passyunk Bldg. Ass'n Appeal, 83 Pa. 441; Carter v. Bailey, 64 Me. 458; McKinnon v. McLean, 2 Dev. & B. L. 52; Hay v. Marshall, 3 Humph. 623; Smith v. Marks, 3 Rand. 449; Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh, 6; Haywood v. Hutchins, 65 N. C. 674; Allison v. Herring, 9 Sim. 583; Phillips v. Phillips, 9 Hare, 471; Padwick v. Hurst, 18 Beav. 575; Fluker v. Taylor, 3 Drew. 123.

Under what circumstances.

It can properly be issued only where the debtor could be touched by attachment, or on execution (Adams v. Whitcomb, 46 Vt. 713; Gleason v. Bisby, Clarke, Ch. 551); and will not lie where debt is due by an executor of decedent's estate (Brownell v. Akin, 6 Hun, 379), nor where bail can be demanded. Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 188.

There must be a present debt or duty or some existing right to relief, either at law or in equity. De Rivafnoli v. Corsetti, 4 Paige, 264, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 422; Gresham v. Peterson, 25 Ark. 377; Fredricks v. Mayer, 13 How. Pr. 568, 1 Bosw. 231; Gleason v. Bisby, Clarke, Ch. 551, 7 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 197.

To entitle complainant to a writ of ne exeat he must show a demand actually due at the time the writ issues. Cable v. Alvord, 27 Ohio St. 600; Palmer v. Van Doren, 2 Edw. Ch. 425; Samuel v. Wiley, 50 N. H. 353; Porter v. Spencer, 2 Johns. Ch. 169.

The demand must be a pecuniary demand. Cowdin v. Cram, 8 Edw. Ch. 231, 6 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 638; Graham v. Stucken, 4 Blatchf. 50.

The debt must be so far due that payment or performance can be rightfully demanded. Hayes v. Willho, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 170; Cox v. Scott, 5 Har. & J. 384.

There must be a precise amount due not suable at law (Brownell v. Akin, 6 Hun, 379), except in cases of account or of alimony. Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 188, 18 Am. Dec. 715.

Against foreigner.

It may issue against a foreigner, or resident of a sister State (Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 617; Monamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige, 239; Woodward v. Schatzell, 2 Johns. Ch. 412; Forrest v. Forrest, 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 175, 5 How. Pr. 129, 10 Barb. 50); and even where the subject of the action is situated in a foreign State. Barry v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 2 Thomp. & C. 17; De Klyn v. Watkins, 3 Sandf. Ch. 185; Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 450; Parker v. Parker, 12 N. J. Eq. 105.

It is not necessary that it should appear he is about to depart to avoid the jurisdiction, if his departure will defeat the suit. MacDonough v. Gaynor, 18 N. J. Eq. 250; Parker v. Parker, 12 N. J. Eq. 105; Yule v. Yule, 10 N. J. Eq. 133; Atkinson v. Leonard, 3 Bro. Ch. 218; Howden v. Rogers, 1 Ves. & B. 129.

The abolition by the Code of distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity does not affect the operation of the writ. Burnside v. Blythe, 11 B. Mon. 6; Victor Scale Co. v. Shurtleff, 81 Ill. 312; Gresham v. Peterson, 25 Ark. 377.

Application for writ.

The writ may be applied for at any stage of the proceedings. Dunham v. Jackson, 1 Paige, 629; Samuel v. Wiley, 50 N. H. 355.

No notice of motion for the writ is required. Samuel v. Wiley, 50 N. H. 355.

In view of the settled policy of our laws against imprisonment for debt, every application for a writ of ne exeat should be closely scrutinized, and promptly rejected where the complaint is not clearly within the spirit of the law. Gresham v. Peterson, 25 Ark. 380; Wallace v. Duncan, 13 Ga. 41; Tomlinson v. Harrison, 8 Ves. Jr. 83; Burnside v. Blythe, 11 B. Mon. 12; Russel v. Aaby, 5 Ves. Jr. 96. The prayer need not be inserted in the bill. Colinson v. —, 18 Ves. Jr. 353.

The defendant need not be actually in the State where the writ is applied for. Parker v. Parker, 12 N. J. Eq. 105; Gilbert v. Colt, 1 Hopk. Ch. 496.

The petition is not fatal because all jointly liable are not joined. Fitzgerald v. Gray, 59 Ind. 254.

It must show defendant to be guilty of fraud or that there is a strong presumption of fraud. Malcolm v. Andrews, 68 Ill. 100.

Bond given by defendant.

On the hearing of a bill which prayed both an injunction and writ of ne exeat, an order refusing the latter writ, provided the defendant would give a bond, with security, to make good any judgment found in favor of the complainant, was error. Old Hickory Distilling Co. v. Bleyer, 74 Ga. 201.

The affidavit its foundation.

A positive affidavit of an existing debt is the foundation of the writ. Cable v. Alvord, 27 Ohio St. 666; De Carriere v. De Calonne, 4 Ves. Jr. 577; Dawson v. Dawson, 7 Ves. Jr. 173.

The petitioner must swear positively to the debt or the balance due, yet he need not swear to a certain amount; it is sufficient in the affidavit to swear according to his belief that a certain sum is due. Thorne v. Halsey, 7 Johns. Ch. 189, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 284.

The affidavit of the wife suing for divorce in her own name is sufficient foundation for its issuance. Denton v. Denton, 1 Johns. Ch. 364, 441, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 173, 202; Forrest v. Forrest, supra; Mattocks v. Tremain, 3 Johns. Ch. 75, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 547; Boucicault v. Boucicault, 59 How. Pr. 134, 21 Hun, 435.

This doctrine, however, has been repudiated in England. Bailey v. Cadwell, 51 Mich. 220.

The affidavit must set out that defendant has disposed of or is about to remove his property (Dean v. Smith, 23 Wis. 433; Fitzgerald v. Gray, 59 Ind. 254); and that the property is not exempt from execution. Jones v. Kennicott, 33 Ill. 484.

It must show that defendant is about to leave the State (Gresham v. Peterson, 25 Ark. 377; Houseworth v. Hendrickson, 27 N. J. Eq. 60; Yule v. Yule, 10 N. J. Eq. 183); and is sufficient if it is positive as to defendant's intention to leave, although upon information and belief only. Moore v. Gleason, 23 Ga. 142.

But mere apprehension that defendant is about to leave the State will not warrant its issuance. Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Hand. 188; Williams v. Williams, 8 N. J. Eq. 180.

Where the affidavit refers to the facts set out in the petition, it is sufficient without repeating them. Clayton v. Mitchell, 1 Del. Ch. 32. See generally Woodward v. Schatzell, 3 Johns. Ch. 412; Gibert v. Colt, 1 Hopk. Ch. 496; Dunham v. Jackson, 1 Paige, 629; Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 617; McNamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige, 239.

Issuance and service of writ.

The writ of ne exeat is not issuable in Michigan by a circuit court commissioner or injunction master as a matter of interlocutory chancery practice as in divorce suit. Bailey v. Cadwell, 51 Mich. 217.

It can in no case be allowed except by the judge himself. Bailey v. Cadwell, supra.

A writ signed by the judge in chambers, but not signed nor sealed by the clerk, is void. Bonesteel v. Bonesteel, 23 Wis. 245.

So it is void if served on Sunday. Jewett v. Bowman, 27 N. J. Eq. 275.

The Act to abolish imprisonment for debt has not deprived the court of chancery of the power to issue the writ of ne exeat in cases of equitable cognizance. Brown v. Raff, 5 Paige, 235, 3 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 699; Neville v. Neville, 23 How. Pr. 503; McNamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige, 241.

The court in making the writ will exercise a 7 L. R. A.

sound discretion under the special circumstances of the case so as to prevent oppression and extortion. Denton v. Denton, 1 Johns. Ch. 441, 1 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 202.

The court determines the amount in which the defendant shall be held to bail; and the sheriff must take a bond in the amount directed, as the penal sum. Gibert v. Colt, Hopk. Ch. 496, 2 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 500.

It cannot issue against a female in an action founded on contract. Adams v. Whitcomb, 46 Vt. 708.

On an ordinary judgment creditors' bill where an answer denies property and no proof is had to show any, ne exeat cannot be had. Palmer v. Van Doren, 2 Edw. Ch. 425, 6 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 454.

Discharge of writ.

It is a matter of course to discharge the writ, upon the party's giving security to answer the complainant's bill, where a discovery is necessary, and to abide such order and decree as may be made in the cause, and to render himself amenable to the process of the court, which may be issued to enforce the performance of the decree. Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 617, 22 Am. Dec. 675; Gibert v. Colt, 1 Hopk. Ch. 496; Russel v. Asby, 5 Ves. Jr. 96; Atkinson v. Leonard, 3 Bro. Ch. 218; McNamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige, 239, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 189; Gleason v. Bisby, 1 Clarke, Ch. 555. See Haberstro v. Bedford, 43 Hun, 204.

Defendant may be relieved from the restraint by giving a bond in double the value of the claim, under the Georgia Code, § 8223, but the court cannot impose on him conditions as the ground for relief. Bleyer v. Blum, 70 Ga. 558.

It will not be discharged on a counter affidavit of defendant denying his intention to depart. Houseworth v. Hendrickson, 27 N. J. Eq. 60.

Nor where such affidavits fail to rebut the presumption of defendant's bad faith. Myer v. Myer, 25 N. J. Eq. 23.

Although the writ be dissolved the court may nevertheless require security to abide the decree. MacDonough v. Gaynor, 18 N. J. Eq. 249.

Giving the usual security to the sheriff upon a ne exeat does not preclude defendant from applying for a discharge of the writ, and that the bond be given up and canceled. Jesup v. Hill, 7 Paige, 95, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 79; Allen v. Hyde, 2 Abb. N. C. 200.

But where defendant for his own convenience applies and gives the usual bond without reserving the right to apply to cancel it, his right to raise the question as to the propriety of holding him to bail will be deemed waived. Jesup v. Hill, 7 Paige, 95, 4 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 79.

On motion to discharge the writ it is open to defendant by affidavit to deny the allegations on which it was granted. Cowdin v. Cram, 3 Edw. Ch. 231, 6 N. Y. Ch. L. ed. 633, 1 Van Santv. 174, 415, 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 656.

A motion to set aside the writ lies where any of the essential formalities are wanting, but objection must be raised at the earliest opportunity. Harrie v. Hardy, 3 Hill, 393; Miller v. Miller, 1 N. J. Eq. 336.

Where there is an adequate remedy at law, the writ will be dissolved. Hawthorn v. Kelly, 30 Ga. 965.

A defect or informality cannot be availed of by either of the obligors to defeat an action upon the bond. Hazard v. Griswold, 21 Fed. Rep. 181; Petition of Griswold, 13 R. L. 125.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

LOUISVILLE UNDERWRITERS, Appts., v.Albert O. DURLAND et al.

1. The violation by the insured of warranties or exceptions to the insurer's liability which are contained in the policy need not be negated in the complaint in a suit on a marine insurance policy. If the loss is within a warranty or an exception, it is a matter of defense to be set up affirmatively by defendant.
2. Where the insurer of a vessel assumes by express covenant all risk of damages thereto by fires, with the one exception of those caused by explosion of boilers, a subsequent clause in the policy in which the insured warrants in general terms that the insurer shall be free from any claims for loss or damage occasioned, inter alia, "by the collapsing of flues" will not relieve the insurer from liability for loss by fire occasioned by the collapsing of a flue.
3. Where the defendant in a suit on an insurance policy sets up a special defense, and offers evidence to support it after plaintiff has shown his loss and the cause that occasioned it and rested, plaintiff may rebut by offering affirmative evidence to meet that introduced in support of the special defense.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vanderburgh County in favor of plaintiffs in an action upon a policy of marine insurance issued on the steamer La Mascotte, which was wholly destroyed by fire during the life of the policy. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Iglehart & Taylor and T. D. Lincoln, for appellants:

The warranty in this case restrictive, and the plaintiff must aver and show that his loss is free from it. He must therefore allege and prove that the loss by fire was not caused by the bursting of the boiler or the collapsing of a flue, or he has shown no loss within the terms of the policy.

Craig v. U. S. Ins. Co. Pet. C. C. 410; Murgatroyd v. Crawford, 2 Yates, 428; Cory v. Burr, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 393; Powell v. Hyde, 5 El. & Bl. 610; Kleinwort v. Shepard, 1 El. & El. 458; Neilson v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. 8 Duer, 462; Cossmann v. West, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 180; Marcy v. Merchants Mut. Ins. Co. 19 La. Ann. 391.

Warranties of this character in policies of insurance are to be fully complied with, and will be fairly construed.

Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Benton, 87 Ind. 186; Nicoll v. Am. Ins. Co. 3 Wood. & M. 525; Burritt v. Saratoga Co. M. Ins. Co. 5 Hill, 193; Trench v. Chenango Co. M. Ins. Co. 7 Hill, 124; Angell, F. and L. Ins. § 142; Glendale Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Protection Ins. Co. 21 Conn. 19, 31; Witherell v. Maine Ins. Co. 49 Me. 200; State Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Arthur, 80 Pa. 330; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Mitchell, 48 Pa. 387.

Where a warranty can be called a condition

it is undoubtedly a condition precedent, and it is put in issue by the general denial.

Craig v. U. S. Ins. Co. supra; Murgatroyd v. Crawford, 2 Yates, 428; State M. F. Ins. Co. v. Arthur, supra; Horne Ins. Co. of N. Y. v. Duke, 48 Ind. 420; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Benton, 87 Ind. 187.

A warranty is to be construed fairly, like any other contract, and its proper and legitimate effect given to it.

Wood, F. Ins. pp. 127, 128; Angell, F. and L. Ins. §§ 141, 142; O'Neil v. Buffalo F. Ins. Co. 3 N. Y. 122; Wineland v. Security Ins. Co. 53 Md. 284; Foot v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 61 N. The consequences are generally so terrific where the boilers burst and permit the fire to escape and destroy the boat that the courts are not inclined to restrict the operation of clauses of the kind, and especially where they are warranties of the assured, and conditions precedent to his recovery.

United Life, F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Foote, 22 Ohio St. 340; St. John v. Am. Mut. F. & M. Ins. Co. 1 Duer, 379, 11 N. Y. 523; Strong v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 108; Marcy v. Merchants Mut. Ins. Co. 19 La. Ann. 391; Hayward v. Liverpool & L. F. Ins. Co. 7 Bosw. 389; Montgomery v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 16 B. Mon. 442; Neilson v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. 8 Duer, 461; Ros v. Columbus Ins. Co. 17 Mo. 304; Tanneret v. Merchants Mut. Ins. Co. 34 La. Ann. 249; Stanley v. Western Ins. Co. L. R. 3 Exch. 73.

The insurer undertakes, for a comparatively small premium, to guarantee the insured against loss or damage, upon the exact terms and conditions agreed on, and upon no other. The party called upon to pay in case of loss may therefore justly insist upon the fulfillment of these terms; and if the plaintiffs can now bring themselves fairly within the conditions of the policy, as they insist they can, they are entitled to recover for the loss; but if they cannot, then they must admit they cannot recover, however well-meaning and upright, and however confident in their view of the terms and conditions of the policy.

Glendale Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Protection Ins. Co. 21 Conn. 31; Little v. Eureka F. & M. Ins. Co. 38 Ohio St. 117.

The warranty which freed the defendant from damage of every character resulting from the collapse of the flue was as much a part of the policy as any other part of it, and restricted and limited the risks and perils assumed therein. There was no room for the rule that it should be construed most strongly against the insurer.

Foot v. Aetna Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 575; Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 529, 103 N. Y. 847; Shore v. Wilson, 9 Clark & F. 565; Wineland v. Security Ins. Co. 53 Md. 284; Glendale Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Protection Ins. Co. 21 Conn. 31.

Courts of last resort do not permit a palpable abuse of the order and practice of the trial courts evidently resorted to for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage of the opposite party.

Port of Clinton R. Co. v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 13 Ohio St. 544.

But for abuse of discretion, courts of last resort give full remedy.

Buskirk, Pr. pp. 847, 848; 1 Works, Pr. § 884.

The court permitted the plaintiff, against the objection of the defendant, to offer expert testimony to show that the explosion of the flue, under the circumstances, was not the explosion of the boiler. This testimony was not admissible.

Rogers, Expert Test.; Winans v. New York & E. R. Co. 62 U. S. 21 How. 88 (16 L. ed. 68); Whitaker v. Parker, 42 Iowa, 587; McFadden v. Murdock, 15 Week. Rep. 1079.

Messrs. G. V. Messies, Alexander Gilchrist and C. A. DeBruler, for appellees:

It is neither necessary nor proper for a plaintiff in his complaint to negative in express terms the breach of a warranty by the plaintiff.

Rev. Stat. § 370; May, Ins. § 156; 1 Phillips, Ins. p. 434; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Benton, 87 Ind. 136; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Kessler, 84 Ind. 315; Iglehart, Pr. and Pl. p. 583; 1 Estee, Pr. and Pl. 433; Nat. Ben. Assn. v. Grauman, 5 West. Rep. 848, 107 Ind. 238; Northwestern M. L. Ins. Co. v. Hazelett, 2 West. Rep. 690, 105 Ind. 212; Piedmont & A. Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 92 U. S. 377 (23 L. ed. 610).

The complaint need not negative prohibited acts, or that plaintiff is within the excepted risks.

May, Ins. § 597; Wood, F. Ins. pp. 824, 826; Lounsbury v. Protection Ins. Co. 8 Conn. 459; Cornell v. Le Roy, 9 Wend. 163; Hunt v. Hudson River Ins. Co. 2 Duer, 481; Troy F. Ins. Co. v. Carpenter, 4 Wis. 20.

The extent of the insurance against fires is specially defined, "except when caused by explosion of boiler." This is equivalent to saying: "We insure against all fires except when caused by explosion of boiler." If there be many things of the same class or kind, the expression of one or more of them implies the exclusion of all not expressed.

2 Parsons, Cont. 515, 516; Chitty, Cont. 90; Bacon, Abr.; 2 Rolle, Abr. 409; Rich v. Lord, 18 Pick. 825; Holmes v. Hubbard, 60 N. Y. 183; Lyman v. Clark, 9 Mass. 235; McIntyre v. Williamson, 1 Edw. Ch. 34; Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Winchell, 5 West. Rep. 824, 107 Ind. 260; Burns v. Singer Mfg. Co. 87 Ind. 541; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hazelett, 2 West. Rep. 690, 105 Ind. 216.

In the case at bar the liability of the insurer for fires is made the subject of a single clause, complete in itself and relating to fire alone. It cannot be held that the general provisions in another part of the policy, relating generally to a number of risks, can apply to fire.

Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wiler, 100 Ind. 92; Boatman's F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Parker, 23 Ohio St. 85; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 64 Ill. 265; Herrman v. Merchants Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 184; Buchanan v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 26; Bowman v. Pacific Ins. Co. 27 Mo. 152. See also Western Ins. Co. v. Cropper, 32 Pa. 851.

If it is to be held that fire, as one of the consequences of a collapse of the flue, is to be excepted from the risk, then the two provisions would be necessarily repugnant to each other; and if there are two repugnant clauses in a policy, the one most favorable to the insured is controlling.

Whitmarsh v. Conway F. Ins. Co. 16 Gray, 859; Citizens Ins. Co. v. McLaughlin, 53 Pa. 485; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. DeGraff, 12 Mich. 124; Steinbach v. La Fayette F. Ins. Co. 54 N. Y. 90; Barnum v. Merchants F. Ins. Co. 97 N. Y. 188; Harper v. Albany Mut. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 194; Allen v. St. Louis Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 473.

See also, as to construction of this policy, Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co. 3 L. R. A. 443, 112 N. Y. 472; Clapp v. Massachusetts Ben. Assn. 6 New Eng. Rep. 103, 146 Mass. 519.

If an insurance company does not mean to take all the risks of the perils insured against, it should declare its intention in language which does not admit of controversy.

Phenix Ins. Co. v. Slaughter, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 404 (20 L. ed. 444).

Of two possible constructions of the application the one most favorable to the assured is to be preferred.

Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wiler, 100 Ind. 92; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hazelett, 2 West. Rep. 690, 105 Ind. 212.

Especially is this the case as to all exceptions and reservations in the policy.

Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 456 (17 L. ed. 505).

This construction obtains equally in case of a policy of marine insurance as of any other. Allen v. St. Louis Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 473; Palmer v. Warren Ins. Co. 1 Story, 330.

Berkshire, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action upon a marine insurance policy. There was a trial below and a judgment rendered for the appellees.

The appellants assign two errors in this court: 1. The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. 2. The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

We find no objection to the complaint. By the terms of the policy the appellants were liable for any loss occasioned to the steamer by fire, except when caused by explosion of boiler, and except as limited by certain warranties contained in the policy.

The complaint alleges that the loss was caused by fire which was not caused by the explosion of any boiler, and alleges generally that the appellees had performed all the conditions of the contract on their part.

Appellants contend that the complaint is bad because it fails to allege in specific terms that the loss did not occur because of the breach of some one or more of the warranties contained in the policy.

Among other things covered by the warranties of the appellees is loss occasioned by the bursting of boilers, by the collapsing of flues. Perhaps we would better set out this portion of the policy, so far as material to the question under consideration:

"Warranted by the assured that this Company shall be free from all claims for loss or damage arising from or caused by theft, bartrary, robbery, civil commotion, war or piracy, or during any time said vessel shall be seized and taken possession of or detained by any act of the United States Government, or other legally excluded causes, by damage that may be done by the vessel hereby insured to any other vessel or property, from any loss or damage occasioned by said vessel being improperly laden, by the bursting of boilers, by the collapsing of flues, by the explosion of gunpowder, by the derangement or breaking of the engine or machinery, or from consequences of any character resulting from either of the foregoing exceptions, unless the same be caused by unavoidable external violence."

We have the following Statute (§ 370, Rev. Stat. 1881): "In pleading the performance of a condition precedent in a contract, it shall be sufficient to allege generally that the party performed all the conditions of the contract on his part. If the allegation be denied, the facts showing a performance must be proved on the trial."

If the clauses, "by the bursting of boilers, by the collapsing of flues," are conditions precedent, then the foregoing Statute rendered it unnecessary for the appellees to allege in their complaint specifically the performance of those conditions. Fairbanks v. Meyers, 98 Ind. 92; Purdue v. Noffsinger, 15 Ind. 886.

This Statute applies to insurance policies the same as other contracts. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Keeler, 84 Ind. 315; American Ins. Co. v. Leonard, 80 Ind. 272; Home Ins. Co. of N. Y. v. Duke, 43 Ind. 418; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pickel, 119 Ind. 155.

If they amount to warranties, or are exceptions (and they are given both names by the appellants), it was not necessary that their violation be negated in the complaint. It is not required of the plaintiff in an action on an insurance policy, that he in his complaint negative warranties and exceptions stated in the policy. If the loss is within a warranty or exception, it is matter of defense which must be pleaded affirmatively by the defendant. Nat. Ben. Assn. v. Grauman, 5 West. Rep. 848, 107 Ind. 288; Piedmont & A. Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 92 U. S. 377 (23 L. ed. 610); John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Daly, 65 Ind. 6; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hazlett, 2 West. Rep. 690, 105 Ind. 212; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pickel, supra; May, Ins. § 188.

In coming to a conclusion upon many of the questions involved, it becomes necessary that we construe the policy. By its terms and conditions the appellants assumed in express terms all unavoidable dangers of the waters which the vessel was to navigate, and of fires, with one stipulated exception, which was exemption from fires caused by the explosion of boilers. Further on in the instrument the appellees obligated themselves in general terms in the nature of warranties, which it is claimed modified the express covenants of the appellants.

The covenant of the appellants being an express covenant against loss occasioned by fire, except as therein limited, the question is presented: Did not the appellants thereby become bound to the appellees for all losses caused by fire while they were running and operating the said steamer upon said waters, except fires caused by the explosion of boilers? We are inclined to the opinion that the appellants were so bound. The covenants of the warranty were general in their character, while the covenants of the appellants, and especially as to loss occasioned by fire, were express and specific.

And again, the warranties are covenants on the part of the appellees and form no part of the covenants of the appellants. The most that can be claimed for them is that, for any loss coming within their terms, they operate to release and discharge the appellants from the responsibility to which its covenants bound it.

Policies of insurance, like other contracts, are to be reasonably construed. The contract of insurance should be liberally construed to effectuate its purpose. The language of the policy and of the interrogatories and provisions of the application is carefully and deliberately pre-arranged by the insurer; in its preparation the insured has no part. Whatever there may be in the language so prepared by the insurer which has any tendency to defeat the main purpose of the contract should be strictly construed against the insurer. If there be any ambiguity in an interrogatory propounded to the applicant, or it be capable of more than one answer, it should be construed most strongly against the insurer and most favorably to the insured, in whose favor all doubt should be resolved. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pickel, supra; Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wiler, 100 Ind. 92; Boatman's F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Parker, 23 Ohio St. 85.

We quote the following, which seems to be in point, from Wood on Fire Insurance, p. 259: "The court further laid down the rule that it is the duty of an insurance company seeking to limit the operation of its contract of insurance by special provisions or exceptions, to make such limitations in clear terms, and not leave the insured in a condition to be misled. The insured may reasonably be held entitled to rely on a construction favorable to himself, where the terms will rationally permit it."

It is also a well-settled rule or canon of construction applicable to all contracts, that such construction will be applied as will give force and effect to all parts of the contract, if it can be done without doing violence to the language employed and the evident intention of the parties; and especially will this be done if such a construction will carry into effect the evident intention of the parties.

When appellants undertook to stipulate, and did stipulate in that part of the policy in question to which the appellees could only look for a recovery in case of loss, as to the limitation which should relieve the appellants from responsibility in case of loss by fire, it is fair to presume that they intended thereby to fix the exact and entire liability of the appellants; if not, the inquiry arises, Why were not all of the limitations and exceptions then stated? Why were further modifications left to the warranties exacted? We can imagine no sufficient reason, and are of the opinion, as stated in the language quoted from Wood, supra, that the appellees "may reasonably be held entitled to rely on a construction favorable to himself (themselves) where the terms will rationally permit it."

The evident intention of the parties was that the appellants should be bound for all losses occasioned by fire, except from explosion of boilers, while the steamer was under the control of the appellees and being navigated upon the waters named in the policy. At least, it is our opinion that the appellees were entitled to so understand and construe the policy, and that the warranties relied upon referred to other casualties than loss by fire.

The bursting of a boiler and the explosion of a boiler are one and the same thing; therefore that part of the warranty quoted which refers to the bursting of a boiler is immaterial. But the collapsing of a flue is not the explosion or the bursting of a boiler. The flue is inside of and forms a part of the boiler, if a flue boiler, but it is not the boiler proper, and may collapse and the boiler proper remain intact. But the collapsing of a flue is not the explosion of a flue. Webster defines "collapse" thus: "To fall together suddenly, as the two sides of a hollow vessel; to close by falling or shrinking together; to shrink up, as a tube in a steam boiler collapses." He defines "explosion" as follows: "The act of exploding; bursting with a loud noise or detonating sound; a sudden inflaming with force and a loud report, as the explosion of gunpowder." "The shattering of a boiler by a sudden and immense pressure in distinction from rupture."

The Century Dictionary, a recent and valuable lexicon of the English language, defines "collapse" thus: "To fall together or into an irregular mass or flattened form through the loss of firm connection or rigidity and support of the parts, or loss of the contents, as a building through the falling in of its sides or an inflated bladder from escape of the air contained in it." It defines "explosion" as follows: "A sudden bursting or breaking up or in pieces from an internal or other force; a blowing up or tearing apart, as the explosion of a steam boiler."

From these definitions it will be seen that these words have almost an opposite meaning.

When the parties have put a construction upon the language employed in the contract for themselves, the court should not disregard that construction. The difference between the collapse of a flue and the explosion of a boiler is fully recognized in the policy. All parties agree that the bursting of a boiler and the explosion of a boiler are one and the same thing.

The quotation heretofore made from the warranties in the policy, and which is an important consideration in the determination of the questions involved, we will set out again:

"By the bursting of boilers, by the collapsing of flues." With the comma between the word "boilers" and the word "by" which follows the bursting of a boiler and the collapsing of a flue are named and recognized as independent and distinct things, as much so as is "the explosion of gunpowder," which immediately follows, with a comma between, independent and distinct from the collapsing of a flue. Burns v. Singer Mfg. Co. 87 Ind. 541; Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Winchell, 5 West. Rep. 824, 107 Ind. 280; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hazelett, Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wiler and Boatman's F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Parker, supra; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 64 Ill. 265; Rich v. Lord, 18 Pick. 325; Lyman v. Clark, 9 Mass. 285.

Putting the construction upon the policy which we have given to it, the court did not err in refusing to give to the jury the instructions asked for by the appellants; and while we are inclined to think that the evidence of experienced steamboatmen was competent as to whether or not the collapsing of a flue was the explosion of a boiler, if the question was one about which there might be reasonable ground for controversy, we do not decide anything upon the subject of expert testimony, as the ruling of the court did not prejudice the appellants.

But the jury found that the fire which occasioned the loss did not occur from the explosion of a boiler or the collapsing of a flue.

Adopting the appellants' construction of the policy, and we are not prepared to say that the findings of the jury in answer to the interrogatories propounded to them, as well as their general verdict, are not supported by evidence; and if so, the construction given by the appellant to the policy, if adopted, would not reverse the case, in view of the well-settled rule of this court not to disturb the verdict of a jury where there is evidence to support it, though in the opinion of the court the preponderance of evidence is against the verdict.

Construing the policy as we do, the verdict of the jury is supported by abundant evidence, for if the fire emanated from any misfortune happening to the boiler, that misfortune was the collapse of a flue and not the explosion of a boiler.

We do not think there is anything in the point that the court treated the appellants unfairly during the course of the trial.

It was sufficient for the appellees to show the loss and the cause that occasioned it, and if the appellants claimed otherwise and desired to bring the case within the special defenses which they had pleaded, after the introduction of the evidence on their part, the appellees were entitled to rebut, and to introduce affirmative evidence to meet the evidence introduced in support of the answers.

We may also say that the introduction of evidence, even out of its order, is a matter very largely in the discretion of the court, and in such a case, before the court will interfere, there must be an abuse of discretion shown.

We find no error in the record for which the judgment ought to be reversed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

GILKESON-SLOSS COMMISSION CO.,
Appt.,Jesse E. LONDON et al., S. W. Frye, Interpleader.

(....Ark.....)

1. The delivery by an assignor for benefit of creditors to his assignee of the deed of assignment and of the key to his storehouse, and the failure of the assignor to go near, or exercise any control over, the assigned goods thereafter, is a delivery of the possession thereof within the meaning of that term as used in § 305, Manaf. Dig.
2. Such delivery of possession before the assignee has filed an inventory and executed a bond will avoid the assignment, although made in accordance with a parol agreement between the parties entered into contemporaneously with the execution of the deed of assignment, which is valid on its face, that it was for the purpose of enabling the assignee to prepare an inventory.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

London Bros., a firm composed of Jesse and John London, were engaged in the mercantile business at Alma and Rudy, in Crawford County, in this State. On the 24th of November, 1887, they assigned to S. W. Frye all their notes, accounts and other evidences of indebtedness, and all their goods, wares, merchandise and fixtures of every kind at Alma and Rudy, for the benefit of their creditors. Thereupon the Gilkeson-Sloss Commission Company commenced an action against the assignors, and sued out an order of attachment and caused the sheriff to execute the same by levying on the property assigned. The ground of the attachment was, the defendants had fraudulently disposed of their property, the fraud relied on being the making of the assignment. They made no defense to the action, but controverted the ground of the attachment. Frye filed a complaint and claimed the property attached under the assignment. The attachment was discharged, and the claim of Frye was sustained, and plaintiff appealed.

The deed of assignment was valid on its face. It did not authorize the assignee to take possession before the filing of an inventory and the execution and approval of his bond, as required by law. But evidence was adduced on the trial tending to prove that the assignors, contemporaneously with the execution of the deed, agreed to deliver to the assignee the keys to the storehouses containing the property assigned for the purpose of enabling him to make his inventory; that, pursuant to this agreement, the deed of assignment and one of the keys to the Alma store were delivered to the assignee at the same time, and, within a very short time thereafter, the only key to the Rudy store; that Jesse London retained the only other key to the Alma store; and that he admitted that he did not go near the store or exercise any control over the property after the delivery of the deed. Upon this evidence the appellant asked an instruction in the following words: "The court instructs the jury that under the law the assignee is entitled to access to the property assigned for the purpose of making an inventory and bond; but he is not entitled to possession until he has filed his inventory and bond in the clerk's office. If upon the face of a deed of assignment the assignor directs or authorizes the assignee to take possession of the property assigned before he has filed his inventory and bond, this renders the deed fraudulent and void as to creditors. And if the assignee or his agent, before the filing of the bond and inventory, by direction or with the consent of the assignors, in consummation of an agreement, oral or written, extraneous to the deed, takes the keys of the storehouse and thus has possession of the property assigned, it renders the deed fraudulent and void as to creditors, just as though such agreement was set forth in the face of the deed."

And the court refused to give it, but gave the following: "The court instructs you that, under the law, the assignee is entitled to access to the property assigned for the purpose of making an inventory and bond; but he is not entitled to possession until he has filed his inventory and bond in the clerk's office. If,

NOTE.—Assignment for benefit of creditors; statute of Arkansas construed.

The statute of Arkansas provides that before the assignee shall be entitled to the possession and control of the assigned property, he shall file a full and complete inventory and execute a bond to the State conditioned for a faithful performance of his duties according to law. Ark. Stat. 1884, chap. 8, § 305.

Title to the assigned property vests in the assignee upon execution and delivery of the deed, and cannot be defeated by an execution against the assignor coming to the hands of the officer—after such delivery and before filing of the schedule and bond. Clayton v. Johnson, 36 Ark. 400.

While it entitles him to "access" to the property for the purpose of making the inventory, it does not entitle him to the possession and control of the property until he gives bond and files the inventory. Ibid.

upon the face of the deed of assignment, the assignors direct or authorize the assignee to take possession of the property assigned before he has filed his inventory and bond, this would render the deed fraudulent and void as to creditors. And if the assignors, or their agents, by their direction, or with their consent, in consummation of an agreement, oral or written, extraneous to the deed and made at or before the execution of the deed, agree to put the assignee in possession of the property assigned before the making and filing of the inventory and bond, as provided by law, and such assignee was put in possession of the property before the filing of the bond, this would render the deed fraudulent and void as to creditors. And if you find from the evidence that a key or keys to the storehouse, or houses, were delivered to the assignee at the time of the delivery of the deed, or afterwards, in consummation of a contemporaneous agreement, together with the possession of the property, this would render the deed fraudulent and void. But, if the key or keys were delivered to the assignee for the purpose only of giving access to the goods to enable him to make an inventory, the assignors retaining to themselves the possession and control of the assigned property, this would not render the deed void."

By "access," as used in the instruction, is meant "liberty to approach and inspect the property." By "possession" is meant, "that condition under which one can exercise his power over property at his pleasure to the exclusion of all others."

Under this state of facts arises the question, Did the agreement and the delivery of the keys avoid the deed? Section 805 of Mansfield's Digest provides: "In all cases in which any person shall make an assignment of any property, whether real, personal, mixed or choses in action, for the payment of debts, before the assignee thereof shall be entitled to take possession, sell or in any way manage or control any property so assigned, he shall be required to file in the office of the clerk of the court exercising equity jurisdiction a full and complete inventory and description of such property, and also make and execute a bond to the State of Arkansas in double the estimated value of the property in said assignment, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the clerk of said court, conditioned that such assignee shall execute the trust confided to him, sell the property to the best advantage and pay the proceeds thereof to the creditors mentioned in said assignment according to the terms thereof, and faithfully perform the duties according to law."

The intention of this Statute is manifest. Before the assignee can lawfully take possession of the property assigned he must file an inventory of the property conveyed to him and execute a bond, with good and sufficient sureties, to faithfully perform his duties. The object of this provision is the protection of creditors and the prevention of fraud. The inventory is to show the property assigned and the bond to secure all parties concerned against loss on account of the failure of the assignee to perform his duties, and both are required to be filed before the assignee can lawfully have an opportunity to make a fraudulent disposition of the property. Until they are filed it is the duty of the assignors to retain possession and control and take care of and protect the property. The delivery of possession to the assignee for any purpose, prior to the time fixed by law, which would enable him to do what the Statute intended to prevent, would be clearly unlawful. The purpose can avail nothing if the possession given afforded the assignee the opportunity to commit the frauds that the Statute intended to prevent by requiring the bond and inventory to be first filed. If the evidence adduced, as stated, be true, possession was delivered to the assignee in this case in violation of the Statute. Bartlett v. Teah, 1 McCrary, 176, 179.

But the question recurs: Did the agreement and the delivery of the keys in pursuance thereof avoid the assignment? This court has repeatedly held that provisions in a deed, which were in contravention of the Statute, rendered the deed void.

In Teah v. Roth, 89 Ark. 66, an attachment was sued out on the ground that the defendant had fraudulently disposed of her property, the fraud relied on being the making of an assignment for the benefit of creditors. In speaking of the deed of assignment in that case the court said: "The deed empowered the assignees to retail the goods privately for twelve months, and then to sell the remainder by public auction. This is in contravention of our Statute of Assignments, which directs a public sale within one hundred and twenty days after the assignee takes upon himself the execution of the trusts of the assignment. And the legal effect is to avoid the deed, as against non-assenting creditors;" and the court held the assignment fraudulent. See Raleigh v. Griffith, 87 Ark. 150; Rice v. Frayser, 24 Fed. Rep. 460.

In Aaronson v. Deutsch, 24 Fed. Rep. 465, the question under consideration was presented and decided. The court said: "It was the understanding of the parties to the deed that possession of the assigned property should be delivered to the assignee upon the execution and delivery of the deed, and before the assignee had qualified by giving bond and filing an inventory. Accordingly, immediately after the execution of the deed the assignor put the assignee in possession of the property. The key to the storehouse containing the property, and the property itself, was delivered to the assignee; the assignor withdrew from the place and abandoned all watch or care over the property, leaving the assignee to exercise absolute and unrestricted dominion over it. The assignee had not given bond and filed the inventory up to the time the goods were attached. The contention of the learned counsel for the defendant is that, because this illegal understanding and actions of the parties were not in terms provided for in the deed, the validity of the assignment is not affected thereby; and that the wrongful possession of the assignee was a matter occurring subsequent to the execution of the deed, and cannot affect its validity. The mere act of taking possession was subsequent to the execution of the deed; but it was done in pursuance of an understanding had at the time of the execution of the deed, and when that fact is shown its legal effect is the same as if the deed had provided for it. When the parties to the deed enter into an agreement to do an act in violation of the requirements of the Statute of Assignments, and that agreement finds expression in the deed, the instrument is fraudulent and void in law upon its face. When such an agreement is made, but is not disclosed on the face of the deed, it must be proved; and when it is proved, and it is also shown that the parties are carrying out their illegal purpose, the effect upon the validity of the assignment is precisely the same as if the illegal purpose had been declared on the face of the deed. . . . And a deliberate agreement, in or out of the deed, made at the time and carried into effect, to violate the Statute, is a fraud upon the Statute, and a fraud upon the legal rights of creditors, which the law will redress by removing the fraudulent barrier to the assertion of their legal rights against their debtor." Wheabee v. Stewart, 40 Md. 414, 424.

Upon the evidence adduced the instructions asked for by appellant should have been given. For reasons indicated the instruction given was erroneous and misleading.

Other questions are presented for our consideration, but we do not deem it necessary to decide them.

A PPEAL by intervenors from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Crawford County in favor of plaintiffs upon a petition by intervenors filed in plaintiffs' attachment suit, seeking to have plaintiffs' lien declared to be subsequent to liens held by intervenors. Reversed.

Deere, Mansur & Co. held certain promissory notes made by Reynolds Bros. upon which one William Reynolds was surety.

William Reynolds' attorneys brought suit upon the notes on June 14, 1888, in the names of Deere, Mansur & Co., and sued out a writ of attachment. They thereupon notified Deere, Mansur & Co. of their action and the same was subsequently ratified.

On the same day that suit was commenced the Carruth-Byrnes Hardware Co. and other creditors commenced suits against Reynolds Bros. and sued out writs of attachment thereon.

All the parties subsequently obtained judgments, and the Hardware Company and other creditors filed petitions in the cause of Deere, Mansur & Co. v. Reynolds Bros. asking to intervene, and that Deere, Mansur & Co.'s claim be deferred and declared subsequent to them, on the following among other grounds: (1) that the suit was instituted without authority; (2) that the attachment was collusively obtained.

vening rights of third persons cannot be defeated by the ratification. In other words, it is essential that the party ratifying should be able, not merely to do the act ratified at the time the act was done, but also at the time the ratification was made. Cook v. Tullis, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 332 (21 L. ed. 933).

The civil-law maxim, omnis ratihabito retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur, has been adopted by the common law, recognizing as a qualification, however, that the thing done and which is ratified must have been done in a representative character, and not in the name of the unauthorized person as principal; and also that such a ratification has no effect upon the rights of third persons acquired between the time of the unauthorized act and the ratification of the act. There must be some mutuality between the ratifying principal and the third party who is to be affected by his ratification, else the ratification will not have a retrospective effect as against the interests of such third party. *Johnson v. The court held, inter alia, that William Reynolds, being surety on the notes due Deere, Mansur & Co., had a right to institute the suit without authority from them, and that the subsequent ratification dated back to the time of filing the complaint and affidavit for attachment; that the evidence did not show such fraud and collusion as would render the lien void as to subsequent attaching creditors; and rendered judgment against intervenors, and they appealed to this court.

The affidavit, not having been made by one who was the agent or attorney of Deere, Mansur & Co., was no affidavit. There being no statutory affidavit, no lien was created thereby.

The ratification by the principal of the act of an unauthorized agent does not relate back to the time of the original act so as to give the principal priority of lien over subsequent lienors.

Messrs. J. E. Joiner and Cohn & Cohn, for appellees:

The presumption is that the agent had authority to make the affidavit for attachment.

The surety could have brought the suit on the chancery side of the court to compel payment, without regard to any statute, and upon general principles of equity.

Assuming that the attachment sued out in the name of the appellees was not vitiated by fraud or collusion, we must decide (1) if it was their attachment, and if so (2) When was the lien fixed in their favor?

The right of attachment is incident to a civil action and dependent upon it. Mansf. Dig. § 809.

An action is a formal demand of one's rights from another person in a court of justice.

The plaintiff may bring an action either directly, in person, or indirectly, through an agent, but his assent in one way or the other is essential, and unless his mind does thus enter into it, it is not his action. Section 6396, Mansfield's Digest, authorizes a surety to bring an action against his principal to obtain indemnity against the debt or liability for which he is bound, but it does not authorize him to sue in the creditor's name. The surety failed to do what he might have done, and did what he had no authority to do.

In Jones v. Moody, 59 Miss. 327, a junior attaching creditor sought by bill in chancery to vacate a senior attachment on the grounds that it was founded on no debt and was a fraud. The attachment assailed was in favor of a party who had owned the note sued on, but assigned it as collateral; the court held that although not the proper party to sue, he had an interest in the note and that the attachment in his favor was not a fraud. It did not hold that he could sue for his assignee without authority. The attorneys who filed the complaint were not authorized to collect the debt for Deere, Mansur & Co., or in any way to act for them; in fact it is not contended that there was any authority of any kind to institute the action in their favor, and it follows that it was not in fact their action. But they were notified of its institution by the attorneys who had assumed to act for them and expressly ratified the unauthorized act.

That a party may adopt a suit brought in his name without his consent was ruled in the case of Craig v. Twomey, 14 Gray, 486, and seems to follow from the general rules applicable to the relation of principal and agent. Of this we entertain no doubt, but the difficulty arises in considering the effect of the ratification in this case.

The appellees contend that "every ratification of an act already done has a retrospective effect, and is equal to a previous request to do it." This is a rule applicable to the subject, and, if given in this case the broad meaning it conveys, the effect is to give to every act done in this action, including the attachment proceeding, the same effect as if they had been originally authorized.

But the rule has its exceptions as well recognized and as generally approved as the rule itself. Without attempting to indicate to what extent the rule applies or to specify the exceptions that are recognized, we hold that where, prior to the ratification, third persons have in good faith acquired substantial rights or have been placed in such position in reference to the transaction that they will be prejudiced by such retroactive effect, the ratification will not be allowed to cut out or prejudice those rights. The benefit of this exception has been extended to protect the rights of intervening purchasers and lienors, by attachment or otherwise. Mechem, Ag. § 168; Wharton, Ag. § 78; Wood v. McCain, 7 Ala. 800; Taylor v. Robinson, 14 Cal. 396; Johnson v. Johnson, 81 Fed. Rep. 700.

Mr. Wharton, by way of illustrating the rule and its exceptions, puts a state of case as an exception which is a counterpart of the case at bar.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Baird v. Williams, 19 Pick. 381, which involved the same questions upon the same fact, said: "If it be argued that the subsequent assent of the creditors relates back to the making of the note, and makes the transaction valid ab initio, the plaintiffs are met by the well-known rule, that this principle of relation, equitable in itself between the parties, is not to be construed as overreaching mesne liens and rights accrued to others before the consent and ratification."

It may be that there are certain kinds of acts done for another without authority, so manifestly for his benefit that all parties dealing in relation to the matter would be held to know, and the law would presume, their ratification. Be that as it may, no such presumption exists as to attachments and their incident liabilities.

As the intervenors had acquired their liens before the appellees had adopted this action, it follows that the lien of the latter became fixed as against the former at the time of the ratification, and is subsequent to theirs.

The appellees contend that appellants cannot question the validity of their lien, and cite to sustain them, the case of Sannoner v. Jacobson, 47 Ark. 81. The objection urged by appellants in this case did not go to the grounds of the attachment or the irregularities of the proceeding, but denies the validity of the attachment and attacks the ground-work of the lien. A prior lien would be of little value if the lienor could not assert it, but the law affords him the opportunity. Manuf. Dig. § 356.

Without considering the question of fraudulent and collusive attachments pressed by counsel for the appellants, we conclude that the record shows that their liens are prior to the lien of appellees.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the Circuit Court to render judgment in accordance with the law as herein announced.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, ex rel.
William DARROW et al., as Trustees for Harriet Ivison,

v.

Michael COLEMAN et al., Comrs. of Taxes, etc., of the City and County of New York.

(....N. Y.....)

Securities in the actual possession and control of one of three trustees, who is a nonresident, the beneficiaries also being nonresidents, are not "due or owing to persons residing within the State" so as to be subject to taxation therein although the other two trustees are residents thereof.

(January 21, 1890.)

CROSS appeals from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of the New York Special Term vacating and setting aside a certain tax assessment. Reversed.

Relators were, as trustees for Harriet Ivison, a resident of California, under the will of Henry Ivison, deceased, assessed for taxation on personal estate for 1887 in the City of New York, in the sum of $60,000.

They appeared before the tax commissioners and stated that the sum vested in them as trustees was $87,000; that the securities were kept in New Jersey by their co-trustee, who was a resident of that State and who had principal charge and management of the trust estate and securities; that $46,600 was invested in the stock of corporations liable to taxation and paying their own taxes, and $40,400 in western land mortgages.

The commissioners thereupon reduced the assessment from $60,000 to $45,000.

The relators brought certiorari proceedings to review the assessment and the Special Term decided that it should be stricken from the roll. The General Term reversed this judgment, but reduced and modified the assessment by deducting $4,600 as an over-valuation, and $18,466.67, representing one third of the valuation of the estate, which the General Term decided was not assessable in New York for the reason that one of the trustees resided in New Jersey.

The relators appeal from that part of the order which affirms the original assessment as reduced and modified.

The commissioners appeal from that part of the order which provides for a reduction of the one third of the valuation of the estate.

Messrs. Brownell & Lathrop, for relators:

Prior to the Act of 1883, chap. 392, p. 568, no tax could have been assessed upon any of the trustees in respect to the mortgages upon property in Illinois and Iowa.

People v. Comrs. of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 223; People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 576; People v. Gardner, 51 Barb. 352; People v. Comrs. of Taxes, 4 Hun, 595, 62 N. Y. 630; Graham v. Norfolk First Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 393; Lord v. Arnold, 18 Barb. 104; Boardman v. Tompkins Co. Supra, 85 N. Y. 359.

The Statute of 1883 does not authorize any taxation of them because they are not within its terms. This Statute is to be strictly construed; taxation is not to be extended or authorized by construction. Nor should the court stretch the Statute as the Tax Commissioners and prevailing opinion at general term have done.

Strauss v. Coleman, 44 Hun, 20; People v. Comrs. of Taxes, 17 Hun, 293.

The two trustees taxed have no means of indemnifying themselves against the tax. The property is not in their possession nor under their control and so not taxable to them.

People v. Coleman, 42 Hun, 581; People v. Comrs. of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 224.

The Act does not include under the term "owners" or "owner," executors, trustees and agents. It requires a stretch of judicial construction to insert in the Statute the word "trustee."

People v. Coleman, supra; Perry, Trustees, §§ 411, 412.

Messrs. David J. Dean and George S. Coleman, with Mr. William H. Clark, for respondents:

The assessment against the two resident co-trustees was correct in form.

People v. Coleman, 42 Hun, 581.

The Act of 1888, chap. 892, authorized such taxation and plainly declared that the debt and not the security was the thing to be considered. The mortgagors could discharge their indebtedness only through the trustees. The trustees alone could pass title to the property—the debt (or credit) owned by the estate. In this sense, which is the practical and legal sense, the trustees did and do control the property, and it is not susceptible of and does not require physical possession.

The obvious purpose of the Act (chap. 892 of the Laws of 1888), was to make the tax fall, as it should, on the actual property—the valuable credit—whether the debtor had or had not given the resident creditor a proper paper to evidence and secure the loan, and whether or not the written instrument was within the State.

The owner of property, for the purposes of taxation, is the person having the legal title or estate thereto or therein.

The right to tax personal property held in trust “has not been rendered dependent either upon the residence of the person creating the trust, or that of the person to be benefited by the performance of it.”

People v. Albany Assessors, 40 N. Y. 160.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is substantially conceded, and it is in any event very plain, that prior to the Act (chap. 898, Laws 1888) the assessment in question could not be sustained. People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 576.

That Act provides that “all debts and obligations for the payment of money due or owing to persons residing within this State, however secured, or wherever such securities shall be held, shall be deemed, for the purposes of taxation, personal estate within the State, and shall be assessed as such to the owner or owners thereof in the town, village or ward in which such owner or owners shall reside at the time such assessment shall be made.”

This Statute was passed the year subsequent to the decision of the case of People v. Smith, supra, and the inference is not a labored one which concludes that the law was enacted to meet the decision. In that case the relator, a resident of the Village of Warsaw, in this State, was the absolute owner of the securities which the assessors had attempted to reach for the purposes of taxation, but such securities were in the possession of agents residing without the State, and by the laws of the States where the agents resided the securities were liable to be taxed in those States. It was held by this court that the relator was not liable to be assessed for such securities.

The idea that personal property follows the situs or residence of the owner, while in some cases a perfectly proper legal fiction, to be included in for purposes of justice, was held not to apply in such a case for the purpose of imposing a tax upon a security not within the State, and not protected by our laws. The case here presented is one where the persons assessed are not the absolute owners of the property, but are trustees, and have only a representative or official interest therein, and but two out of the three are residents within the State, while a third resides in another State, and also has custody and control of the property, and the beneficiaries are also non-residents. Does the Act of 1888 meet such a case? We think not. It is not a debt due and owing to persons residing within this State, for it is one which is due or owing to them in connection with another who is a joint owner, and who is not a resident within this State, and such other has the securities. The Statute means that the debt must be one which is solely due or owing to residents of this State. If the trustee residing here has possession of the securities, he can be assessed for them under the old law as a trustee in possession, even though there be other trustees nonresidents. Nor do we think that the Statute meant to include as owners persons who were trustees only, and thus assess them for property not held by them, and not within this State.

Generally, a man is not spoken of as the owner of property who merely holds it as a trustee and in a representative capacity. He has the legal title, and he is to be assessed for it when it is within the State; but this is by express provision of statute, and such provision is not mentioned in the case of a trustee whose trust property is outside of the State, and not in his possession. The contention of the counsel for the tax commissioners would render property liable to double, or even treble, or still greater taxation, if the laws of other States were like ours, and there were three or more trustees living in as many different States. The Statute, as it is, may lead to injustice in the double taxation of personal property,—once to its absolute owner in this State, and again in the hands of his agents in the shape of securities in their custody and control in other States. It is not for courts to widen the possible injustice which may be perpetrated under a Statute, by giving it a construction not only not called for by its language, but forced and unnatural under the circumstances. It is unnecessary to go over the argument arising from an examination of the whole law of assessment for the purpose of showing that the construction adopted by us is the correct one. We think it plainly appears that the construction adopted by the learned general term may lead to such a perversion of justice that no court ought to adopt it unless constrained by the plainest language of the statute. We are of the opinion that such is not the language of this one. This case is a good illustration of the inequitable consequences arising from the construction of the court below. The real, acting trustee lives in New Jersey. He has possession and control of the securities, which are bonds and mortgages upon lands in other States, and the beneficiaries are all nonresidents of this State. And yet, by the action of the Tax Commissioners, because two of the trustees are residents of this State, although they have neither possession nor control of the property, and none of it is in this State, the trust estate must pay tribute to us. We think not.

The order of the General Term should be re- versed, and that of the Special Term, setting aside and vacating the assessment, should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Earl, J., absent.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

SCHUYLKILL RIVER EAST SIDE R.
CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.

John J. KERSEY.

1. In proceedings to assess damages for the taking of property for railroad purposes, whatever injuriously affects the owner's adjoining property as the direct and necessary result of the location of the road may be considered by the jury in making their assessment.
2. Where the location of a railroad across property leased as a coal yard makes necessary new appliances for the continuation of the coal business and increases the cost of raising and storing the coal as well as the breakage and waste in handling it, the additional expense and loss, together with the cost of the new appliances, may properly be received in evidence in a proceeding by the lessee to recover damages for such location, not as specific items of claim, but as affecting the market value of the leasehold.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, of Philadelphia County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to recover damages for the taking by defendant for railroad purposes of a portion of property in which he had a leasehold interest. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Thad. L. Vanderslice and Lewis C. Cassidy, for plaintiff in error:

The question for the jury was, What was the value of the leasehold interest before the railroad affected it at all?

It was worth to plaintiff the same sum it was worth for sale and transfer, and the mode of ascertaining the sum is by the testimony of witnesses upon its market value.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Eby, 107 Pa. 166.

A tenant's damage is to be measured by the same rule that is applied to the owner of the fee—What was his estate worth before and after? What injury was done to his property?

Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Getz, 118 Pa. 214.

The price which, upon full consideration of the matters stated, the judgment of well-informed and reasonable men will approve, may be regarded as the market value.

Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Patterson, 107 Pa. 464.

The jurors are to value the injury to the property, without reference to the person of the

NOTE.—Compensation for land taken for railroad purposes.

In condemnation proceedings the land owner is entitled to full compensation for the land actually taken, and for such damages to the residue as are equivalent to the diminution in value, general benefits not considered. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Meeker (Neb.), 44 N. W. Rep. 79.

The damages include what is necessary to make good all that results, directly or indirectly, to the injury of the owners in the whole premises and interests affected, and not merely the strip taken. Grand Rapids, L. & D. R. Co. v. Cheesbro (Mich.), 42 N. W. Rep. 65.

In determining the question of damages, advantages and disadvantages from the appropriation are considered, and are to be estimated upon the land as a whole. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Springer (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 685.

Where the tract taken is part of a larger connected body of land, the owner may recover for the injury done to the tract as a whole, and is not restricted simply to the part described. Fayetteville & L. R. R. Co. v. Hunt, 51 Ark. 330.

The full value of land actually condemned for a railroad must be allowed as damages, although the company does not acquire the fee. Ibid.

Just compensation for land taken consists in making the owner good, by an equivalent in money, for the loss he actually sustains in the value of his property by being deprived of a portion of it. It includes, not only the value of the land taken, but also the diminution in the value of that from which it is severed. Lafin v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 415. See Each v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 72 Wis. 220.

It is proper to consider, in estimating the damages for a right of way for a railway, the manner in which the road cuts the land, the excavations and embankments, and the exposure of the property to particular injuries from the proximity of the road. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Meeker (Neb.) 44 N. W. Rep. 79.

The compensation is the difference between the value of the land as it existed before, and of the remaining portion after, the construction of the railroad. Re Scott, 6 Manitoba L. Rep. 193.

It is the difference between its value before and after the construction of the road, without taking into consideration any of the benefits to be derived from the railroad. Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 104; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Springer (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 685; Hartman v. Reading & P. R. Co. (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 447; Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. v. Bowman, 11 West. Rep. 593, 123 Ill. 595; Concordia Cem. Asso. v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 10 West. Rep. 573, 121 Ill. 199.

In determining the damages to a farm, caused by the construction of a railroad, it is proper to take into consideration every element of damage that might be reasonably anticipated before the road is built, and what really does exist and is apparent after the road is constructed. This includes the inconvenience of crossing, the raising of embankments, the digging of ditches, pools of stagnant water, and the obstruction to surface water by throwing it into the channels or by damming it up. Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Kuhn, supra; Weyer v. Chicago, W. & N. R. Co. 63 Wis. 180. See, generally, San Diego L. & T. Co. v. Neale, 3 L. R. A. 83, 78 Cal. 63.

owner, or the actual state of his business; and in doing that the only safe rule is to inquire, What would the property unaffected by the obstruction have sold for at the time the injury was committed? What would it have sold for as affected by the injury? The difference is the true measure of compensation.

Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Thoburn, 7 Serg. & R. 411.

Plaintiff should not have been permitted to prove his loss by breakage of coal, or the increased cost of handling it to the end of his term, as specific items of damage.

Mr. Joseph L. Caven, for defendant in error:

If by reason of the taking of the property, or its destruction, the plaintiff was specially injured, he is entitled to compensation for such injury.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Eby, 107 Pa. 106; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Getz, 113 Pa. 214.

The plaintiff's damages will be the value to him of the leasehold for the uses to which he is to devote it, viz., a coal wharf and yard.

Plaintiff must be allowed the reasonable and necessary expense for putting his property in the same condition as it was before.

Price v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 27 Wis. 98; Chase v. Worcester, 108 Mass. 60; Walter v. Post, 4 Abb. Pr. 382.

Evidence to show the increased cost of storing and handling coal, and the increased breakage and wastage to the end of the term, necessarily resulting from these new appliances, was admissible.

McCullum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

No complaint is made by the defendant Company of the instructions to the jury on the question of damages, and our inquiry is limited to alleged error in the admission of evidence.

The plaintiff was the lessee of a wharf property on the Schuylkill River in Philadelphia, extending from the river to Twenty-Fourth Street. It was leased to him as a coal wharf and yard. Upon it he carried on the business of receiving, storing and delivering coal for other parties, and of receiving, storing and selling coal and sand on his own account. The appliances used in the business and necessary to carry it on belonged to him.

In January, 1886, the defendant Company entered, and located its road upon the demised premises, appropriating for that purpose a strip of land sixty feet in width, and dividing the property into two parts. The sheds, runs and other appliances indispensable to the business for which the property was leased were partially destroyed by this addition of the Company, and the construction of new ones adapted to the changed condition became necessary in order to continue the business. A bridge with a single span of sixty-eight feet and an elevation of twenty-one feet above the railroad tracks, and a derrick, sheds and runs of a corresponding height were required. The Company recognized the necessity for these appliances as the direct consequence of the location of its railroad, and admits that it promised the plaintiff to construct them, but excuses its non-performance on the ground that it could not agree with him as to the details of the work. In other words, the plaintiff wanted better structures than the Company was willing to build, or considered necessary, in view of the probable duration of his leasehold. It was contemplated by the parties that the business should be continued by the plaintiff, and that he should have as far as practicable the same facilities for carrying it on that he had before enjoyed. It was the only business which his lease allowed him to establish there, and if he abandoned it his leasehold was worthless, because he could not sublet or sell it without the consent of his lessor. The Company failing to provide the facilities it conceded he was entitled to and had promised he should have, he constructed such appliances as were necessary for the continuance of the business as it existed before the location of the railroad. The increased height of the structures increased the cost of raising the coal, and the breakage and waste in handling it. This additional expense and loss, together with the cost of the new appliances, he was allowed to show and prove on the trial of this issue. The Company objected to this evidence and now contends that the court erred in admitting it.

It is well settled that the proper measure of damages is the depreciation in the market value of the property, caused by the location and construction of the railroad. But the elements to be considered in the ascertainment of this depreciation are as varied as the properties affected and the uses to which they were applied. A specification of all these elements is impossible, because they cannot be anticipated, and many of them remain to be developed in the course of the litigation consequent upon the taking of property by eminent domain. In the ordinary case of the appropriation of land for railroad purposes the opinions of witnesses who are conversant with the property and the general selling price of lands in the vicinity are received on the question of its value unaffected by the road and its value as affected by it. But this is not exclusive of other, and in some cases, better, methods of proof. It may be stated as a general principle, applicable to cases of this sort, that whatever injuriously affects the property, as the direct and necessary result of the location of the road upon it, may be considered in the assessment of damages.

In this case the estate of the plaintiff was limited to a particular use. Its enjoyment in accordance with the terms of its creation required that the appliances which had been rendered useless by the entry of the defendant

Company should be reconstructed at an elevation which increased the cost of raising and storing the coal, and increased the breakage and waste in handling it. We think these matters were properly received in evidence as descriptive of the injury inflicted and the burden imposed on the property by the occupation of it for railroad purposes, and that they were for the consideration of the jury, not as specific items of claim, but as affecting market value. The specifications of error are dismissed, and

ROYAL INSURANCE CO., of Liverpool,
Pff. in Err.,
v.
Marietta HELLER.

1. An entry by a landlord to rebuild a burned building, under an agreement with the tenant that the latter shall continue to pay rent during the time of rebuilding, in consideration of the landlord's promise to grant a new lease of the improved property on more favorable terms, will relieve an insurance company of its contract to indemnify the tenant for any loss accruing to him by reason of having to pay rent for the insured building during such time as it should be untenable by reason of fire.
2. No stipulation between third persons can continue upon one an obligation from which the law relieves him.
3. An insurance company's letter stating that it could not, by reason of the landlord entering for the purpose of rebuilding, be discharged from liability on a policy insuring a tenant against liability for rent in case the leased buildings are burned, and that such defense would not be raised, will not estop the company from asserting its discharge from further liability by reason of an entry by the landlord under an agreement with the tenant to continue the payment of rent.

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, of Philadelphia County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a policy insuring plaintiff against liability to pay rent for certain leased property in case the buildings thereon were destroyed by fire. Reversed.

During the negotiations for a settlement of the rights of the parties and permission to have the buildings rebuilt, the attorney of the insurance company wrote the following letter:

M. Hampton Todd, Esq., Attorney for Mrs. Heller.

Dear Sir:—The Royal Insurance Company could not be discharged from liability on Mrs. Heller's policy, by reason of the landlord entering for the purpose of rebuilding, nor will such a defense be raised.

But they decline to be parties to any agreement that the landlord shall be permitted with their consent to rebuild, the only effect of 7 L. R. A.

which would be to prevent a suspension of the rent during the time of rebuilding. . . .

Truly yours,

Morton P. Henry,

Attorney for the Royal Insurance Company.
April 17, 1888.

The other material facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Morton P. Henry, for plaintiff in error:

Fire insurance is a contract of indemnity.

Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Fidelity Title & Trust Co. 123 Pa. 516.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case as they appear in the affidavit of defense and the plaintiff's statement are practically undisputed, and they establish a complete defense. Defendant by its policy agreed to indemnify plaintiff for "any loss accruing to her by reason of having to pay rent for the (therein) described building such time or times as the building may be untenable by reason of fire or fires occurring during the continuance of this policy." A fire occurred in January, 1888, and the landlord entered to rebuild, in July. That as a legal consequence would have suspended the payment of rent. It was a rescission pro tanto of the lease. Magaw v. Lambert, 8 Pa. 444; Hoveler v. Fleming, 91 Pa. 322.

Defendant was liable under its policy for the rent from January to July, and that amount it paid. But the plaintiff and her landlord entered into an agreement by which the former agreed to continue to pay rent during the rebuilding of the store, and in consideration thereof the latter agreed to rebuild with certain improvements and to give a new lease on more favorable terms. This agreement discharged the defendant. The payment of rent under it by plaintiff was a voluntary undertaking, not a legal obligation under the first lease, against which alone the policy undertook to indemnify her. It is set out in the pleadings that the landlord was insured as to his rent in the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company, and that that Company, asserting a right of subrogation to the landlord's claim for rent against the tenant, procured the landlord not to re-enter until the plaintiff made the agreement in question, and that by that agreement it was expressly stipulated that the rights and liabilities as to rent, and as to claims under their respective insurance policies, should not be affected. But these facts are entirely immaterial. If true, they showed a fraudulent attempt on part of the plaintiff, the landlord and the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company to shift a burden which belonged on them to the defendant. But even if there was no such fraudulent purpose, the effect of the agreement was to continue upon the defendant an obligation from which the law relieved it, and no stipulation between the other parties without its consent could accomplish such a result.

It is said that the hardship of plaintiff's situation forced her to make the agreement, and that without it the landlord would not have re-entered, and the defendant would then have been liable for an entire year's rent. Perhaps so, perhaps not. What the landlord would have done there are no means of ascertaining, but what it was his interest to do is clear enough. He might have lain by and collected his rent from plaintiff till the end of her lease, but then he would have had to lose rent while he rebuilt. Or he might have rebuilt during her lease, and looked to his insurance for indemnity while the rent was suspended by the rebuilding. It was manifestly his interest, therefore, to enter and rebuild during the running of plaintiff's lease and his own policy in the Pennsylvania Company. He had nothing to gain and something to lose by delay. The hardship in plaintiff's situation was in having an insufficient insurance. She was bound to pay rent for three years and only indemnified for one. It was her interest, therefore, to have the rebuilding done as soon as possible. The honest and proper course for all parties would have been to rebuild at the earliest convenient time. The plaintiff would then have paid rent until the rebuilding commenced, and would have been indemnified by the defendant. The rent would have been suspended during the rebuilding, and the landlord would have been indemnified by the Pennsylvania Company. No one had anything to gain by departing from this plain course except the Pennsylvania Company, which, if the scheme had succeeded, would have transferred its own proper loss to the defendant. But when the parties undertook to vary the defendant's contract liability from that which the law imposed, their action was ineffective for such purpose, and as to the defendant totally void.

Reference was made during the argument to the correspondence and a claim suggested that the present defense had been waived. But such a view is untenable. The meaning of the letter of defendant's counsel, dated April 17, 1888, is entirely clear. The defense which it says will not be raised is that defendant will be "discharged from liability by reason of the landlord entering for the purpose of rebuilding." Of course not. The fire had taken place in the preceding January, and nearly three months' rent was due at the date of the letter. From liability for this rent and such other as should accrue up to the entry of the landlord, such entry would not be a discharge, and the letter says that such a defense will not be raised. But then, to make certain that its meaning is not more than this, it goes on to say explicitly that defendant will not consent to anything which will vary the legal effect of the landlord's entry, to wit, the suspension of the rent during the rebuilding. There is here no waiver of any of defendant's rights.

On September 20, 1872, Duncan and Flanagan and others entered into a contract by which they agreed to procure and ship a cargo of beef from Galveston, Texas, to Philadelphia, on joint account. The steamer Francis Wright was chartered for the adventure. In 1874 suit was brought in New York on the charter-party by the owners of the Francis Wright and a judgment recovered in favor of plaintiffs. Flanagan paid this judgment and brought suit to recover contribution from his co-defendants.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The liability upon which the judgment in the State of New York was recovered against the plaintiff and the defendant jointly grew directly out of the original article of agreement made on September 20, 1872. The plaintiff, the defendant and several others were parties to that agreement, and in it they all agreed that the charter of the steamship Francis Wright was accepted and was "for the account and risk of all concerned in the joint venture." The owners of the Francis Wright brought the action in New York in 1874 against the plaintiff, the defendant and some of the other parties to the agreement, claiming the sum of $6,966.86 as a balance due for the charter and hire of the vessel during the joint venture mentioned in the agreement. For some unexplained reason the case seems to have slumbered for nine years and it was not until 1883 that the action was tried and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs, and against four of the defendants, including the plaintiff and defendant in the present suit. The liability upon which that action was founded, and for which the judgment was recovered, arose exclusively from the agreement of 1872. It was therefore in existence at the time Duncan's proceeding in bankruptcy was commenced and at the time of the adjudication in 1878, and the discharge in 1881. We know of no reason why that liability could not have been proved against Duncan. It was at least a claim for unliquidated damages arising out of a contract which is provided for by section 5067 of the Bankrupt Act. In the affidavit of defense it is alleged that the defendant was informed that the New York suit had been abandoned, and that nearly nine years after the suit was commenced a supplemental complaint was filed to which Flanagan made answer but never notified Duncan of it, and that he, Duncan, had no knowledge of it; and also that the suit was tried practically on the supplemental complaint and answer. The affidavit also alleges that Flanagan was represented in that suit by Benedict, Taft & Benedict, New York lawyers, who undertook to appear for all the defendants, and who were aware that Duncan had been adjudged a bankrupt, that subsequently to his discharge Flanagan and the lawyers ignored him and undertook the conduct of the case, and that it was the duty of the lawyers to have pleaded Duncan's discharge while assuming to act for him. The affidavit further charges Flanagan with having renewed the proceedings in 1883 without notice to, or knowledge by, Duncan, and without having given him an opportunity to plead his discharge.

As Flanagan now seeks to recover in this action against Duncan upon the equitable principle of contribution, it is necessary that his hands should be clean. His good faith is impugned by the facts alleged in the affidavits of defense which we must assume to be true; and as those facts tend to show that he acted in bad faith in so conducting the defense in the New York suit that a judgment was recovered against Duncan, which might have been prevented by pleading the discharge of the latter, and by giving Duncan no opportunity to plead the discharge himself, he is certainly not entitled to judgment in this action for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense.

The defendant has a right to be heard by a jury upon his allegations of fact. Whether the defendant can plead his discharge against the present claim of the plaintiff is a question which can be determined on the trial after all the facts on both sides are brought out.

ERROR to the District Court for Johnson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's agents and servants. Reversed.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

On the 31st day of May, 1887, Joel Cochran, administrator of the estate of John M. Gibson, deceased, filed his petition in the District Court of Johnson County, Kan., against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, alleging that "The said plaintiff herein complains of the said defendant herein for that, on the 30th day of May, 1887, he was duly appointed and qualified, and letters of administration of the estate of John M. Gibson, deceased, were issued to him by the Probate Court of Johnson County, State of Kansas, as the administrator of said estate. And the said plaintiff further states that the said defendant herein is now, and was at the date hereinafter first mentioned, a railroad corporation, duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas, and then owned and operated, and now owns and operates, a railroad known as the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, and as such corporation and railroad company was then, and is now, operating, and exclusively managing and controlling, the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Kansas; that the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company was then, and still is, a common carrier of passengers for hire upon its trains into and through Douglas and Johnson Counties, Kan., and that the said Southern Kansas Railroad Company, so operated, managed and controlled by the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, was then, and still is, a common carrier of passengers for hire upon its trains of cars into and through Johnson County, Kan., and then run its trains of cars over and used defendant's tracks from Kansas City, Mo., to Holliday, Kan.; and that the Town or Village of Holliday was then a regular station and depot in Johnson County, Kan., of the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, on the main line of its said railroad; and that said Town or Village of Holliday and the City of Olathe, in Johnson County, Kan., were then regular stations or depots on the line of the Southern Kansas Railroad.

"Plaintiff further states: On the 21st day of March, 1887, the plaintiff's intestate, John M. Gibson, had ridden, as a passenger on a regular passenger train of cars of the defendant Company, from Lawrence and Eudora, Kan.; to said station, Holliday, and that upon said day at Holliday, aforesaid, the said John M. Gibson, now deceased, purchased from said defendant Company's ticket agent at Holliday Depot, aforesaid, a ticket entitling him to be transported on that day, as a passenger, thence to Olathe, Kan., by and upon a regular passenger train of cars of—and then used by the defendant in the name of—the said Southern Kansas Railroad Company; and that in order for the said John M. Gibson, now deceased, to get upon said regular passenger train of cars, so then being operated, managed and controlled by said defendant Company, to be carried from Holliday to Olathe, aforesaid, it became and was necessary for the said John M. Gibson, now deceased, to walk across the interjacent railroad tracks belonging to said defendant Company, and then being used by said defendant Company and said Southern Kansas Railroad Company with their locomotive engines and passenger and freight trains of cars,—there being no other way for said decedent to get to and upon said train,—and that while the said decedent was in the act of walking across said interjacent railroad tracks, aforesaid, at the station, and upon the invitation of said defendant Company, and for the sole purpose of boarding the regular passenger train of cars of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, as aforesaid, to be carried thence to Olathe, aforesaid, upon said train of cars, which was then at rest, about two or three tracks remote from the platform of the said defendant's depot or ticket office, which said Southern Kansas train of cars did not then come to, nor did it intend to then come to, the platform of said depot, and which train was then about ready to start for Olathe, aforesaid, and there then being no regular crossing across said interjacent tracks, and no person there to warn him of danger, the said defendant Company then and there, to wit, on the 21st day of March, 1887, at Holliday, aforesaid, carelessly, grossly, negligently, wantonly and recklessly, by and through its said servants and employes then in charge of, and operating and running, one of its freight trains of cars, with a locomotive engine attached thereto and in motion, on one of said interjacent tracks of said defendant Company, permitted the locomotive so attached to said freight train of cars last aforesaid, without any warning of any character to said decedent of danger, to run against, strike, come in contact with and knock down, and drag in a violent and forcible manner, the said John M. Gibson, now deceased, without any fault, negligence or want of care on the part of the said decedent; and that by reason of said locomotive engine so striking him, and so knocking him down, and dragging him, the said decedent was greatly bruised, cut and mangled in and about his head, back, legs, arms and body, internally, and his right leg was broken, and in consequence thereof the said decedent became sick, sore and lame, and in consequence of said injuries, so received as aforesaid, he was confined to his bed, and suffered much mental and bodily pain and agony, from the said 21st day of March, 1887, until on or about the 30th day of March, 1887, when he died, intestate, at Olathe, Kan., and that said injuries, all and singular, so received by him as aforesaid, were the cause of the death of the said John M. Gibson, without any fault, negligence or want of care on the part of said decedent contributing thereto.

"Plaintiff further states that the said John M. Gibson, now deceased, left Mary E. Cochran, née Gibson, and Elizabeth J. Adams, née Gibson, his only children, him surviving, who are his only next of kin him surviving; and that by reason of the premises, all and singular, the said Mary E. Cochran and Elizabeth J. Adams, sole surviving children and sole next of kin, aforesaid, have been greatly damaged by the death of the said John M. Gibson, now deceased, in and to the amount of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, no part of which hath been paid. Plaintiff therefore, as such administrator, demands judgment against the defendant Company herein for the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, so as aforesaid sustained, with costs of suit and equitable relief."

Trial had at the September Term of the court for 1887, before the court with a jury. The court, among other things, charged the jury as follows:

"1. In this case the plaintiff charges the defendant Company as being the owner, or operator, controller and manager of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, at the time his intestate, Gibson, received his alleged injuries, and therefore I charge you that the question of liability and responsibility of the defendant Company is one of fact, to be determined by you from all the testimony in the case.

"2. In determining the liability of the defendant Company, the true test is, What company had the control, direction and management of said Southern Kansas Railroad, and of the men then operating the engines and passenger trains on said road, and especially the engine and passenger train on which the plaintiff's intestate was endeavoring to take passage, if any? And in determining these questions it is your duty to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances proven by the evidence.

"3. The fact that the officials of one railroad company are officials of another railroad company, standing alone, would not make the one responsible for the negligence or default of the other; neither would the mere fact of the one railroad owning stock or bonds of another railroad company make the former company responsible for the acts of the latter. But if you find from the evidence that the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, for all practical purposes, was, at the time alleged, managed, controlled and operated by the defendant Company, being used as an auxiliary and a part of the defendant Company's system of railroads, then and in that event the defendant Company would ordinarily be responsible for the negligence, default or miscarriage of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, its agents and employes.

"4. If in fact the defendant Company exercised and assumed the actual control of the management and operation of said Southern Kansas Railroad at the time of the alleged injuries, it would be liable for the negligence, if any, of the men in operating and managing the engines and passenger trains of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, in failing to bring its passenger trains to the platform of the depot to receive passengers, if they did so fail, even though the men were at the time engaged in the business of another railroad company, namely, the Southern Kansas Railroad Company.

"5. If the jury find that the general management of both roads is under the control of the same officials; that the boards of directors of both roads are substantially the same persons; that a majority of the said stock of said Southern Kansas Railroad Company is owned by the Kansas City, Topeka & Western Railroad Company, which latter company is leased and operated by said defendant Company for its use and benefit, and that the balance of the stock of the said Southern Kansas Railroad Company is owned by the defendant Company; that both the defendant and the Southern Kansas Company use and occupy the same line of track from Kansas City, Mo., to Holliday, Kan.; that the same person is agent and ticket seller for both companies at said station, Holliday; that the treasurer of said Southern Kansas Railroad Company is also treasurer of the defendant Company, and that the clerical work for said treasurer, pertaining to the Southern Kansas Company, is performed by the employees of the defendant Company; and that the general officers and offices of both companies are both one and the same,—you have a right to give such facts and circumstances due weight and consideration in arriving at your verdict.

"18. If you believe from the evidence that the defendant Company was managing and operating and controlling the Southern Kansas Railroad Company on March 21, 1887, and that said defendant Company caused the said Southern Kansas Railway Company's passenger train to stop at Holliday to receive passengers, on said day, to be carried for hire to Olathe, and that said defendant Company then had a depot building, and platform therewith connected, at Holliday, aforesaid, for the purpose of receiving and discharging passengers to and from its own passenger trains, and for the sale of tickets, and did then sell over said several railroads, then I charge you that it was the lawful duty of the defendant Company to provide or furnish reasonably safe and convenient approaches to their several passenger coaches owned and managed, operated and controlled, by said Company, and it was the duty of said Company to also use such approaches with care and due regard for the safety of passengers who were attempting to get upon such coaches by means of such approaches; and if, upon the said Company failing to do so, an injury ensued to such passenger, then the said Company will be held liable for injuries resulting therefrom, provided such injured person was not guilty of any fault, or want of ordinary care, or of any negligence contributing thereto.

"19. If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased, on the 21st day of March, 1887, was a passenger on the defendant Company's passenger train from Eudora to Holliday, and that on reaching Holliday the deceased immediately purchased a ticket from the defendant Company's ticket agent at Holliday entitling the deceased to be carried as a passenger on the Southern Kansas Railroad passenger train from Holliday to Olathe on said day, then managed, operated and controlled by said defendant Company, and that said deceased on said day attempted to reach the Southern Kansas passenger train, bound for Olathe, in the only way provided by the Company to reach said train, which was then in waiting on a track at Holliday for passengers to Olathe, then I charge you that the deceased was a passenger at the time, and entitled to all the rights of such.

"20. I charge you that a person who has a railroad ticket, and who is present to take the train at the ordinary or usual point of departure designated by the railroad company, is a passenger, though he has not entered the car of the particular train, and in the duties towards him directly involving his safety the company is bound to extraordinary diligence, and in these duties touching his convenience or accommodation the company is bound to ordinary diligence, and this rule of extraordinary diligence applies to the receiving of passengers.

"21. When a carrier of passengers for hire by railway does not receive passengers into the car at the platform erected for that purpose, and either directs or impliedly invites passengers to enter the car at an out-of-the-way place, or at a place remote some distance from such platform, it is the bounden duty of such company to use the utmost care in preventing injuries to passengers while so approaching to enter such car; and if you find, in this case, that the defendant Company was negligent, within the meaning of this instruction, and that the deceased was injured thereby; that the deceased did not contribute to such injury by his negligence,—then the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

"23. When the arrangement of a passenger railroad station or depot, whether permanent or temporary, is such that a passenger has to cross a track before entering, then such passenger has a lawful right to assume that such track may be crossed safely and that the company will not expose him to unnecessary danger; and, while the passenger himself must exercise reasonable care and prudence, his watchfulness may be naturally diminished by his reliance upon the discharge by the company of its duty to passengers to provide them with a safe passage to the train of cars."

The jury returned a verdict against the Railroad Company for $900, and also found, among others, the following special findings of fact:

"1. Was John M. Gibson, now deceased, carried by the defendant Company, on one of its passenger trains, as a passenger, from Eudora, Kan., to Holliday, Kan., on March 21, 1887? A. Yes.

"2. Did the deceased, on reaching Holliday, purchase a ticket from the defendant's ticket agent at Holliday entitling him to be carried on said day from Holliday to Olathe on a passenger train of the Southern Kansas Railway Company? A. Yes.

"3. Had the defendant Company the control, direction and management of the Southern Kansas Railroad, and of the men then operating the engines and passenger trains of the Southern Kansas Company, and especially the engine and passenger train upon which the deceased then intended to take passage? A. Yes. . . .

"6. Was a majority of the stock of said Southern Kansas Railroad Company then owned by the Kansas City, Topeka & Western Railroad Company? A. Yes.

"7. Was the said Kansas City, Topeka & Western Railroad Company then leased and operated by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, for its use and benefit? A. Yes.

"8. Was the balance of the stock of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company then owned by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company? A. Yes. . . .

"26. Was it negligence on the part of the defendant Company, when considered with all the other circumstances, in not bringing the said Southern Kansas train up to the platform so that passengers might get upon it at the time referred to? A. Yes.

"27. At the time the passengers, including the deceased, left the platform to cross the tracks to get upon said Southern Kansas train, did any person connected with either the defendant Company or the Southern Kansas Railroad Company forbid or warn passengers not to cross the tracks? A. No. . . .

"30. Did the deceased then leave the platform of the depot building, and attempt to cross the track intervening the platform and the Southern Kansas passenger train referred to, for the purpose of getting upon said train to be carried from Holliday to Olathe as a passenger? A. Yes."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict of the jury. The Railroad Company excepted, and brings the case here.

Messrs. George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error:

The line of railway of the Southern Kansas Railway Company as constructed connected with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad at Holliday, and therefore, this relation existing, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company cannot be held liable for the negligence or the torts committed by either the Southern Kansas Railway Company or its agents or servants.

See Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davis, 84 Kan. 209, 210.

The fact that some of the officers of the two companies are the same individuals does not alter the case at all, because these individuals necessarily act in different capacities.

From this relation, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company does not control or manage the Southern Kansas Railway, or that company.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 115 U. S. 596, 597 (29 L. ed. 501, 503).

Mr. A. Smith Devenney, for defendant in error:

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company is liable. Even if it is not as between the deceased and said Company a question of privity of contract, it is a question or matter of obligation under which the owners of the track lie to all who are induced by the Company to come there to purchase tickets for Southern Kansas Railroad Company trains, or for the transaction of business; and the Company in such case is held to the strictest care.

The first and second tracks next to the depot platform are the property of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company: it permitted the Southern Kansas Railroad Company to use them. In such case the Atchison Company is liable for the injury which grew out of the negligence of the Southern Kansas Company in using such tracks.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by Joel Cochran, administrator of John M. Gibson, deceased, against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company, to recover damages for the killing of Mr. Gibson at Holliday in this State. At the time of his death, Mr. Gibson was a widower with two married daughters, and no other children. He was the owner of a farm in Douglas County, which was occupied by a tenant. One daughter resided at Eudora, and the other at Olathe. He sometimes made his home with one, and at other times with the other, daughter. He was about sixty-five years of age. About 8 o'clock A. M. on the 2d day of March, 1887, he left Eudora, and took passage on a regular passenger train of the Atchison Road for Holliday. The latter is a junction of the Atchison Road and the Southern Kansas Railroad in Johnson County. Mr. Gibson left the train at Holliday, and at once purchased a ticket at the office there, over the Southern Kansas Railroad, for Olathe. He was compelled to wait the coming of the Southern Kansas train from Kansas City, Mo., from about 9:30 A. M. until 11:30 A. M. The Southern Kansas train pulled into Holliday, on the second track, about 11:30 A. M.; and at this time there were six or seven passengers for Olathe and the southwest waiting. When the Southern Kansas came up, some of the passengers were on the south side of the platform, next to the first or main track. Among them were Mr. Gibson, the deceased, Johnson and Owens. Just as the Southern Kansas train had come to a rest, one passenger crossed the first track, and the mail carrier crossed and got over; and he was followed by Mr. Gibson. As he got upon the track, a freight train of the Atchison Road came in from the west, in front of the platform, and on the main track. The engine struck Mr. Gibson, knocked him down, and dragged him some distance between the north rail and the platform. His head was badly cut, his leg was broken in two places, and he was greatly bruised about the body, internally and externally. His daughter Mrs. Cochran came to Holliday, took him to her house at Olathe, where he died, intestate, on the 80th day of March, 1887.

It is clearly apparent from the instructions of the court and the findings of the jury that the recovery for the plaintiff below against the Railroad Company was upon the theory that Mr. Gibson, at the time of his injury, was entitled to the rights and privileges of a passenger of the Atchison Company. This, upon the claim that the Atchison Company controlled, directed and managed the Southern Kansas Railroad. The testimony in the record will not sustain a verdict upon this ground. The ticket which Gibson purchased at the station read: "Southern Kansas Ry. Co. 1st class ticket. Holliday to Olathe. (When stamped by agent at first-named station.) S. B. Haynes, G. P. A. (2852.) [Reversed side stamped: A., T. & S. F. R. R. Co. Holliday, Mar. 21, 1887. Ex. I, A. P. R.]"

At the station of Holliday, the second track south of the depot was used by the Southern Kansas Railway Company for its passenger trains, and the main track next to the depot, and south thereof, was used by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company. The jury found that the majority of the stock of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company was owned by the Kansas City, Topeka & Western Railroad Company; that the balance of the stock of the company was owned by the Atchison Company; and that the Atchison Company leased and operated the Kansas City, Topeka & Western Railroad Company. The two companies, according to the testimony, are separate and independent corporations. The Atchison Company, by virtue of controlling the stock of the Southern Kansas Railway Company, was enabled to elect directors of that company. These directors elected several persons who were also officials of the Atchison Company.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davis, 84 Kan. 209, 210, it is said: "That corporation had the power to purchase and hold the stock and bonds of the Wichita & Western Railroad Company, or to guarantee the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds of that company, and thereby, as a stockholder or bondholder, or as a guarantor of the bonds, to aid that company to construct its road; but, by so doing, the Santa Fé Company did not make the Wichita & Western Company its servant or agent, and did not thereby make itself responsible for the negligence or other default of the Wichita & Western Company. Laws 1878, chap. 105; Const. Kan. art. 12, § 2; Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 23, § 82. . . . Where a parent company, operating a long line of road in the State, takes the necessary steps to construct an auxiliary railroad for the purpose of a local line in the name of another company, and, in strictly pursuing the provisions of the statute, merely furnishes aid as a stockholder or bondholder, or a guarantor of bonds, to the auxiliary company, and such auxiliary company constructs its road in its own name, it is not the servant or agent, in such construction of its road, of the parent company; and the parent company is not, on account of being a stockholder or bondholder, or guarantor of bonds of the auxiliary company, responsible for the negligence or other default of the auxiliary company in constructing its road in its own name."

In the case of Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 115 U. S. 587 [29 L. ed. 499], the former company claimed that the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company was controlled by the Missouri Pacific Company, and therefore that the Missouri Pacific Company was bound, under its contract, to haul the palace cars over it. In that case, as in this, it was shown that the Missouri Pacific Company owned stock in the railway company, and in that way selected its directors. The court, however, decided that this did not give it the control of the road. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, among other things: "The Missouri Pacific Company has bought the stock of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Company, and has effected a satisfactory election of directors; but this is all. It has all the advantages of a control of the road, but that is not in law the control itself. Practically, it may control the company; but the company alone controls its road. In a sense, the stockholders of a corporation own its property; but they are not the managers of its business, or in the immediate control of its affairs. Ordinarily, they elect the governing body of the corporation, and that body controls its property. Such is the case here. The Missouri Pacific Company owns enough of the stock of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern to control the election of directors; and this it has done. The directors now control the road through their own agents and executive officers, and these agents and officers are in no way under the direction of the Missouri Pacific Company. If they or the directors act contrary to the wishes of the Missouri Pacific Company, that company has no power to prevent it except by the election, at the proper time and in the proper way, of other directors, or by some judicial proceeding for the protection of its interest as a stockholder. Its rights and its powers are those of a stockholder only. It is not the corporation, in the sense of that term as applied to the management of the corporate business, or the control of the corporate property."

There is no testimony in the record tending to show that the Atchison Road leased the Southern Kansas Road, or that it was the owner of the road. The rights and powers of the Atchison Road were those of a stockholder only. Therefore the Atchison Road was not the Southern Kansas corporation, in the sense of that term as applied to the management of the corporate business, or the control of the corporate property, of the Southern Kansas.

Under the laws of this State, a railroad company has a lawful right to purchase and hold stock of any other railroad company, the line of whose railroad, constructed or being constructed connects with its own. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fletcher, 35 Kan. 236.

The stockholders of a railroad company may be said, in a certain sense, to control, direct and manage the road; but an action for the negligence of the officers, agents or employes of the railroad company must be brought against the company, not against the stockholders. Therefore, as the rights and powers of the Atchison Road in the Southern Kansas Railroad Company were those of a stockholder only, the Atchison Company is not responsible for the wrongful acts of omission or commission of the Southern Kansas Road. As the rights and powers of the Atchison Road in the Southern Kansas were those of a stockholder only, the instructions of the court that the jury might find from the testimony that the Southern Kansas Railroad Company, for all practical purposes, was managed, controlled and operated by the Atchison Company, was misleading. The finding of a verdict upon this and similar instructions cannot be sustained. The fact that Mr. Gibson purchased a ticket to ride over the Southern Kansas Road at the station of the Atchison Road at Holliday did not make him a passenger of the Atchison Road, or make the Atchison Road responsible for the negligence of the Southern Kansas Road.

The jury found that the person in charge of the ticket office at the station of Holliday was agent both for the Atchison Company and the Southern Kansas Company; but even if the ticket agent at Holliday acted for the Atchison Road, and the Atchison Road sold the ticket for the Southern Kansas Road, this would not make the Atchison Road liable for the negligence of the Southern Kansas. The ticket purchased by Mr. Gibson shows that the contract of carriage was made on behalf of the Southern Kansas Railroad Company.

Upon a retrial, unless different testimony is presented, the case should not go to the jury upon the theory that the Atchison Company controlled, directed and managed the Southern Kansas Railroad. If the Southern Kansas Road was guilty of negligence in not running its passenger trains close or near to the station, that company is responsible, not the Atchison. If the Atchison Road operated its freight train negligently, and, without any contributory negligence on his part, Mr. Gibson was killed thereby, then the Atchison Company is liable, not the Southern Kansas. They were two separate corporations, and the one is not responsible for the negligence of the other.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

William Frank PECKHAM, Exr., etc. of Mary Yemmans, Deceased,

v.

John LEGO et al.

(....Conn.....)

1. A bequest of the use and improvement of testator's estate to certain persons "during their natural lives" gives them a life estate only; and such estate will not be enlarged by the addition of the further clause: "Should it be necessary for their personal comfort to use any portion of said property, it is my will that they do so, exercising good judgment and saving as much as possible for the children born to them."

2. Permission to persons to whom the use of an estate is devised for life, to use

NOTE.—Recent decisions; devise and bequest of use of estate.

A devise of the use and occupation of land during life gives a life estate; and a further provision against alienation, and that it shall not be subject to attachment or levy, is inconsistent with the life estate, and void against judgment creditors. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Gates, 75 Iowa, 343.

A widow given the use of realty during life, with the right to sell the same for her support, is vested with the life estate and power of sale to convey for her maintenance and support. Griffin v. Griffin, 15 West. Rep. 51, 123 Ill. 430.

A will devising to testator's wife the use of his property, real and personal, "for and during her natural life," vests in her merely the life estate; and a limitation over to remaindermen of all property which "shall not have been used up by her, or be dead or destroyed," will not operate by implication to enlarge her estate into an absolute title. Pendley v. Madison, 33 Ala. 484.

A will giving a testator's widow an absolute devise, followed by a provision that after her death the property, both real and personal, shall be sold, his debts paid, and the remainder shared among his 7 L. R. A.

children, gives her only an estate for life. Geiger's App. (Pa.) 24 W. N. C. 254.

Under a will giving testator's wife, as residuary legatee, real, personal and mixed estate for life, with the right and power to use and dispose of the income, rents, profits and interest, and to apply to her use, if needed, any part of the principal of the personal property, making her the sole judge of the need of so doing, and giving to others what should be left unapplied and unconsumed,—she may be given the possession and control of the property. Pierce v. Stidworthy, 81 Me. 50.

Under a will giving testator's wife all his property of every kind, to use and dispose of for her maintenance during her natural life, a conveyance of the real estate is valid if the parties act in good faith; and the purchaser is not obliged to show that there was any emergency requiring a sale. Richardson v. Richardson, 80 Me. 533.

Under a will giving to testator's wife the use and improvement of his whole estate, with power to use, in addition to the income, as much as she may deem necessary for her comfort and support, and to sell or dispose of the whole or any part of it at her discretion, without the necessity of a license or of pursuing any of the forms of law, and disposing of whatever remains unexpended at her death, the widow so much of the bulk of the estate as is necessary for their comfort will give them the right to use what is necessary for their support. The determination as to the existence of such necessity is subject to the supervision of the court, and the amount to be used will be fixed at what is needed in reference to the situation and condition in life of the devisees.

3. Where the use of an estate is devised to certain persons for life with power to use the bulk of the estate if necessary for their comfort, "exercising good judgment and saving as much as possible for the children born to them," such children will take under the will the remainder after the life estate to the exclusion of the heirs-at-law of the testator.

(September 2, 1880.)

ON reservation from the Superior Court for New Haven County of a suit to obtain a construction of the will of Mary Yemmans, deceased.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel A. York, for Grace A. Peckham and her children, legatees under the will:

The intention of the testator is to be sought after and carried into effect. This intention is to be collected from the whole will, and not from detached portions of it.

Matthewson v. Saunders, 11 Conn. 144; Altlyn v. Mather, 9 Conn. 125; Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514; Reidfield, Am. Cas. on Wills, 540; Bills v. Putnam, 6 New Eng. Rep. 898, 64 N. H. 554; Greene v. Dennis, 6 Conn. 299.

When a person executes a will, there is a strong presumption that the testator intends to dispose of all his property.

Warner v. Willard, 4 New Eng. Rep. 467, 54 Conn. 470.

The result of leaving the estate intestate is "to be avoided if possible."

State v. Smith, 52 Conn. 583.

Mr. George P. Ingersoll, of Pigott, Pardee & Ingersoll, for the heirs-at-law:

has the right to use her best judgment and discretion in disposing of the property with a view to obtain from it her maintenance and support, without any particular regard for the interests of the heirs, if done with no purpose to defraud them. Hoxie v. Finney, 147 Mass. 616.

Where testator devised to his wife, during her natural life, "our homestead, with all our farm land," and in the same item subsequent words dispose of "what will not be consumed of real and personal estate at my wife's decease," and in other following items the devisees named are limited to property "not herein otherwise appropriated," the widow has authority to convey the fee of the land devised to her. Silvers v. Canary, 7 West. Rep. 359, 109 Ind. 267.

Bequest giving life estates only.

A will giving to testator's wife his house and lot during the term of her natural life does not give anything more than a life estate by reason of the fact that she, in another clause, is referred to as residuary legatee. Mixer v. Woodcock, 147 Mass. 613.

The legatee for life of chattels devised without limitation over in remainder has the absolute property in such chattels as are consumed in their use. Bartlett (W. Va.) 5 L. R. A. 523.

The legatee for life of chattels given by will, 7 L. R. A.

Where the intention to give a life estate is clearly expressed a power of disposal of the principal does not convert it into a fee.

2 Jarman, Wills, chap. 38, § 1; Lewis v. Palmer, 46 Conn. 458; Glover v. Stillson, 56 Conn. 316; Stuart v. Walker, 79 Me. 145; Welsh v. Woodbury, 144 Mass. 542.

The word "comfort" in this connection means support.

Webster, Dict.; Hull v. Oulver, 84 Conn. 405.

Upon the termination of the life estate the residuary estate should be distributed among the heirs-at-law. The courts have in some instances allowed of a devise by implication where it has been very apparent, in order to support and effectuate the intention of the testator; but in cases of this kind the implication must be a plain and not merely a possible or probable one, for, the title of the heir-at-law being plain and obvious, no words in a will ought to be construed in such a manner as to defeat it, if they can have any other significance.

Cruise, Dig. Devise, chap. 10, § 18; Coffman v. Coffman (Va.), 39 Alb. L. J. 265; Schouler, Wills, § 479.

An heir-at-law can only be disinherited by express devise or necessary implication, and that implication has been defined to be such a strong probability that an intention to the contrary cannot be supposed.

2 Jarman, Wills, 112, * 622.

Loomis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to obtain a judicial construction of the last will of Mary Yemmans, which is as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my brother, John Lero, five hundred dollars.

"I give and bequeath to W. Frank and his wife, Grace A. Peckham, the use and improvement of the whole of the remainder of the estate without limitation over in remainder, does not take the absolute property in such chattels, but his estate is accountable to the estate of the testator for all chattels converted by him or his administrator to his use or the use of his estate. Ibid.

A will giving testator's wife the right to dispose of the personality "as her necessities may require and as her judgment may dictate to be right and expedient," and directing that any part of it that may remain unexpended by her shall go to the residuary legatee, gives her an absolute right of disposition of the personality, at least so far as to authorize her to give it to another person under an arrangement by which she shall be provided with an annuity and the privilege of living in the family of the other if she chooses to do so. Schreiner v. Smith, 38 Fed. Rep. 597.

A bequest giving to testator's wife all his property, to use to her own use and benefit as she shall deem best for herself and their daughter, is absolute to the wife, and the daughter has no recoverable interest in the property or its proceeds. Bulver v. Willigrod, 71 Iowa, 620.

The phrases "such property as shall then be in her possession," and "such of said property as shall be left," do not authorize the inference that testator intended to give the wife the absolute disposal of the property devised, where part of the personality devised was of a perishable nature. Munro v. Collins, 13 West. Rep. 663, 95 Mo. 33.

of which I may die possessed, both real and personal, during their natural lives. Should it be necessary for their personal comfort to use any portion of said property, it is my will that they do so, exercising good judgment, and saving as much of it as is possible for the children born to them.

"I appoint W. Frank and Grace A. Peckham executors of this my last will and testament."

The following facts are found by the court:

The heirs at-law in this case are John Lego, a brother of the testatrix, and the children of deceased brothers and sisters. Grace A. Peckham, one of the defendants, is a niece of the testatrix, and lived with and was brought up by her as a member of her family. After the marriage of W. Frank Peckham with said Grace, she and her husband and the testatrix lived together, with occasional intermissions, until the death of the testatrix. About the time of the execution of the will the testatrix went to live with Mr. Peckham and his wife, and continued to reside with them to the time of her death. The other heirs-at-law, though not intimate, were on friendly terms with the testatrix. The property and estate of the testatrix came to her by the will of her late husband, Joseph Yemmans. A few days after the death of her husband the testatrix made and executed the will, it having been drawn by Rev. E. E. Beardsley of New Haven.

The first question is, whether, under the second section of the will, Mr. and Mrs. Peckham take a fee or a life estate.

The intention of the testatrix, which is to control, must here be ascertained from the language employed by her in making the gift. In the first section she employed direct and fitting words in making an absolute gift to her brother, and had she intended a similar gift of the residue to the Peckhams similar language most naturally would have been employed, being already in her mind. Instead of that, however, we find language of a contrary import; language which is irreconcilable with the idea that she intended to give other than a life estate.

The language is doubly restrictive. In the first place the bequest is guarded by the words "use and improvement," which alone would distinguish the gift from a fee, but to put it beyond all controversy, the tenure of the holding is expressly given as "during their natural lives." If the section stopped here it is conceded that a doubt as to the meaning would be impossible; but the words which follow: "Should it be necessary for their personal comfort to use any portion of said property, it is my will that they do so, exercising good judgment, and saving as much as possible for the children born to them,"—it is contended remove the restriction twice applied in the preceding language, and enlarge what was plainly only a life estate and convert it into a fee. We fail to discover any such intention. The language necessarily implies a consciousness on the part of the testatrix that she had given only a life estate; but it occurs to her that the income may be so limited, and their circumstances so reduced, that they may lack the means of comfortable support, and she adds the clause under consideration to meet such an emergency, but this clause was never intended to sweep away the life estate. It was only to be called into play by an emergency—by the needs of her beneficiaries. The right to resort to the principal was founded on necessity and restricted by necessity. The words are "should it be necessary." If it should not be necessary it is all a mere life estate; if it is, then the restriction is that all except the necessary portion so taken remains a mere life estate. It is said that the words "necessary for their personal comfort," are indefinite in meaning and practically unrestricted, and therefore inconsistent with any remaining life estate. We cannot accept this view.

One of the definitions of "comfort" given in Webster's Dictionary, as applied particularly in law, as well as in some other things, is "support." The language therefore must be held to mean "necessary for their support."

But it is said that it is again rendered indefinite by being all left to the judgment and discretion of the legatees as to the kind and extent of the support needed; that they may use the principal to gratify their mere whims and fancies. We do not think any such authority is given. For the time being they exercise their judgment, but are not the ultimate judges of what is necessary, but the superior court, as a court of equity, and perhaps in some cases the probate court, will review and revise their judgment, and determine whether the exigency had arisen to give them any right to resort to the principal, and if so whether they have exceeded the liberty given them.

But our attention has been called particularly to the concluding words enjoining the exercise of good judgment on their part. We do not think the question of necessity is to be so determined. But the good judgment enjoined is to be exercised in saving as much as possible for the children within the field given of what is necessary. What is necessary in law does not always, nor often, mean a strict absolute necessity. It is a relative term and variable according to circumstances. It means here, as in the case of the obligation of a husband to furnish necessities for his wife, what is needed in reference to the situation and condition in life, and within those limits much may be saved by the exercise of good judgment.

If they act within the legal limits of a necessity in law they may not be responsible, but are if they appropriate a portion of the principal when not needed for their support.

If now we have discovered the intention of the testatrix as evidenced by the language of her will, a reference to artificial rules of interpretation would seem unnecessary; but as some of these rules were referred to in the discussion of this case as being opposed to the construction we have adopted, a brief discussion of the matter may seem desirable.

Hall v. Culver, 34 Conn. 404, was referred to as indorsing the principle that "where an estate for life is given, with power in the devisee to sell and dispose of it at his own discretion and for his own use, he takes a fee."

In Lewis v. Palmer, 46 Conn. 453, Carpenter, J., in giving the opinion of this court, very properly calls attention to the fact that the above proposition was stated as one which the counsel on both sides conceded, and that the court without discussing it immediately passed to the consideration of another question regarded as controlling, namely, whether the power of sale as there given was absolute or contingent. The language to be interpreted was as follows: "I give all my estate to my beloved husband, Ransom Culver, to use and improve during his natural life, and if he should want for his support to sell any part or the whole of it for his maintenance, my will is that it shall be at his disposal." In construing this language the court said: "The great object is of course to ascertain the intention of the devisor. If she had designed to give her husband the entire estate, it would have been very easy and very natural for her to say it in short and direct terms, or to place the disposal of it at his discretion, without imposing a condition. But she gives him the disposal only 'if he should want for his support to sell any part or the whole of it for his maintenance.' This language very clearly implies a limitation or restriction of the power to a case of necessity. The sale is to be proportioned to the extent of the necessity."

It will be seen that the court construed the authority to sell substantially as we do in the present case. So that even if the proposition referred to is a sound one, it would not apply to this case any more than to that one. But the proposition has been materially modified by the later utterances and decisions of this court.

In Lewis v. Palmer, supra, the words of the will were: "I do give and devise unto my said sister, Sarah Palmer, the use of all the rest of my real estate that I may have or leave at my death, during her natural life, and for her to dispose of as she may think proper, right or just." Here was plainly an unrestricted power of disposal at discretion, and yet the court did not hold that the legatee took a fee. The question, it is true, was left open, as the case could be disposed of upon another ground, yet the discussion plainly showed that the court was prepared to hold that a life estate created by express words would not be enlarged to a fee by the power of sale.

Afterwards, in Glover v. Stillson, 56 Conn. 316, the court was called upon to construe a will where the words were: "I give the residue of my estate, both real and personal, unto my sisters Polly A. Stillson and Mary B. Stillson, for the term of their natural lives, hereby empowering my said sisters to dispose of any portion of my estate, either real or personal, if they should so desire." The court held that the sisters took only a life estate notwithstanding their unrestricted power of disposal, and in giving the opinion of the court, Carpenter, J., said: "We are asked to say that the power of sale enlarges an express life estate to a fee. If we do so, what becomes of the intention of the testator? His intention to give pecuniary legacies to the parties named, and the residue to the orphan asylum, is just as certain, and, we may add, just as provident, as the intention to provide for his sisters; and that intention by the construction contended for is wholly defeated. The power of sale may, in doubtful cases, aid in ascertaining the intention; but to give it an artificial and technical force and thereby defeat the manifest intention of the testator is wholly inadmissible."

These utterances we think are in accord with the decided preponderance of judicial authority in the United States.

Chancellor Kent, in volume 4, side page 536, seventh edition of his Commentaries, summarizes the settled doctrine as follows: "If an estate be given to a person generally, or indefinitely, with a power of disposition, it carries a fee; unless the testator gives to the first taker an estate for life only, and annexes to it a power of disposition of the reversion. In that case the express limitation for life will control the operation of the power, and prevent it from enlarging the estate to a fee."

It remains for us to consider a still more difficult question in regard to the disposition of the reversion—whether it belongs to all the heirs of the testatrix as intestate property, or whether the will takes hold of it and sufficiently designates the persons who are to take.

The language of the will is so unusual and so doubtful that, at the outset, we feel embarrassed by two independent principles of law operating in different directions at the same time. One requires the court to avoid if possible any construction which would result in partial intestacy. State v. Smith, 52 Conn. 563; Warner v. Willard, 54 Conn. 472, 4 New Eng. Rep. 467.

The other cautions us not to disinherit the heirs-at-law unless on so strong a probability that an intention to the contrary cannot reasonably be supposed. Wigram, Wills, 167; Wilkinson v. Adams, 1 Vea. & B. 456.

The residuary estate, it is conceded, is not expressly disposed of by the terms of the will, but there are words evincing, we think, an intention and desire on the part of the testator as to the disposition. We refer to the closing words of section 2. The testatrix, having in mind the life estate she has given, adds a conditional and restricted permission to use a portion of the principal or residuary estate, but in that connection enjoins the life tenants, in availing themselves of the permission, "to use good judgment, saving as much as possible for the children born to them." This implies that the children of the life tenants are to take the remainder—all of it.

But does it imply that they are to take it under the will or simply as her heirs-at-law? Her heirs are numerous; the record gives the names of eight besides the Peckhams, and the portion which the latter could inherit by right of representation would be insignificant as compared with the whole. If she referred at all to her own heirs she would have so stated, and would not have restricted the benefit of the saving to children born to them, the Peckhams.

We do not think the language can be satisfied at all with any such reference as suggested, but that the words imply that the Peckham children are to take the remainder under the will, and not because they may become her heirs-at-law with many others. The question of implied gifts is in every case one of intention.

There are several instances where a devise by implication has received the sanction of this court. We will mention only two. The first is the case of Minor v. Ferris, 23 Conn. 371. A testator, after devising his real estate for the benefit of his wife and directing his executor to sell it within one year and to invest the proceeds in some safe property to remain a fund for her support during life, gave to his sister, if living at the decease of his wife, and if not to her children, whatever of the property might be left. He then bequeathed to his sister, in general and unrestricted terms, all his personal estate. In a subsequent clause he authorized his executors, if they deemed it advisable, to extend the time of selling the real estate for eighteen months, and expressed his opinion that if the property was well sold and invested the interest would support his wife; then he repeated his bequest to his sister, or if deceased to her children, of all his personal property; adding "if my wife has sufficient to support her." Counsel for the sister contended that the last clause must either be rejected as without meaning, or, as explained by the context, it must be construed to mean "as my wife has sufficient to support her," the testator having just expressed an opinion to that effect; but the court did not accept this view, but upon the ground of a prevailing intention apparent on the face of the will to provide for his wife ample support during life, and that the last clause was a qualification of preceding bequests, held that all the personal property was by implication given for the benefit of the wife during her life, upon the same terms as those upon which the real estate had been devised.

The other case is that of Holbrook v. Bentley, 32 Conn. 502, where a testator bequeathed to his wife the use of $3,000 and also gave her absolutely all his household furniture with a few exceptions mentioned, and then added a clause in this form: "What follows is after the death of my executrix" (his wife). "I do will and bequeath all the remainder of my estate indiscriminately, be it money or household furniture, equally to all my grandchildren." There was thus left a considerable amount of personal property not expressly disposed of during the life of the widow, and which would, if regarded as falling into the residuum, be left in the hands of the executrix to accumulate for the grandchildren. It was held, as this intention was improbable, and there were no words to indicate it, and no provision that the testatrix should hold the property as trustee for the grandchildren, that the will should be construed as giving by implication to the widow the use of this property for life. Here it will be seen there were no express words at all indicating a desire that the widow should have this property, and all her express bequests were precisely defined. It seems to us that in the present case there is at least as good a foundation in the will for the implication of a devise as in the cases cited.

Many similar illustrations of implied gifts might be cited from other jurisdictions, but we will refer to two cases only.

In Edens v. Williams, 8 Murph. 27, there was a gift of certain property to the testator's wife, and if she should prove enccinte, such child should be supported and educated out of the income of the property so left her, "as well as all the property I may die possessed of," with a residuary bequest to nieces. The court held that the whole estate was given by implication to the wife and child on its birth.

In Piper's Estate, 33 Leg. Int. 228, a direction that the mansion house should not be sold during the daughter's life, but that she might reside in it, was held to give a life estate.

The superior court is advised that under the will of Mary Yemmans, W. Frank Peckham and his wife, Grace, take a life estate in the remainder, with the privilege of disposing of or using any portion of the principal to the extent needed for their support and maintenance in a manner suited to their condition and circumstances in life; and that the children born to them take a vested interest in the remainder.

The approval on a legal holiday of the bond of an assignee for creditors by a court commissioner, even if it is a judicial act, is not prohibited by a statute declaring that "no court shall be opened or transact any business . . . on any legal holiday," except to instruct or discharge a jury, or receive a verdict and render judgment thereon.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ashland County in favor of plaintiff in an action to set aside an assignment for creditors for invalidity in the execution of the assignee's bond and to enforce payment of plaintiff's debt out of the assigned property. Reversed.

Statement by Cassoday, J.:

May 29, 1888, C. H. Hammersley & Co. made a general assignment to the defendant, Bernhard, for the benefit of their creditors. The assignee made and executed his bond, and the same was approved May 30, 1888. June 2, 1888, this action was commenced by the plaintiff, a corporation of the State of Illinois, against the assignors, and the garnishee papers were served on that day upon the assignee. July 27, 1888, judgment was entered in the principal action against the assignor. On the issues between the plaintiff and the garnishee, a trial was had by and before the court without a jury, and the court found, as matters of fact, in effect, that such assignment was made May 29, 1888, and acknowledged on that day before a notary public; that in the execution of said assignment, and the filing of the same, and the inventory, the statutes were complied with, except that the assignee's bond was, by him and his sureties, executed, and such sureties therein justified before a court commissioner on May 30, 1888; that the affidavit as to the nominal value of the assets was made before said commissioner on that day, on the reverse side of the bond; that upon said bond was indorsed in writing an approval of the same, both as to the form and the sufficiency of the sureties by said commissioner, May 30, 1888; and that the same was filed on that day with the clerk of the circuit court, by said commissioner; that the consent in writing of said assignee to take upon himself the duties of such trust was dated May 30, 1888; that the certificate of said commissioner to the copy of the assignment was made on that day; that such bond and copy of assignment, with indorsements and certificates, were filed with the clerk of the court May 30, 1888; that by virtue of said assignment the assignee took possession of the assignor's stock May 31, 1888; that said stock was inventoried at the nominal value thereof, and such inventory filed with the clerk of said court June 5, 1888; that no other bond was ever executed or relied upon except the one stated; that this action was commenced and judgment against the principal defendant taken as stated. And, as conclusions of law, the court found, in effect, that said assignment was void upon its face; that said assignee could not hold the property of the firm thereunder; that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the garnishee; and the same was ordered accordingly. From the judgment entered thereon the garnishee brings this appeal.

Messrs. Lennon & Sleight, for appellant:

A legal holiday is not dies non juridicus at common law; it is such only to the extent that it is made so by a statute, and no farther.

Glenn v. Eddy, 51 N. J. L. 255; Pfister v. State, 84 Ala. 432; State v. Ricketts, 74 N. C. 187; Hamer v. Sears, 81 Ga. 288; Bear v. Youngman, 1 West. Rep. 299, 19 Mo. App. 41; Dunlap v. State, 9 Tex. App. 179.

There is a marked distinction in this respect between legal holidays and Sundays, which should be carefully borne in mind.

"Sunday is dies non juridicus, and, by the common law, all judicial proceedings which take place on that day are void."

That part of the statute applying to holidays is in derogation of the common law, as has been shown by the foregoing authorities, and therefore should be strictly construed. It should not be extended to anything not strictly within its purview.

Mr. Rublee A. Cole, with Miss Kate H. Pier, for respondent.

Cassoday, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question involved in this appeal is whether the assignment was void by reason of the execution of the bond, the approval thereof by the commissioner, and the filing of the same, with a copy of the assignment, as stated, on May 30, 1888. The portion of the Statute which here requires special consideration reads: "No court shall be opened or transact any business . . . on any legal holiday, unless it be for the purpose of instructing or discharging a jury, or of receiving a verdict, and rendering a judgment thereon." Rev. Stat. § 2576, as amended by subd. 19, § 2, chap. 194, Laws 1879, and chap. 142, Laws 1885.

The 30th day of May, 1888, was a legal holiday. Rev. Stat. § 2577.

Of course there could be no valid assignment against the plaintiff as a creditor of the assignor, without the giving and filing of the requisite bond, duly approved by the court commissioner taking the same. Rev. Stat. § 1694.

It is conceded that this section of the Statute was in every respect complied with, unless the commissioner was prohibited from approving the bond, or doing the other acts named in the foregoing statement, by the provision of the Statute above quoted. The argument is, that "the circuit court, or the judge thereof in vacation," had "supervision of the proceedings in all voluntary assignments made under the provisions of" chap. 80, Rev. Stat., and could "make all necessary orders for the execution of the same;" and that the court commissioner had authority to "exercise within his county the powers of a circuit judge at chambers, in any civil action pending" therein; and hence that his approval of the bond was a judicial act, prohibited by the statutory provision quoted.

The "supervision of the proceedings" in such voluntary assignments, and the making of "orders for the execution of the same," manifestly presuppose a completed assignment, with the requisite bond, filed as required by the Statute. Assuming that the approval of the bond by the commissioner was a judicial act, still it would be an abuse of language to say that it was the transaction of any business by a court. The Statute simply prohibits any court from being open or transacting any business on any legal holiday, except as stated supra. The action of the commissioner in question was not the transaction of any business by any court, much less an act of the court in open court. To extend the Statute beyond its language, plainly expressed, and apply it to the action of a mere court commissioner, or even a judge at chambers, would be an attempt at judicial legislation entirely unauthorized.

There are numerous cases in the books holding, in effect, that no act will be held illegal merely by reason of being performed on such legal holiday, unless forbidden by statute. In New Jersey they have a statute prohibiting the holding of court or the exacting of compulsory labor on legal holidays. The language of their court, in a late case, is so apposite to the case at bar that we quote: "The history of the common law and of legislation, with respect to Sunday, clearly indicates that it owes its exceptional position to a general sense of its sacred character as a holy day. To no other day—although many account other days holy—has a like distinction been accorded. When we compare the course of the common law, and legislation respecting Sunday, with the Statute now before us, a different treatment is observable. Although some of the days named are accounted holy by many, while others are national anniversaries or days when public duties are enjoined on citizens, yet there has been enacted no prohibition against the pursuit of any business or pleasure. There is no express prohibition against the service of the process of the courts. . . . The statutory declaration that these days shall be legal holidays does not indicate an intent to assimilate their status to that of Sunday. 'Holiday,' in its present conventional meaning, is scarcely applicable to Sunday. Phillips v. Innes, 4 Clark & F. 284. It is applicable to all and has long been applied to some of the days named. When the Statute declares them to be legal holidays, it does not permit a reference to the legal status of Sunday to discover its meaning; for it proceeds to interpret the phrase, so far as it is prohibitory, by an express enactment declaring what shall not be done thereon. What it thus expresses is prohibited; what it fails to prohibit remains lawful to be done. The plain intent of the Statute, therefore, is to free all persons, upon the days named, from compulsory labor, and from compulsory attendance upon courts, as officers, suitors or witnesses. Its true interpretation will limit the prohibition, with respect to the courts, to such actual sessions thereof as would require such attendance." Glenn v. Eddy, 51 N. J. L. 255.

Accordingly it was held in that case that a summons might be legally issued, tested and served on such legal holiday. To the same effect is Smith v. Ihling, 47 Mich. 614.

In Oregon it has recently been held that although the service of process issued from a court upon a legal holiday was irregular, and might be set aside, yet that the service of notice of a contested election on that day was valid. Whitney v. Blackburn, 17 Or. 564.

In a case arising in this State under our statute, Judge Drummond held that, "in the absence of prohibitory legislation by the State, the docketing of a transcript of judgment on a holiday is not void, but will confer a valid lien upon the real estate of the debtor in the county where it is filed." Re Worthington, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 54.

In that case the learned judge distinguishes Lampe v. Manning, 38 Wis. 673, in which the cause was tried and the judgment rendered on a legal holiday, and said: "At common law, Sunday was deemed a non-judicial day, during which no courts could transact any business or render any decree. Of course, at common law, some of the days which, under our practice, are deemed non-judicial, were unknown as such; and when they are so declared the inference would be that the prohibition extends no further than is named in the Statute."

This is in harmony with the language quoted from the New Jersey court, and there is nothing in our decisions in conflict with it. On the contrary, it has been held that our Statute "does not prohibit a justice of the peace from issuing a summons on such a holiday" (Weil v. Geier, 61 Wis. 414), nor "render inadmissible in evidence a deposition taken in another State on a day made a legal holiday" in this State. Green v. Walker, 78 Wis. 548.

We must hold that the approval of the bond in question by the court commissioner, assuming it to have been a judicial act, was, nevertheless, valid, and hence that the assignment was improperly held void for that reason.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings according to law.

1. The words "physically and incurably incapacitated from entering into the marriage state," in Code 1886, § 2322, stating a cause of divorce, mean impotency to consummate the marriage.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Chancery Court for Butler County, overruling a demurrer and motion to dismiss a petition seeking a divorce upon the alleged ground of physical incapacity on the part of defendant. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Richardson & Steiner for appellant.

Mr. Charles Wilkinson for appellee.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The averments of the bill in this case are too offensive to modesty to allow their publication in our reports. But, as said by Sir William Scott in Briggs v. Morgan, 8 Phillim. Eccl. 325, 1 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 408: "Courts of law are not invested with the powers of selection; they must take the law as it is imposed on them. Courts of the highest jurisdiction must often go into cases of the most odious nature, where the proceeding is only for the punishment of the offender. Here the claim is for a remedy; and the court cannot refuse to entertain it, on any fastidious notions of its own."

Our Statute (Code 1886, § 2322) declares that either party to a marriage is entitled to a divorce from the bonds of matrimony "when the other was, at the time of the marriage, physically and incurably incapacitated from entering into the marriage state." The meaning of the words "physically incapacitated," as here used, is substantially the same as that of the word "impotent," frequently met with in divorce proceedings. It means powerless, or wanting in physical power, to consummate the marriage. Animal desire between the sexes is one of the incitements to matrimony, the lawful gratification of which is encouraged and protected alike by moral sentiment and municipal regulation. Copulation or coition, the act of gratifying sexual desire, is the consummation of marriage; inability to accomplish which, when it proceeds from incurable physical imperfection or malformation, is precisely what our Statute means and expresses by the words "physically incapacitated." "Barrenness," however, is in no sense the synonym of "impotency." We consider it unnecessary, at this stage of this case, to go further into details. 1 Bishop, on Marriage and Divorce, 6th ed. §§ 822-838 a, inclusive, treats the subject at length, and collates and reviews the adjudged cases. We approve his statement of the American doctrine as set forth in said section. Devanbagh v. Devanbagh, 5 Paige, 554, 28 Am. Dec. 443, note.

The chancellor overruled the defendant's demurrer, and his motion to dismiss the bill for want of equity; and the present appeal by the defendant is from his ruling. It is here contended that before seeking a divorce complainant should have submitted to a triennial test, sometimes required in the English ecclesiastical court. That being a rule of the canon, and not of the common, law, it is doubtful if it could exert any influence in our deliberations, even if uninfluenced by statute. We think, however, that our Statute forbids us to consider that rule in passing on this statutory ground of divorce.

It is contended for appellant that the averments in the present bill are not sufficiently specific. We think there is nothing in this, for very obvious reasons. We know not how the charges could be made more definite.

Questions are raised on the form of relief, and on the right to allow the amendment to the bill, which was made in the court below. There is nothing in these objections. However a sentence annulling marriage on account of impotency may have been classified or regarded under the canon law, such marriages were not absolutely void. They were only voidable at the request of the injured party. If not annulled by judicial sentence during the life of the parties, they entailed all the legal consequences of a valid marriage; and until such sentence of annulment neither party could contract other marriage. But we need not pursue this inquiry. Our Statute, in terms, makes it a ground for divorce from the bonds of L. R. A.

of matrimony; and that fixes its class and status for us.

Is the malformation or physical incapacity charged in the bill, if true, sufficient ground for divorce? Can we, as matter of law, or of indisputable fact, affirm that the charge is preposterous, and therefore untrue? Are the abnormal proportions which are charged impossible, in the nature of things? We know of no rule of law or logic by which we can reach such conclusion. We hold that the chancellor, in his decretal order overruling the demurrer and refusing to dismiss the bill, did not err.

The briefs of counsel give evidence of diligent research; and they furnish no adjudged case in which the malformation here complained of was the ground of complaint. We suppose such cases, if they exist at all, are very rare. To authorize the relief prayed, the proof should be very satisfactory, and the most direct which the nature of the question is susceptible of. The complainant must be required to submit her person to examination by physicians, or matrons skilled in such matters, to be appointed by the chancellor; and proof of such examination by the persons so appointed, showing that the fault is not with her, must be made an indispensable condition of relief. If she refuse to submit to such examination, then let her bill be dismissed. The defendant, also, should submit to skillful examination as a condition of his defense, if he contests the complainant's right of relief. But if the defense is not made as herein indicated, the chancellor should scrutinize the testimony narrowly, and have recourse to any other legal means, with a view of ascertaining if the proceedings have not become consensive and collusive. Finding such to be the case, relief should be denied, except on clear proof of the charge preferred in the bill, namely, that for the reason stated the defendant "was at the time of the marriage physically and incurably incapacitated from entering into the marriage state."

Affirmed.

An officer is guilty of habitual drunkenness justifying his impeachment under the Constitution where he has become intoxicated six or eight times a year for more than three years last past, and his spree or fits of intoxication have lasted from one to two or more days, and once for two or more weeks.

(February 1, 1890.)

NOTE.—Impeachment in office.

Impeachment in office is a constitutional proceeding for punishment of an officer. State v. O'Driscoll, 8 Brev. (S. C.) 526.

Under a constitution providing for removal of public officers for crime, incapacity or negligence, a statute providing for removal for intoxication is valid. McComas v. Krug, 81 Ind. 287.

Except as provided for in the Constitution of 1875, impeachment has ceased to be a part of the IMPEACHMENT proceedings to remove defendant from the office of Probate Judge of Cherokee County because of his alleged habitual drunkenness. Judgment of removal.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinions. Mr. W. L. Martin, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Messrs. Tompkins & Troy and J. A. Walden for defendant.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Article 7, § 1, of the Constitution (§ 4818, Code 1886), must be interpreted in the light of the object the law-making power had in view in their adoption and enactment. They pertain to official qualification and fitness, and require that the incumbents of the enumerated offices shall be free from the vices therein interdicted. In reference to habitual drunkenness, the gravamen of the present information, the purpose was to secure a calm, wise and faithful administration of the law, uninfluenced by the endangering effects of habitual intoxication. It is implied and assumed that drunkenness so clouds the intellect and inflames the passions as that official trust cannot be safely confided to those with whom excessive indulgence in intoxicating drinks has become a habit.

"Drunkenness" is that effect produced on the mind, passions or body, by intoxicants taken into the system, which so far changes the normal condition as to materially disturb and impair the capacity for healthy, rational action or conduct; which causes abnormal results, or such as would not ensue in the absence of the intoxicants,—the changed effect produced by the immoderate or excessive use of intoxicants, as contrasted with normal status and conduct.

"Habit" is customary state or disposition acquired by frequent repetition; aptitude by doing frequently the same thing; usage; established manner. When a person has repeatedly acted in a particular way at intervals, whether regular or irregular, for such length of time as that we can predicate with reasonable assurance that he will continue so to act, we may affirm that this is his habit.

The testimony, taken in its entirety, proves that the accused drank to excess—to drunkenness—six or eight times a year, and that this, with intervals of from one to two months, has, with the exception of about a year immediately succeeding his last election, in 1886, been kept up for much more than three years before these proceedings were instituted; that his sprees or fits of intoxication lasted from one to two or more days, and once for two or more weeks, and that during his spells or sprees he frequently staggered in walking, sometimes fell to the ground, had to be led or assisted home, and was abnormally loud, if not boisterous, in his conversation. Even after the present proceedings were set on foot, he took one or more sprees. Under the definitions given above, we hold that drunkenness had become a habit with the respondent, and that at and before the commencement of this proceeding he was and is guilty of habitual drunkenness. We therefore find the charge and specification of habitual drunkenness made against respondent to be true, and that he is guilty as charged in the information. Blaney v. Blaney, 126 Mass. 205.

It is therefore the order and judgment of the court that the said R. R. Savage, Judge of Probate of Cherokee County, be, and he is hereby, removed from the said office of judge of probate, and that he is disqualified from holding office under the authority of this State for the term for which he was elected.

Somerville, J., concurring:

The information addressed by the grand jury of Cherokee County to this court, and filed by the Attorney-General, which is analogous to the ordinary articles of impeachment, charges the defendant, R. R. Savage, as probate judge of said county, with habitual drunkenness, as a ground of impeachment, which is one of the several causes specified in the Constitution and Statute which may be made the basis of such a proceeding.

Certain state officers, including judges of probate, are subject to impeachment and removal from office on the following grounds: Willful neglect of duty, corruption in office, habitual drunkenness, incompetency or any offense involving moral turpitude while in office, or committed under color thereof, or connected therewith. Ala. Const. 1875, §§ 1-4; Code 1886, §§ 4818, 4819.

It is not practicable, nor, so far as I know, has any court attempted, to lay down any fixed rule accurately defining what is "habitual drunkenness," or who may be deemed an "habitual drunkard."

The two phrases, "habitual drunkard" and "common drunkard," have been held in some States to be synonymous in meaning, in con-jurisprudence of the State. It is made a criminal proceeding with no right of trial by jury. State v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599.

The Law of 1876, making no provision for the accused to be confronted with witnesses, is unconstitutional. Ibid.

While the Constitution provides for the impeachment of certain officers, it leaves all other civil officers to be tried in such manner as the Legislature may provide. Re Marks, 45 Cal. 200.

A judge is liable to impeachment for misconduct. Brodie v. Rutledge, 2 Bay (S. C.) 62.

struing statutes regulating the liquor traffic, relating to the subject of granting divorces, and providing for the custody of the estates of persons of this class. Either of the expressions may, in general terms, be defined as meaning one who drinks intoxicating liquors, to excess, with habitual frequency. Indulgence by a person, on the one hand, in occasional acts of drunkenness, would not be sufficient to bring him within the sphere of this definition; nor, on the other hand, need he be constantly drunk every day or week in a year. Nor would I be willing to say that the term necessarily involves the idea of the victim of the habit yielding to the temptation of drink whenever the opportunity is afforded, as has sometimes been intimated. Common observation shows that there are persons who are in the habit of getting drunk almost regularly every week, while they indulge in drink at no other time. There are others whose formed habit it is to fall into drunken debauches, lasting for days, and even weeks, and repeating from one year to another with a periodicity more or less regular, according to the peculiar temperament of the man. This form of alcoholism often becomes a disease, formerly characterized as a species of dipsomania, and more recently known in scientific nomenclature as methomania,—an irresistible craving for alcoholic or other intoxicating liquors, accompanied by peculiar symptoms, described by medical authors, the discussion of which, however, is foreign to the scope of this opinion. The victim acquires the habit of being attacked by these drunken sprees, or fits of intoxication. I can see no good reason why such a man would not properly come within the definition of an habitual drunkard, or should be exempt from being classed as a man of intemperate habits. In popular parlance, he certainly would be so classed.

The case of Blaney v. Blaney, 126 Mass. 205, is an authority on this point. The Massachusetts Statute makes "gross and confirmed habits of intoxication" a ground of divorce, without undertaking to define those terms. The evidence showed, using the language of the court in that case, that the defendant, "for a period of twelve or fifteen years, had as often as three or four times a year yielded to an impulse to drink to excess; that on such occasions he became grossly intoxicated, continuing in that condition a week or ten days together; and that at such times he went, or was sent, to an asylum for inebriates; that when the desire for drink came upon him he could not resist; and that a single glass would bring on excessive drinking, and a renewal of gross intoxication. It was also shown that there had been no apparent improvement in his habits in this respect, and that any undue excitement would make him drink." Upon this state of facts, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts concurred in sustaining a judgment finding the defendant to have been a person of gross and confirmed habits of intoxication.

In this case, the phrase "habitual drunkenness" must be construed with reference to the particular mischief intended to be remedied by the law-makers. Being one of several causes of impeachment in office, it must be interpreted in connection with the other grounds associated with it, which are also made causes of impeachment and removal from office. They are: (1) willful neglect of duty; (2) corruption in office; (3) incompetency; or (4) any offense involving moral turpitude. These are causes which would seem to render the incumbent practically or morally unfit for office. They all tend more or less to reflect upon the dignity of office, to generate disrespect for the law, through the want of worth, moral or intellectual, in the officer, to create dissatisfaction among the people with their government, and to thus seriously cripple the administration of justice in all its departments. Any indulgence in excessive intoxication, with such habitual frequency as to produce this result, ought, in my judgment, to bring a given case within both the letter and spirit of the law.

The summary of the testimony in this case, as made in the opinion of the chief justice, is fully supported by the record. It satisfactorily shows that the respondent has during his present term of office been guilty of drunkenness which may properly be characterized as "habitual," within the meaning of the Constitution and Statutes of this State.

On these grounds, I concur in the judgment of impeachment rendered by the court.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause stands on demurrer to the petition. Omitting the formal matters, the petition alleges in substance that the Muscatine Cattle Company, on the 28th day of September, 1888, sold to one James Tate 1,000 head of cattle at the agreed price of $22,000. Tate tendered in payment thereof his check drawn on the defendant Bank. The said cattle company, being indebted in a large sum at that time to plaintiffs, refused to deliver the cattle, or to accept said check from said Tate, unless plaintiffs would accept the said check in payment of said indebtedness of said cattle company to them, which plaintiffs declined to do unless defendant would certify said check to be good. Thereupon said cattle company sent or caused to be sent, from Pueblo, Colo., to defendant at Westboro, Mo., the following telegram: "Will you pay James Tate's check on you twenty-two thousand dollars? Answer." Which said telegram was received by defendant, whereupon it sent to said cattle company the following answer: "James Tate is good. Send on your paper." Upon the receipt of this answer said cattle company and Tate exhibited the same to plaintiffs, whereupon plaintiffs, in reliance upon said acceptance and certification of said check, agreed to accept the same for the purpose aforesaid; and the said cattle company, in reliance on said telegram, accepted said check, and delivered to said Tate said cattle, and, after duly indorsing said check to plaintiffs, delivered the same to them, which the plaintiffs accepted in reliance upon said acceptance or certification, and duly entered credit therefor on the indebtedness of said cattle company to them. The petition then alleges presentment for payment, and the refusal of defendant to pay the said check, and the due protest thereof. Judgment is asked for said sum, with interest and protest fees, damages and costs.

The demurrer is general that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The argument in support of the demurrer is that there was no acceptance in writing, in contemplation of the statute; that the answer sent by telegram from defendant was at most but a promise to pay, and, the petition not averring that said Tate had any funds at the time in the Bank, the promise was wholly voluntary; that if the plaintiffs have any remedy it is against the payee named in the check, present fact, and not an agreement to pay it at all events whenever presented within the period of the Statute of Limitations. Bank of Springfield v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

who might then have action against the defendant on the breach of promise.

A brief recurrence to some general principles applicable to bank checks may not be impertinent, as a due regard to these will materially aid in a proper conclusion. Many text writers liken such checks, in their substance, to inland bills of exchange, payable on demand. 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 8; Byles, Bills, 18; 1 Edwards, Bills and Notes, § 19.

Mr. Justice Swayne, in Boston M. Nat. Bank v. Boston State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 647 [19 L. ed. 1019], very aptly notes the essential difference between checks and bills of exchange: "Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of the properties of such commercial paper; and many of the rules of the law-merchant are alike applicable to both. Each is for a specific sum, payable in money. In both cases there is a drawer, a drawee and a payee. Without acceptance no action can be maintained by the holder upon either against the drawee. The chief points of difference are that a check is always drawn on a bank or banker. No days of grace are allowed. The drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for payment, unless he can show that he has sustained some injury by the default. It is not due until payment is demanded, and the Statute of Limitations runs only from that time. It is by its face the appropriation of so much money of the drawer in the hands of the drawee to the payment of an admitted liability of the drawer. It is not necessary that the drawer of a bill should have funds in the hands of the drawee. A check in such case would be a fraud. . . . By the law-merchant of this country the certificate of the bank that a check is good is equivalent to acceptance."

It would therefore follow that when a check has been certified, which is but the equivalent of acceptance, by the drawee, it stands, in its commercial relation, as an accepted bill of exchange. From its acceptance the implication arises that it is drawn upon sufficient funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee, and that such fund is set apart, appropriated, for the check whenever presented. It is not only an admission that the drawer then has in the hands of the drawee the required fund, but it imposes the obligation on the drawee to reserve and hold the fund for the redemption of the check when presented. Boston M. Nat. Bank v. Boston State Nat. Bank, supra.

Nor is it material, as between a bona fide transferee of the check and the drawee, that the drawer in fact had no money in the bank at the time of the acceptance. The certification operates, in such case, an effectual estoppel against such defense. Cooke v. Boston State Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 98; Boston M. Nat. Bank v. Boston State Nat. Bank, supra; Jarvis v. Wilson, 46 Conn. 90-92; 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1603.

Such accepted check, possessing the quality of commercial paper, passes by indorsement, and confers upon the indorsee the right of action, as upon any other chose in action. Freund v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 76 N. Y. 255, 856; Central Sav. Bank v. Richards, 109 Mass. 413; Whilden v. Merchants & P. Nat. Bank, 64 Ala. 29, 30.

It only remains, therefore, to be determined whether or not the defendant Bank did accept the payment of the check in question; and, if it did accept, what are the rights of these plaintiffs? The check being drawn on a Missouri bank, to be paid here, the state statute regulating the matter of acceptances of such paper applies.

"Sec. 533. Acceptance of Bill of Exchange must be in Writing. No person within this State shall be charged as an acceptor of a bill of exchange unless his acceptance shall be in writing, signed by himself or his lawful agent."

"Sec. 534. Acceptance Written on a Separate Paper will Bind Acceptor, when. If such acceptance be written on a paper other than the bill, it shall not bind the acceptor, except in favor of a person to whom such acceptance shall have been shown, and who upon the faith thereof shall have received the bill for a valuable consideration."

The Statute recognizes, what had already become the established common-law rule, that the acceptance may be written on a paper other than the bill, and of consequence, it may be made by letter, and, if by letter, also by telegram. Phoenix Bank v. Bank of America, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 28; Espy v. First Nat. Bank, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604 [21 L. ed. 947]; Whilden v. Merchants & P. Nat. Bank, 64 Ala. 32, 33.

"The Statute requires the promise to be in writing, but is silent as to the mode of communicating it to the party cashing the draft upon the faith of it. When it is in writing and thus acted upon, its mode of conveyance, whether by telegraph, mail or otherwise, affects no rights, and such effect must be given to it as manifest justice, and the exigencies of commerce, call for in this class of communications." Molson's Bank v. Howard, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Jones & S.) 20.

The material facts disclosed by the petition are that the Muscatine Cattle Company had contracted to sell to one James Tate 1,000 head of cattle at the price of $22,000. In payment, Tate tendered to the company his check for $22,000, drawn on the defendant Bank. Before the vendor would accept said check, and part with his property, and before the plaintiffs would accept the check as payment on the indebtedness of the cattle company to them, the payee named in the check telegraphed to defendant and received from it the answer alleged in the petition. The question raised by the argument on the demurrer is as to whether this correspondence constitutes an acceptance within the meaning of the law-merchant and the Statute, or whether it amounts simply to a promise to accept or pay. Reading the two telegrams together, in the light of the ordinary understanding and acceptance of such terms among commercial men, it does seem to me that the plain meaning and purport of the answer was an acceptance of the check for the sum expressed in the first telegram. The language of the inquiry made in the first telegram clearly indicated that the check had been drawn by Tate on defendant for $22,000; and defendant was asked if it would pay it. It would seem to be a strained construction that the check named was to be sent on merely for acceptance. The answer was that "Tate is good. Send on your paper." If the check had been presented to the Bank in the ordinary way, and the drawee had indorsed thereon the word "Good," undersigned by its proper officer, it would by all the authorities have amounted to a certification of a check. Kopy v. Cincinnati First Nat. Bank, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604 [21 L. ed. 947]; 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 648.

The language "Send on your paper," taken in connection with both telegrams, clearly implies that it is to be sent on for payment, and not merely for acceptance.

In Coolidge v. Payson, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 66 [4 L. ed. 185], Chief Justice Marshall states the rule that "a letter, written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding the person who makes the promise." While in the subsequent case of Boyce v. Edwards, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 111 [7 L. ed. 799], the ruling in Coolidge v. Payson was reviewed, the rule as stated by Chief Justice Marshall was not disturbed where the letter of acceptance applies directly to a particular bill drawn or to be drawn.

By § 535, Rev. Stat. Mo., it is provided that "an unconditional promise in writing to accept a bill before it is drawn shall be deemed an actual acceptance in favor of every person to whom such written promise shall have been shown, and who upon the faith thereof shall have received the bill for a valuable consideration."

It would be difficult to perceive, on principle, what difference there could be in a promise to accept before drawing and the facts as disclosed in the petition. The defendant, in the very nature of such commercial transactions, must have understood that the purpose of the inquiry made of it was to have the payment of the check assured if taken by the party sending the telegram. The answer was shown to the plaintiffs, and in reliance upon the assurance it contained the plaintiffs accepted the check. As well settled in this jurisdiction, the application of the check by the plaintiffs to the indebtedness to them from the cattle company was for a valuable consideration, and constitutes them bona fide holders of the check, and as such the right of action thereon inures to them regardless of any equities between the original parties. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. Nat. Bank of the Republic, 103 U. S. 14-22 [26 L. ed. 61-66]; Pope v. Bank of Albion, 59 Barb. 226; Molson's Bank v. Howard, supra; Whilden v. Merchants & P. Nat. Bank, 64 Ala. 1-30; Freund v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 76 N. Y. 858-858; Johnson v. Clark, 89 N. Y. 216; Coolidge v. Payson, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 66 [4 L. ed. 185].

The conclusion is that the petition does state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer is therefore overruled.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment ousting from office the incumbents of certain municipal offices of Jersey City. Affirmed.

Orestes Cleveland, Mayor of Jersey City, filed a petition in the supreme court for the hearing and determination of a dispute and controversy which had arisen concerning the right or title of certain persons appointed to office in Jersey City under the provisions of the Act approved April 6, 1889, Concerning the Government of Cities of this State.

The case was argued at special term convened in accordance with the provisions of a supplement to said Act, approved April 19, 1889.

The court determined that the persons appointed under the provisions of that Act were the lawful incumbents of the offices, and gave judgment of ouster against the persons holding possession of such offices by force of an election or appointment under the previous law (51 N. The case is further stated in the opinion.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An Act entitled "An Act Concerning the Government of Cities of this State," approved April 6, 1889, vests in the respective mayors of the cities of this State the power to appoint the chief municipal officers, in substitution for the previously existing methods of appointment. The law is made operative only in cities which elect to accept it, the provision therefore being as follows: "That the board of aldermen or common council of any city may by resolution, or the mayor of any city may by proclamation, submit the question of the acceptance or rejection of this Act to the voters of such city at any general or charter election to be held therein, whereof at least two days' notice shall be given by public advertisement in two daily newspapers circulating in such city, and, if a majority of those who shall vote for the acceptance or rejection thereof shall be in favor of the acceptance of this Act, then this Act shall go into effect immediately, and the grant of power herein made to any such city shall be deemed to be accepted by such city, and such city shall be bound by the terms of this Act; provided, however, that no election shall be held under the provisions of this Act after the first day of October, 1890."

At an election held in Jersey City, a majority of the popular vote was cast for the acceptance of this Act, and thereupon the mayor, pursuant to its provisions, filled the municipal offices. This litigation was instituted by the prior incumbents, who contest the validity of the Statute, as well as the legality of the election held under it.

That a law granting municipal powers may be enacted to take effect only on acceptance thereof by the people of the municipality has been too firmly established in this State to be a debatable question. Paterson v. Society for Establishing Useful Mfrs. 24 N. J. L. 835; State v. Morris Co. Court of Common Pleas, 36 N. J. L. 72; State v. Hoagland, 51 N. J. L. 62; State v. Gloucester Co. Circuit Judge, 50 N. J. L. 585.

In the nature and theory of local government, it seems to me that it must necessarily be so. I cannot see how, upon principle, it can make any difference whether the legislative enactment gives every city power to appoint its officers in such manner as it may elect, or provides a specific mode for appointment in every city that may choose to adopt it. The latter is as absolute a declaration of the legislative will, and as complete a law, as the former. In the one case as fully as in the other the legislative Act confers upon the people of the locality the power to select the local officials. The vote does not make the law. It adopts the mode of government which the law submits to acceptance. Whenever a legislative Act, no matter how specific or how general it be, puts it within the power of any political district to exercise a function of local government, such legislation is a complete and perfect declaration of the legislative will, and is not obnoxious to the charge that it delegates the law-making power. It is the subject to which it relates that gives it the character of valid legislation. The form in which it is presented for acceptance is wholly immaterial, so long as it does not contravene the Organic Law in respect to special or local laws.

The alleged vice in the law, mainly relied upon to overthrow it, is that it is local and special, and therefore proscribed by our constitutional provision. In this argument it is an obvious and fundamental fact, which must be ever present in mind, if we would not be misled, that the grant of powers of local government inevitably leads to diversity. The object of delegating powers is to enable local governments to make such diverse laws as they may deem expedient. The grant of such powers implies that diversity is requisite. If uniformity was to be preserved, the Legislature would establish an inflexible and uniform code for all localities, leaving nothing optional. If we hold that the fact that diversity arises out of the use or application of a Legislative Act is destructive of its validity, we must affirm that the Constitution of our State, in its present form, absolutely forbids the delegation of powers of local government. Such a proposition, I think, no one will seriously advocate. Uniformity in results cannot co-exist with the right of local self-government until all men shall be of one mind. No one will assert that an Act is local or special which gives to all the cities of this State the right to establish by ordinance the mode in which their subordinate officers shall be elected. Under such a statute, one city might make the tenure of office a term of years; another, during good behavior; and a third, at the will of the common council. Such diverse results in the execution of the granted power obviously could not outlaw the Act of the Legislature. The authority granted to all is the same. The dissimilarity is in its use,—a dissimilarity inherent in the idea of local government. The uniformity exacted by the constitutional mandate must be sought for, not in the results which flow from the free, unhampered exercise of the granted power of local government, but in the fact that every locality is afforded a like right to adopt and exercise in its own way the same powers which are bestowed upon every other like political body. To the one no privilege must be offered for acceptance which is not extended to the other. The authority given must be the same. It may be executed in a different way or in the same way, at the option of the recipient. That is the uniformity to which the judicial declarations in the adjudged cases in this State must be referred.

One of the conspicuous evils at which this Constitutional Amendment was aimed was, in my judgment, this: That prior to the amendment a few persons could go before the Legislature, and secure the passage of a special law, to promote their own purposes, which might be obnoxious to the body of citizens. In such event, the only remedy was by an appeal to a subsequent Legislature; and that might be too late to wholly repair the mischief. Such enactments are now forestalled by the fact that they cannot be made applicable without being submitted to the approval of the entire body of voters. In this way, the people of every city are left free to select the mode in which they will regulate and conduct their local affairs; and it is this which impresses such legislation with the character of general, and not special, legislation. Gauged by this standard, there is no infirmity in the legislation which is the subject of this controversy. It applies to the entire class. There is no exception. It is held out to the free acceptance of all, and is capable of being accepted or rejected by every city in the State. In determining whether an Act is general or special, we must regard the time of its enactment. If it applies to all cities then in existence, it seems to be a contradiction in terms to say that it is special. To be special, it must exclude some. If it excludes none, and expressly embraces all, it must be general.

But it is insisted that, although the language used in the Statute is general in form, it is so framed that it can apply only to cities having a comptroller, treasurer, collector and the other officers named in the various sections of the Act. Jersey City, it is alleged, is the only city in the State which has all the officers named by the names and titles given in the Act.

Conceding this to be so, the assumption that this legislation can apply to no other city rests upon a manifest misapprehension of its terms.

In 1878 the Legislature passed an Act repealing all Acts providing for the appointment of commissioners by the Senate and General Assembly to regulate municipal affairs. It was conceded that this Act affected Jersey City only, and for that reason its constitutionality was challenged in Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 123. Mr. Justice Dixon, in an opinion the soundness of which has never been questioned, upheld the law, although there happened to be but one individual of the class or one place where it produced effects. The rule he formulated as applicable to this subject is this: "A law framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects, which, having regard to the purposes of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves, is not a special or local law, but a general law."

This subject was reviewed in this court in Hammer v. State, reported in 44 N. J. L. 667. Chancellor Runyon, who delivered the opinion of the court, draws so clearly the line of demarcation between Acts of this character which are valid, and those which are unconstitutional, that there can be little difficulty in classifying them. He says: "The evil which it was intended to remedy was the making of changes by the Legislature in the system of government of municipalities, sometimes at the instance of only a few, and perhaps to the detriment of the many,—changes which were not only frequent and disturbing, but often prejudicial to good government and the interest of taxpayers. . . . Normally, there can be, under our Constitution, no such thing as local or special legislation to regulate the internal affairs of municipalities; but all legislation to that end must be general, and applicable alike to all. Nor can any departure from the rule be justified, except where, by reason of the existence of a substantial difference between municipalities, a general law would be inappropriate to some, while it would be appropriate to and desirable for others. There it would be warranted, not only by the necessities of the situation, but by a reasonable construction of the constitutional provision."

The Act under consideration in that case applied, at most, only to three cities, namely, those "having a board of assessment and revision of taxes," and attempted to legislate the existing officers out of office. This court held that the fact that taxes are assessed by a board of assessors in one or more municipalities did not constitute such a difference between those municipalities and the others, where the taxes are assessed by individual assessors, as to warrant the Legislature in specially interfering in the affairs of the former, to such an extent as it attempted to do. All local governments have necessarily assessors of taxes, and therefore the mere name by which such officers are designated cannot constitute a substantial basis for classification.

I quote further from the opinion of Chancellor Runyon in the Hammer Case to show that this court rested its decision upon the specific reason above given, and that it intended to exclude the inference that it was to have a wider application. Chancellor Runyon says: "To justify separate legislation for towns or counties, there must be something in the subject matter of the enactment to call for and necessitate such legislation. As, for example, there are in certain cities officers, such as superintendents of wharves, etc., who exercise functions peculiar to such cities. There, if the Legislature interferes at all in reference to such officers, or the subjects of their functions, it must be by legislation not appropriate to other towns, and therefore, in such cases, and to that extent, separate legislation would be proper. But the assessment and revision of taxes is not peculiar to towns which have boards of assessment and revision. They are common to all." There can be no doubt that if the Act of April 5, 1878, had provided that all assessors, as well as members of boards of assessment and revision of taxes, should be appointed as in that Act directed, it would have been upheld in the Hammer Case. Its vice was found in the fact that it did not include officers who performed duties like to those of boards of assessment and revision of taxes, and did not, therefore, apply to the entire class.

If we follow the true line marked out in the case cited, I think we cannot fail to distinguish between the principal case and that of Hammer v. State, and the case of McDermott v. Seymour, 47 N. J. L. 174, mem. The first section of the Act of April 6, 1889, provides "that in the cities in this State the mayors thereof, respectively, shall appoint all city comptrollers, city treasurers and city collectors, in lieu of, and to be substituted for, and to act in place of, and who shall in each case, respectively, be invested with, and shall perform, all the powers and duties of, any such officers, by whatsoever title they may be designated, now authorized by law to act therein."

In the first place, it must be observed that this section does not require that a comptroller, a treasurer and a collector shall be appointed by the mayor of every city. The language used is not that in every city a comptroller shall be appointed, but in the cities of this State the mayor shall appoint all comptrollers. The meaning of it is that in every city where there was an officer invested by law with the functions of a comptroller, no matter by what title he was designated, the mayor should have the power of appointing him. So with regard to a city treasurer and a city collector. The draftsman of the Act was careful to exclude the idea that he intended to adopt as a basis of classification the mere name of the offices. He guardedly preserved the substance, by providing that in every city the mayor shall appoint the officer who exercises these functions, without regard to the title by which he is designated in the previously existing law. In the minor cities of this State there is no officer corresponding to a comptroller. There is none invested with like duties. That is an office created by statute, with special duties, and adapted only to the necessities of the larger municipalities. Under this Act a comptroller would be appointed for Jersey City and Newark, but could not be appointed for some of the lesser places. But this fact does not render the Act special or local. A comptroller, like a superintendent of wharves, exercises functions peculiar to certain cities,—a peculiarity existing by reason of previous laws. There, in the language of the Hammer Case, "if the Legislature interferes at all in reference to such officers, or the subjects of their functions, it must be by legislation not appropriate to other towns, and therefore, in such cases, and to that extent, separate legislation would be proper."

The second section of the Act provides that, in lieu of the method of appointing or electing assessors or tax commissioners in any city, there shall be appointed by the mayor thereof a board of three tax commissioners. The duties and powers of these commissioners are clearly defined in the Act. This obviously takes this case out of the rule which condemned the legislation in the Hammer Case. Every city in the State has either assessors or tax commissioners; and in every city, therefore, the appointment can be made.

One more reference will be sufficient to show the purport and effect of the Act. Section 6 provides that in every city of this State the mayor thereof shall appoint a corporation counsel and a corporation attorney, who shall discharge the duties that now devolve upon similar officers and offices in each of such cities respectively. Looking at the entire Act, I am of opinion that this section is fairly susceptible of the construction that in cities where there was, before the passage of this Act, both a corporation counsel and a corporation attorney, both officers should be appointed by the mayor under this Act, but, where there was only a corporation attorney, that office alone was to be filled by the mayor. In such case the corporation counsel would exercise functions peculiar to certain cities, and would, like a comptroller, be the appropriate subject of special legislation. But, if this interpretation cannot be maintained, the result would be that both officers must be appointed where but one previously existed. This might impose an unnecessary burden; but that is a question of policy and does not affect the constitutionality of the Act. In my judgment, the purport and effect of this enactment is that all the cities of this State shall have the privilege of electing whether they will choose in the manner previously appointed by law, or by the appointment of their respective mayors, all those officers who perform the duties and functions of the officers specified in the said Act, by whatever name they may be called in their respective charters. The grant of power is alike to all. Nothing is conceded to one that is withheld from the other. No one would challenge the validity of an Act conferring upon all cities the right to choose their officers in such manner as might be ordained by the corporate body. A law is equally free from objection which permits an election between two specified modes of appointment. As has been shown, the test is not whether diversity arises in the use of the granted power, but whether any of the class to which the legislation applies are excluded by the Statute from the enjoyment of the powers and privileges which it grants. The fact that some cities are not in a condition to accept the Act does not arise out of any special or local character of the Act itself, but out of the dissimilarity of the various charters which came into existence before the recent amendments to the Constitution. If the test is that every Act submitted for acceptance must be equally applicable and beneficial to all localities, it will be impossible to frame statutes to be submitted for adoption which will not be infirm. The framers of the Constitution could not have intended to apply such a test; otherwise, provision would have been made for abrogating all the then existing charters, that a uniform system for local governments might be provided by subsequent legislation. The amendments were to be applied to legislation for cities with charters of the most dissimilar character. It must have been apparent, upon the least reflection, that further legislation in the exigencies of the future would become necessary, and that precisely the same mode of executive powers could not be adapted to all cities. There appear to be but two methods of applying this amendment in accordance with any reasonable interpretation of its purpose. The one is to repeal all charters, and create strict uniformity; the other is to offer appropriate legislation to the acceptance of the entire class. Experience has demonstrated the futility of attempting to secure the adoption of the former course. The latter method is in strict accordance with the theory of local government, affording the widest range for the exercise of the popular will in all local affairs. The fact that it is left by the Statute to the discretion of the board of aldermen, or to the common council, or to the mayor of the city, to provide for an election, cannot affect the character of the legislation. That duty must be committed to some tribunal; and, so long as the like opportunity is given to all cities, the legislation is general, and not special. The local governments alone are responsible for a just exercise of discretion by their officials, and a want of it cannot be charged to the imperfection of the Statute. The necessity for submission to the expression of the popular will in every case will stand as a guard against vicious legislation under such a system. If that shall fail to be effective in some instances, the answer is that no mind has been sufficiently astute to devise a scheme by which even its promoter could hope to secure the highest wisdom in the formulation of positive laws.

During the struggle which has been going on, while the law on this subject has been in a formative state, to find the true, practical solution of a question which is surrounded by many difficulties, our adjudications have tended to the result which has been reached in the judgment of the court below. In my opinion, that construction presents the only practicable view which can, in conformity to reasonable rules of interpretation, be taken of this branch of the fundamental law, and it should be adhered to. It cannot be rejected without overturning the previous decision of this court.

With regard to the proviso in section 83 of the Act, that no election shall be held after October 1, 1890, it need only be said that the decision of this case is in no way dependent on it. It is entirely separable from the body of the Statute, and cannot taint or invalidate the main provisions, especially in view of the legislative declaration in section 28, "that in case, for any reason, any section or provision of this Act shall be questioned in any court, or shall be held to be unconstitutional or invalid, the same shall not affect any other section or provision of this Act." All that is decided in this case is that the mayor had power to fill the municipal offices, in virtue of the Act of April 6, 1889.

I agree to the view taken in the court below as to the various objections which have been urged against the legality of the proceedings taken in Jersey City under this Act, and also with regard to the supplemental Act of April 19, 1889. The view of the supreme court on those questions is summarized as follows: (1) The Statute of April 6, 1889, authorized the respective mayors of the cities of this State, by proclamation, to call an election to decide upon the acceptance or rejection of the Act. Held, that in case the mayor was absent, and the charter, in such contingency, vested the powers of the mayoralty in a specified officer, such officer could proclaim the election. (2) A misrecital of some of the provisions of the Act in the proclamation of an election held not devoid of legal effect, the Act not requiring their insertion in the proclamation, and there being nothing to show that the error affected the election. (3) It is competent for the Legislature to provide for the speedy determination of the controversies relating to the title of municipal offices, the Statute securing to the incumbents of such offices the same rights, in substance, that they would have had if the procedure had been by quo warranto.

assume that the means of access provided are reasonably safe.

1. At the station at which the plaintiff alighted from the cars the track was upon an embankment above the public road, over which the railroad was carried by a bridge. The Company had a depot building for passengers on the north side, on a level with the track, at the end of which there were steps for the accommodation of passengers, leading down to the public road. On the other side of the track there was another stairway resting on the embankment of the railroad, and on the Company's grounds, leading also to the street. This stairway was built and kept in repair by private persons residing in the neighborhood, for their own convenience, as a means of access to and from the station. This stairway had been in use by passengers generally. In use as well as appearance this passageway appeared to have been provided as a means of access to and from the depot grounds. The train reached the depot at 9:35, on a dark and stormy night. There were no lights in the depot, and no person there to direct passengers the way to leave the depot grounds. The plaintiff, in endeavoring to go to this stairway for the purpose of getting to the public road, fell over some timbers, and was injured. Held:

(a) That the way of passage taken by the plaintiff being there by the recognition and assent of the Company, and held out by it as one of the passageways for the entrance and exit of passengers to the public street, the plaintiff was justified in using it. As against a passenger injured in using the passageway, it is immaterial at whose expense the stairway was built and kept in repair.

(b) That the Company was not absolved from the duty to keep this passageway reasonably safe by the fact that it had provided another passageway, which the plaintiff might have taken.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Einma Trautwein, the defendant in error, on Sunday, the 11th of September, 1887, was a passenger on a train of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company from New York City to Lyndhurst, N. J. She took passage in the Company's train, leaving New York at 9 o'clock in the evening, and reached Lyndhurst about 9:35 P. M. She alighted from the train, and in leaving the station to reach the street fell over some railroad ties, and received injuries for which this suit was brought. On a verdict for the plaintiff below, and judgment thereon, this writ of error was brought, and errors assigned upon the rulings of the trial judge. The Act concerning vice and immorality provides that no traveling, worldly employment, or business, ordinary or servile labor, or work either upon land or water (works of necessity and charity excepted), shall be done, performed or practiced by any person or persons within this State on Sunday. The penalty prescribed for violating this Statute is the forfeiture of $1 for every such offense, to be recovered upon conviction, and paid for the use of the poor of the township in which the offense was committed. Rev. p. 1237, § 1.

The section contains a proviso that it should be lawful for any railroad company in the State to run one passenger train each way over its road on Sunday for the accommodation of the citizens of the State. This proviso has the effect not only to give to the company a right to run the specified trains on Sunday but also confers the right upon the citizen to use such trains for ordinary travel. Smith v. New York S. & W. R. Co. 46 N. J. L. 7.

As between the company and a passenger on its train, it would seem that the latter would have the right to assume that the train on which he is received as a passenger is the train run under the protection of the proviso, whatever effect the duplication of trains might have in subjecting the company to the penalty.

There is also some evidence that the purpose of the plaintiff in going to New York on that day was to obtain from a physician a prescription and get medicine for her mother, a purpose that would probably exempt the plaintiff from the penalty prescribed by the Act. But an instruction to the jury, put on record in the bill of exceptions, put the plaintiff's case on a broader ground. The trial judge assumed that the Company was running this train in violation of the Statute, and that the plaintiff was also traveling in violation of the Statute, and instructed the jury that these circumstances did not debar the plaintiff of her right to recover. If this proposition be sound, it will not be necessary to consider the rulings of the trial judge in construing the proviso, and with respect to the purpose of the plaintiff's journey on that day on her right to recover.

In Massachusetts, Maine and Vermont it has been held adversely to the legal proposition adopted by the trial judge. In the federal courts, and in the courts of other sister States, the decisions have been in accordance with the ruling of the trial judge. A contract to carry, made on Sunday, or to be performed on Sunday, is by force of the Statute illegal and void. No action could be maintained for the breach of such a contract, nor for services performed under it, where the right of action rests exclusively upon a contract, express or implied. Reeves v. Butcher, 31 N. J. L. 224.

It is also clear that a plaintiff will fail where, to make a cause of action, he is compelled to rely upon an illegal contract. But the duty of persons engaged in these public employments to safely and securely carry is independent of contract. It is a duty imposed by law from considerations of public policy, and arises from the fact that persons or property are received in the course of the business of such employments. Marshall v. York, N. & B. R. Co. 11 C. B. 655; Martin v. Great Indian P. R. Co. L. R. 3 Exch. 9; Gladwell v. Steggall, 5 Bing. N. C. 733; Pippin v. Sheppard, 11 Price, 400; Carroll v. Staten Island R. Co. 58 N. Y. 126.

In Austin v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 442, a suit was brought against a railroad company by a child three years and two months old. The plaintiff's mother, carrying the plaintiff in her arms, took a ticket for herself, but not for the child, for passage on the defendant's railway. In the course of the journey an accident happened, and the plaintiff's leg was broken. In a suit for this injury the defendant contended that it was under no contract with the plaintiff, and that it carried the plaintiff without any hire or fare paid for carrying him. The action was held to be maintainable. Blackburn, J., said that "the right which a passenger by railway has to be carried safely does not depend on his having made a contract, but the fact of his being a passenger casts a duty on the company to carry him safely." The English cases to this effect are cited and commented on in Foulles v. Metropolitan Dist. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 157-169.

The rule may be considered as settled that a railroad company, having accepted a passenger, is under an obligation to take due and reasonable care for his safety, and that that obligation arises by implication of law, independent of contract. To give the plaintiff a standing in court to sue for the injury, she has no need of the aid of a contract which was illegal.

Nor was the plaintiff's violation of the Sunday Law, in a legal sense, the cause of her injury. It was only the occasion for an injury by the defendant's wrongful act, and hence her wrong-doing did not contribute to the injury in such a sense as to deprive her of her right of action. It was merely a condition, and not a contributory cause, of the injury.

Thus in White v. Lang, 128 Mass. 598, it was held that if a person, while unlawfully traveling on Sunday, is injured by the assault of a dog, the act of traveling was not a contributory cause of the injury, and that he could, notwithstanding his own violation of the law, maintain his action against the owner of the dog. In sustaining the suit, the court said: "If a person who is at the time acting in violation of law receives an injury caused by the wrongful or negligent act of another, he may recover therefor if his own illegal act was merely a condition, and not a contributory cause, of the injury. . . . It is true that, if he were not traveling, he would not have received the injury; but the act of traveling is a condition, and not a contributory cause, of the injury." The 92d section of the Road Act (Rev. 1012) provides that all wagons and other wheel carriages of every kind or description, traveling or passing on the highways within this State, belonging to residents therein, shall track on the ground not less than four feet and ten inches, under the penalty of $5 for each offense, to be recovered, one moiety of which is to be paid to the overseer of the highways, and the other to the informer. The penalty in this Statute, like that in the Sunday Law, is prescribed for the purpose of prohibition, and not revenue, and a citizen traveling a public highway with a wagon of a narrower track than that named in the Statute is engaged in violating the law. In some parts of this State the use of pleasure and business wagons of the New York gauge, which is narrower than that of our Statute, is quite common. In collision cases on public highways or at railroad crossings, the defense that plaintiff is debarred of his action on the ground of contributory negligence, for the reason that the wagon which he was driving did not conform to the statutory gauge, has never occurred to counsel, who are usually astute in discovering grounds of defense under the doctrine of contributory negligence. In my experience, it has never been thought worth while to inquire in such cases as to the track of the wagon injured or destroyed in such a collision, and a defense on that ground would obviously receive no consideration. The cases sustaining the ruling of the trial judge on this head are numerous. They are cited and approved by leading text writers in discussing this subject. Bishop, Non-Cont. Law, §§ 63, 64; 2 Wood, Railway Law, § 318; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 31; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 178, *155 et seq., and notes.

On principle, as well as by the weight of authority, the ruling of the trial judge was correct.

The station at which this accident happened was located upon an embankment elevated above the public road, which crosses the railroad under a bridge carrying the railroad over the public road. The Company had a depot building for the reception of passengers on a level with the track on the north side of its track. At the west end of this building there were steps for the accommodation of passengers, leading down to the public road. On the south side of the embankment there was a stairway leading also to the public road, built by private persons residing in that neighborhood for their own convenience and used by passengers as means of access to and from the station. The Company did not construct or keep this stairway in repair. The stairway rested against the embankment of the railroad. It was on the Company's grounds, and led to the public street. From the depot building to the top of this stairway there was a gravel walk, and the employes of the Company testified that the passage was kept free and open and unobstructed. It was apparently a way provided as a means of access to and from the Company's depot grounds. On the occasion when the plaintiff received her injury the train reached the station at 9:35 P. M. The night was dark and stormy. There was no light in or about the depot building, and no person there to direct passengers as to the way to leave the depot grounds. The plaintiff, in crossing the tracks on her way to the stairway, fell over some timber, and received the injury for which she sues. The plaintiff testified that the only time she was at that depot before that night she used this stairway, and that she knew of no other passage to or from the depot. The judge submitted to the jury the question whether the plaintiff was justified in using this way out from the depot, in this language: "Did the plaintiff do right in taking this way out? That depends upon the question whether this way of passage was there by the recognition, procurement or assent of the Company, as a means for the entrance and exit of passengers. Proof of such approval by the Company, or of its recognition, need not be made by any resolution or declaration of the Company, or of its agents. If to persons of ordinary understanding and discernment it appeared to be such a way, and by the Company it was allowed to remain and be in use by passengers going to or from trains, anyone going to and from a train as a passenger was authorized to make use of it. If the Company permitted it to be done openly, so that persons of reasonable judgment and discernment would conclude it to be a means of entrance and exit, then any passenger was authorized to take it and use it. It is submitted to you as a question of fact whether, to an ordinary observer, this was held out as one of the passageways from the depot to the public street. If so, any passenger, unwarned, might use it as such. If you should so find, it is entirely immaterial who built the stairway or who kept it in repair."

The duty of a railroad company, as a carrier of passengers, does not end when the passenger is safely carried to the place of his destination. The company must also provide safe means for access to and from its station for the use of passengers, and passengers have a right to assume that the means of access provided are reasonably safe. If there be two ways, one of which is faulty in construction or repair, a passenger using it, and injured by its faulty condition, will not be debarred of his action, although the other, which he might have used, was safer. Longmore v. Great Western R. Co. 19 C. B. N. S. 188.

A company, having provided one safe and convenient way of ingress and egress to and from its station, may, as contended for by the Company's counsel, suffer private persons, for their own convenience, to have and use another way of access across its depot grounds, and it may be that those who use such a way will do so at their peril, if they have notice of the private character of the way.

But that is not this case. The passageway taken by the plaintiff led to the public street, and had every indication of having been provided for use by the public, as a way to and from the station. Under the charge of the court and the finding of the jury, it must be taken to be the fact that this way of passage was there by recognition, procurement or consent of the Company, and that by sufferance and use it had obtained such an appearance of a passageway passengers were invited to use, as that persons of reasonable judgment and discernment would conclude it to be a means of entrance and egress. It was of a passageway having these characteristics that the judge said that it was immaterial who built the stairway, or who kept it in repair.

In Beard v. Connecticut & P. R. Co., 48 Vt. 101, there was a stairway for passengers through the company's depot building, and also a stairway at each end of the passenger platform. The stairway at the north end was open at the top, and there was nothing to indicate that it was not for the use of passengers. In fact, that stairway was built by an express company, and was used exclusively by the express company for removing express freight, and opened into the street, over a platform for loading and unloading express wagons. The plaintiff, a passenger, in attempting to pass down the stairway in the dark, fell and was injured. For this injury she sued the railroad company. The defendant's counsel requested the trial judge to charge the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless she showed that the lower platform, in stepping from which she was injured, was on the defendant's premises. The court declined to so instruct the jury, but told the jury that the plaintiff, to recover, must establish that the company was guilty of negligence in leaving the stairway where it left the upper platform open, and without any guard or notice to warn passengers that the stairway was not to be used as a way of passage to the street below, and that she was injured by such negligence or want of care on the part of the defendant without any neglect or want of care on her part contributing to the injury. This instruction was held to be correct. The court, in sustaining the instructions of the trial judge, speaking of the likelihood of a stranger to regard that stairway as designed to furnish a safe way of getting to the street, said: "If not so designed, and it was unsafe to a stranger for such a purpose in the darkness, it was the duty of the defendant to forewarn against injury by closing up the head of the stairs, or by notifying in some effectual way against using those stairs for getting to the street. . . . In view of the unquestionable law, the request to which the exception was taken seems frivolous. The open stairs on the margin of the platform led the plaintiff, without fault on her part, to the point of harm. . . . The fact that the bottom of the pitfall on which the plaintiff landed, and thereby received hurt, was beyond the line of ownership of the defendant, neither relieves the duty, nor mitigates the fault, of the defendant."

In the case in hand, contributory negligence by the plaintiff was negatived by the jury. The case is here solely on the use of the passageway by the plaintiff, and the duty of the Company with regard to its condition and safety. We think the instruction of the trial judge on that subject was correct. A passageway having the characteristics mentioned by the judge became by the Company's act a passageway which passengers were invited to use, with respect to which the Company was under a duty to have it kept reasonably safe for use.

A passenger using the way under such an invitation was not bound to inquire by whose contributions the stairway was erected or maintained. Nor was the Company absolved from its duty in the premises by the fact that it erected and maintained at its own expense another way of exit. The other exceptions on the record have been examined.

We find no error in the conduct of the trial, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Affirmed unanimously.

v.

Presley G. DYE and Sadie Nickerson.

(....Ind....)

1. A valid gift causa mortis is made where one confined to his bed by a sickness which soon proves fatal, and who is fully apprised of the probable fatal termination of the malady, instructs a person to whom he has intrusted the keys to a private box in a bank vault, which box contains money, etc., to count therefrom a certain amount in gold coin and bank bills and place it in a separate package labeled as the property of a certain third person, and to deliver it to him together with a package already so labeled in the event of the donor's death, and upon being informed that the packages are prepared replicas approvingly, and never again takes possession of the keys, although the money is permitted to remain in the donor's box until his death, and although the donee never constitutes the depository his trustee nor even knows of the intended gift or of the delivery.

2. The person to whom the keys are delivered and who receives the instructions in such case is a trustee for the donee and not the agent of the donor, and hence is not incompetent to testify in regard to the transaction after the donor's death.

NOTE.—Gifts causa mortis.

Gifts causa mortis are of a mixed nature, resembling gifts inter vivos in the essential requisite of delivery, and resembling legacies in being subject to the debts of decedent, and in being ambulatory or revocable. Bloomer v. Bloomer, 2 Bradf. 340; Rhodes v. Childs, 64 Pa. 18; Roper, Leg. 2; Redf. Wills, § 42; Jones v. Brown, 34 N. H. 439.

To establish such a gift the common law requires clear and unmistakable proof, not only of an intention to give, but of an actual gift perfected by delivery. Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 324.

Cases of such donations are exceptions not to be extended by way of analogy. Headley v. Kirby, 18 Pa. 325.

To make a valid gift causa mortis, it must be made during some illness or peril of the donor, and in contemplation and expectation of death from that illness or peril, and death must ensue therefrom. Parcher v. Suco & B. Sav. Bank, 3 New Eng. Rep. 220, 78 Me. 470; Weston v. Hight, 17 Me. 287; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17.

The requisites to constitute a valid gift in view of death, are: the intention of the donor to part with the ownership, established by clear and precise evidence; and a delivery appropriate to the nature of the thing given. Madeira's App. (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 312.

An intention to give is sufficiently manifest to constitute a valid gift causa mortis, from the fact that a person in extremis takes out a package of bonds from beneath his pillow, and hands them to another, saying in substance, "These bonds are for you." Vandor v. Roach, 73 Cal. 614.

But where before death, intestate gave a box containing notes to his daughter, to be opened after his death, and divided between "you children," and surrendered the key to her, which she delivered to her husband; and after death of intestate she took the box, and did not divide the notes but returned them to the administrator:—Held, not a delivery so as to constitute a gift. Gano v. Fisk, 1 West. Rep. 501, 43 Ohio St. 463.

Nor is it a complete donatio causa mortis where a depositor during her last illness delivered her savings-bank book to a third person, saying that if she died the money was for her sister in Ireland. Walsh's App. 1 L. R. A. 535, 129 Pa. 177.

So where a father placed his promissory note in the hands of a third party with directions to keep it in his possession until six months after the death of the maker, and then deliver it to the payee, it is not good either as a gift causa mortis or as a bequest. Sanborn v. Sanborn (N. H.), 18 Atl. Rep. 223, 65 N. H. —.

A certificate of deposit may be the subject of a gift causa mortis, and if delivered by the donor during her last illness, in anticipation of death, to a third person for the use of the donee, the title passes upon her death although it was payable to the donor's order. Conner v. Root, 11 Colo. 183.

Under the Colorado statutes, coverture is no obstacle to making such gift. Ibid.

Any act on the part of the owner of a chose in action, showing not only a present intention to transfer, but that he regarded himself as having carried his intention into effect, is sufficient without written evidence of the transaction; and there is no difference between gifts causa mortis and gifts inter vivos. Love v. Francis, 5 West. Rep. 753, 68 Mich. 181. See Barker v. Frye, 75 Me. 29; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 55 Vt. 325; Eastman v. Woronoco Sav. Bank, 136 Mass. 208; Scott v. Berkshire Sav. Bank, 140 Mass. 157; Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602 (27 L. ed. 500).

A bill of sale executed to his niece shortly before his death by an intestate who had previously had two strokes of paralysis, containing a clause empowering him to revoke the transfer at any time during his life, the instrument and the subject matter thereof being delivered to his attorney, who, after his death, delivered them to the niece,—is a gift causa mortis, and shows a clear intent that the niece should have the benefit of the gift unless revoked during his life. Williams v. Guile, 6 L. R. A. 366, 117 N. Y. 343.

Under the law in force in the provinces of Mexico during the years 1832 and 1833, it was necessary that donatio causa mortis be solemnized with substantially the same formalities as testaments, and should be made before witnesses other than women, who were not competent. Morales v. Fisk, 66 Tex. 189.

A gift causa mortis is an assignment perfected by delivery which debars the donor from revocation. Bond v. Bunting, 78 Pa. 210; Gray's Estate, 1 Pa. 327; Crawford's App. 61 Pa. 52.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County in favor of defendants in an action by certain residuary legatees to recover possession of certain money claimed by defendants as a gift causa mortis from the testator. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. J. Seary, J. A. Abbett, and S. M. Ralston for appellants.

Messrs. C. E. Wesner, R. W. Harrison and B. S. Higgins for appellees.

Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the special finding of facts that William J. Devol, late of Boone County, died testate on the 6th day of December, 1886, leaving an estate of the probable value of $30,000, and leaving one brother living and the descendants of three deceased brothers, as his only heirs. At, and for a long time prior to, his death, the testator had been the President of the First National Bank of Lebanon. During this time he had a tin box which he kept in a private drawer in the vault of the bank safe, and in this he kept stocks, bonds, money and other valuables belonging to him personally. Both the box and the drawer were kept locked, and no one had access to it but the testator. On the 15th day of November, 1886, being in failing health, he went South, returning to his home on the 2d day of December following, very sick. From that time until he died, which was four days after he returned, he was confined to his bed, and while he did not wholly despair of recovery, he fully realized the dangerous condition he was in, and was apprised of the probable fatal termination of his malady. Before going South, he intrusted the keys to his box and private drawer in the safe to Mr. Lane, the cashier of the bank, and these remained in the custody of Mr. Lane from that time until after the testator's death.

On the day following the one on which he returned from the South, while sick and propped up in bed, the testator declared to Mr. Lane that it had always been his purpose to give Presley G. Dye, who was a cousin, $5,000, either in cash or bank stock, and that he had put $2,000 in gold in a bag and marked the name of the latter upon it, and left it in the tin box in the vault. He then directed Lane to go to the bank and count out $3,000 more in gold coin, and put it in a sack and mark it as the other sack was marked, and that he should also count out $1,000 in currency and place it in an envelope, for Mrs. Nickerson, and put her name upon it. He then directed that in case of his death the sacks and packages should be delivered by Lane to the parties indicated by the writing thereon. The gold coin and currency were counted out of the tin box and placed in sacks and in a package, and marked by Lane as directed, after which the latter informed the testator that his directions had been carried out, to which he replied approvingly.

The sacks containing the gold coin and the package with the currency remained in the box and drawer until after the testator's death, 7 L. R. A.

Lane retaining the keys. At the time of the testator's death the tin box was found to contain, in addition to other large sums of money, a sack containing $2,000, marked in the handwriting of the testator as follows: "$2,000. This belongs to P. G. Dye, 11-15-1886."

The controversy here is between Presley G. Dye and Mrs. Nickerson on the one hand, the former claiming the two sacks of gold coin, the latter claiming the package containing the currency, and certain residuary legatees under the will of the testator, who assert the invalidity of the gift, and claim the whole fund as part of the residue of the testator's estate.

A gift causa mortis is consummated where a person in peril of death, and under the apprehension of approaching dissolution from an existing disorder, delivers or causes to be delivered to another, or affords the other the means of obtaining possession of, any personal goods for his own use, upon the express or implied condition that in case the donor shall be delivered from the peril of death, the gift shall be defeated.

Blackstone defines donatio causa mortis to be "a gift in prospect of death when a person in sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered to another the possession of any personal goods to keep as his own in case of the owner's death."

The chief distinction between gifts inter vivos, and those of the character here in question is that, while the former are consummated by delivery, the title to the property is irrevocably vested, while in the latter the title is ambulatory and inchoate until the death of the donor occurs.

The concurrence of three things is essential to the consummation of a gift causa mortis: (1) the thing given must have been of the personal goods of the donor; (2) it must have been given while the latter was in peril of death, or while he was under the apprehension of impending dissolution from an existing malady; and (3) the possession of the thing given must have been actually or constructively delivered to the donee, or to someone for his use, with the intention that the title should then vest, conditioned upon the death of the donor, leaving sufficient assets, in addition, to pay his debts. 8 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 1349-1354.

A mere unexecuted purpose, however clearly or forcibly expressed, so long as it rests merely in intention, is not effectual. The intention must not only have been manifested, but in addition, in order to consummate the gift, the donor must have transferred the possession of the thing to the donee in person, or to someone for his use, under such circumstances as that the person to whom delivery is made is thenceforward affected with a trust or duty in the donee's behalf. Smith v. Ferguson, 90 Ind. 229; Wilcox v. Matteson, 53 Wis. 23; Gano v. Fisk, 43 Ohio St. 462, 1 West. Rep. 501; Walsh's App. 122 Pa. 177, 1 L. R. A. 535.

No particular form of words is necessary to give effect to the transaction, if the intention of the donor sufficiently appears, and the intention to give is either accompanied with or followed by acts requisite to constitute a valid delivery. Kentston v. Lecca, 54 N. H. 24; Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 184; Coleman v. Parker, 114

Mass. 30; Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 824; Clough v. Clough, 117 Mass. 88.

The title of the donee in gifts causa mortis is of an inchoate character until the death of the donor occurs; but notwithstanding this, where the nature of the gift admits of it, a complete manual transfer of the possession of the subject should take place, and the transaction should be accompanied by words, signs or a writing adequately expressive of the donor's intention. Flood, Wills of Pers. Prop. 8.

It is well settled, however, that the delivery need not be made to the donee personally, but may be made to another as his agent or trustee. A delivery thus made is as effectual as though it had been made directly to the donee. Thus, in Mitroy v. Lord, 4 DeG. F. & J. 284, Lord Chief Justice Turner said: "I take the law of this court to be well settled that in order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settler must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property and render the settlement binding upon him. He may, of course, do this by transferring the property to the persons for whom he intends to provide, and the provision will then be effectual; and it will be equally effective if he transfers the property to a trustee for the purpose of the settlement, or declares that he himself holds it in trust for those purposes, and if the property be personal, the trust may, I apprehend, be declared either in writing or by parol. Martin v. Funk, supra; Beal v. Crowley, 59 Cal. 665; Hill v. Stevenson, 68 Me. 864, 18 Am. Rep. 231; Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512; Merritt v. Morrison, 78 Ky. 672.

It has been held that if delivery is made to a third person, with instructions to deliver to the intended donee at the death of the donor, the latter retaining dominion over it meanwhile, the delivery is ineffectual because the third person in such a case becomes merely the agent or bailee of the donor. If, however, the delivery is made to a third person for the use of the donee, or under such circumstances as indicate that the donor relinquishes all right to the possession or control of the thing given, and intends to vest a present title in the donee, the gift will be sustained. Farquharson v. Cave, 2 Coll. Ch. 856, 15 L. J. N. S. Ch. 187; Flood, Wills of Pers. Prop. 28.

Where one, in view of impending dissolution, clearly and intelligently manifests an intention to make a present gift of personal property to another, and in consummation of his intention makes such delivery to a third person for the use of the intended donee as he is then capable of making, considering the character and situation of the property, the person to whom delivery is thus made will be presumed, in the absence of contravening circumstances, to take the property as the trustee of the intended donee, and not merely as the agent of the donor. Shackelford v. Brown, 89 Mo. 546; Michener v. Dale, 23 Pa. 59; Sessions v. Mosely, 4 Cush. 87.

Thus it has been said: "The death-bed delivery to a third person for the donee, which takes effect, is essentially a delivery, not to an agent of the donor, but to a trustee for the donee." 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 176; Bouts v. Ellis, 7 L. R. A.

17 Beav. 121; Grimes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17; Borneman v. Sidlinger, 15 Me. 429; Drury v. Smith, 1 P. Wms. 404.

Expressions are sometimes found in the books to the effect that gifts causa mortis are not favored in law because of the opportunity which they afford for the perpetration of frauds upon the estates of deceased persons by means of perjury and false swearing; but gifts of the character of those in question are not to be held contrary to public policy, nor do they rest under the disfavor of the law, when the facts are clearly and satisfactorily shown which make it appear that they were freely and intelligently made. Ellis v. Secor, 81 Mich. 145.

While every case must be brought within the general rule upon the points essential to such a gift, yet, as the circumstances under which donations mortis causa are made must of necessity be infinite in variety, each case must be determined upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances. Dickeschied v. Exchange Bank, 25 W. Va. 841; Kiss v. Weaver, 94 N. C. 274, 55 Am. Rep. 601.

The rule requiring delivery, either actual or symbolical, must be maintained, but its application is to be mitigated and applied according to the relative importance of the subject of the gift and the condition of the donor.

The intention of a donor in peril of death, when clearly ascertained and fairly consummated within the meaning of well-established rules, is not to be thwarted by a narrow and illiberal construction of what may have been intended for and deemed by him a sufficient delivery. The rule which requires delivery of the subject of the gift is not to be enforced arbitrarily. Stephenson v. King, 81 Ky. 425, 50 Am. Rep. 172.

It clearly appears, from the facts found in the present case, that the sacks containing the gold coin, as well as the package in which the currency was sealed, were delivered to the cashier of the bank for the use of the intended donees. Each parcel of money contained written upon it what in effect amounted to a declaration of a trust in favor of the person who was indicated to be the owner of its contents. The money was carefully counted and placed in packages, thus separating it from all the other money and valuables of the donor. Upon each parcel or package appeared a written declaration, made by or at the request of the donor, indicating as plainly as language could, the intention of the latter in respect to the title and ownership of the property. The character of the property was such that no prudent person would have directed its removal from the vault of the bank. The donor had relinquished the key to his private drawer and tin box to the cashier of the bank, thereby effectually surrendering, so far as could be, all dominion over the property, and affording to the donees the means of obtaining possession of it.

Without pausing to review the authorities, it is sufficient to say that where property is delivered to a third person, for the use of another, as a gift causa mortis, and its delivery is accompanied by a written declaration, clearly indicating that it is delivered for the use or upon a trust for an intended donee, or where a death-bed delivery is made in the presence of witnesses who are disinterested and called for the purpose, the intention of the donor should not be permitted to fail by a narrow and illiberal construction, in case a delivery corresponding with the condition of the donor and the situation of the property was actually made. Ellis v. Seccor, supra; Williams v. Guile, 117 N. Y. 848, 6 L. R. A. 866, 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 179.

Our conclusion is that the facts found show a valid delivery to the cashier for the use of the donees, and that the delivery was made in view of impending death.

The conclusion having already been reached that the cashier of the bank was not the agent of the donor, it follows that he was not incompetent to testify, even if the appellant's contention should be conceded that, as the agent of the donor, he would have been incompetent.

It may not be amiss to say that it was not necessary that the donees should have constituted the cashier of the bank their bailee or trustee, nor that they should have known of the intended gift, or of the delivery, in order to make it an effectual delivery to him as their trustee. The gift being beneficial to them, their acceptance of it is presumed until it is renounced. Bladel v. Locke, 52 N. H. 238; Darland v. Taylor, 52 Iowa, 508; Trouell v. Carraway, 104 Meisk. 104.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK of Indianapolis.

(....Ind....)

1. One who accepts a certified check in the usual course of business does not assume the risk of the solvency of the bank upon which it is drawn, but in case it proves insolvent he may look to the drawer for payment.
2. The acceptance by a creditor of a certified check from his debtor does not ipso facto constitute a payment of the debt.
3. The mere acceptance by a creditor of a certified check from his debtor does not constitute a novation.

NOTE.—Payment by check.

A check received for a debt is merely a conditional payment. Kilpatrick v. Home Bldg. & L. Assn. 11 Cent. Rep. 430, 119 Pa. 80; Cannonsburgh Iron Co. v. Union Nat. Bank (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 258.

Payment by check is not absolute, but conditional, unless expressly so agreed; and where a check is returned by the creditor and used by the debtor, the debt remains. Good v. Singleton, 39 Minn. 340.

The burden of proof is on the maker of a note to overcome the presumption that the check was taken as a conditional payment. Brown v. Scott, 51 Pa. 357; League v. Waring, 85 Pa. 244.

Surrender by the creditor of the note of the debt or upon such payment will not overcome the presumption that it was a conditional payment. Cannonsburgh Iron Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, supra.

But if the party from whom the check is received sustains a loss by want of diligence in its presentation, it will operate as a payment. Kilpatrick v. Home Bldg. & L. Assn. supra; McIntyre v. Kennedy, 29 Pa. 418; Middlesex v. Thomas, 20 N. J. Eq. 89; 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 154.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover a debt which defendant alleged had been satisfied by plaintiff's acceptance of a certified check. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Pritchard & Tincher and McDonald, Butler & Snow, for appellant:

A check which is certified loses its character as a check, and if delivered in payment of an indebtedness and accepted by the creditor, this operates as an absolute payment in cash, and discharges the drawer of the check from all liability, whether on the check or on the original indebtedness.

Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515; Laclede Bank v. Schuler, 120 U. S. 511 (30 L. ed. 704).

If the assignment of the part of the drawer's chose in action specified in the check is complete at the moment the bank has notice of the check as a claimed assignment, it makes no difference whether such notice be given by the drawer, before delivery of the check to the payee, or by the payee after the delivery to him.

Nat. Bank of The Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152 (19 L. ed. 897); Griffin v. Kemp 46 Ind. 172.

The certification of a check at the request of the holder affords conclusive evidence to all the world that the drawer at the time of the making of the certificate has a credit against the bank to a greater amount than that specified in the check, and that a sufficient amount of the drawer's credit for payment of the check has been set apart and charged against him and in favor of the holder.

Boston M. Nat. Bank v. Boston State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 619 (19 L. ed. 1008).

Such certificate discharges the drawer. As to him it amounts to a payment. Whether this certificate be obtained by the drawer before the check is delivered, and is thus made an inducement to the payee to receive the same, or whether it is made upon the application of the payee for his security, is of no importance.

Washington First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94

The receipt of a check does not operate as a payment unless the check is actually paid in due course. Bernheimer v. Herrman, 44 Hun, 110; Hatcher v. Comer, 75 Ga. 728; Henry v. Conley, 48 Ark. 267.

A certified check is regarded only as mere evidence of debt due from the drawer. Larsen v. Breene, 12 Colo. 480.

A certified bank check is prima facie evidence of payment. Lineweaver v. Slagle, 3 Cent. Rep. 615, 64 Md. 465.

So a check duly paid through a bank is prima facie evidence of payment of a debt. Baughner v. Conn (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 168.

The giving of a check when there are funds to meet it is not ordinarily regarded as payment, but is treated as the means to procure the money. The holder is the agent of the drawer to collect the money. Woodburn v. Woodburn, 8 West. Rep. 67, 115 Ill. 427; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill. 487; 2 Parsons, Cont. 623.

U. S. 843 (24 L. ed. 229); Laclede Bank v. Schuler, supra.

The certification by the Bank of a check delivered in payment of an indebtedness at the request of the holder operates as payment in money.

2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. 8d ed. § 1604; Jersey City First Nat. Bank v. Leach, 53 N. Y. 850; Essex Co. Nat. Bank v. Bank of Montreal, 7 Biss. 193.

The drawer of a check, who procures its certification before delivering it to the payee, incurs no liability as drawer; but the sole liability in favor of the holder of the check exists against the bank certifying the check.

Importers & T. Nat. Bank*, 76 N. Y. 852; Washington First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 843 (24 L. ed. 229).

Mr. Ralph Hill, for appellee:

The only effect of the certification of the check is to give it additional currency, by carrying with it the evidence that it was drawn in good faith, on funds to meet its payment, and lending to it the credit of the Bank, in addition to the credit of the drawer. Beyond this, it does not differ from an uncertified check, nor does it make any difference whether the drawer is actually charged on the books of the Bank or not with the amount of the check when it is certified as "good."

2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 1626, 1627.

The drawer is liable on the certified check, the same as he would have been if the check had not been certified.

Andrews v. German Nat. Bank, 9 Heisk. 211, 24 Am. Rep. 800; Richford v. Chicago First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 238; Rounds v. Smith, 42 Ill. 245; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill. 497; Mutual Nat. Bank v. Rutge, 28 La. Ann. 438.

Elliot, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 20th day of January, 1886, the appellant was indebted to the appellee, and after 12 o'clock noon of that day he delivered to it a certified check drawn by him on Ritzinger's Bank, in which bank he then had money on deposit. The banks of the City of Indianapolis had a long established rule requiring all checks presented after 12 o'clock noon to be certified by the bank upon which they were drawn, and it was the well-known custom of such banks to immediately charge the checks certified by them against the depositor. This was done in this instance, and the amount of the check was set aside for the purpose of paying it. Ritzinger's Bank suspended payment, and made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors prior to the business hours of the first day after the check was delivered to the appellee.

We agree with the appellant's counsel that the drawer of a check is released if the holder, instead of presenting it for payment himself, procures it to be certified by the bank upon which it is drawn. If the holder elects to procure the certification of the check it becomes, in his hands, substantially a certificate of deposit. By his own act he makes the bank his debtor and releases the drawer of the check. The reason for this rule is that the moment the check is certified the funds cease to be under the control of the original depositor, and pass under the control of the person who procures the certification of the check drawn in his favor. See Jersey City First Nat. Bank v. Leach, 53 N. Y. 850; Thomson v. Bank of British N. A. 82 N. Y. 1; Girard Bank v. Penn. Top. Bank, 39 Pa. 92; Freund v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 76 N. Y. 852.

It is true that the bank by which the check is certified becomes bound for its payment, and that it cannot defeat the right of the holder upon the ground that the drawer has no funds on deposit. Espy v. Cincinnati First Nat. Bank, 85 U. S. 13 Wall. 621 [21 L. ed. 951].

But it is very clear that the authorities to which we have referred do not directly rule this case, for here the holder did not procure the certification of the check; all that it did was to accept the check in the ordinary course of business. Nor do we regard this case as within the sweep of the reasoning of the courts in the cases to which reference has been made. Here the holder accepted the check as it was offered, ment of an account, it is not a payment. Fleig v. Sleet, 1 West. Rep. 25, 43 Ohio St. 58; Weddigen v. Boston Elastic F. Co. 100 Mass. 422.

The surrender and cancellation of a note upon receipt of a check for it is not evidence that the check was in satisfaction of the note, but is conditional upon the payment of the check. Henry v. Conley, 48 Ark. 267.

If the check given in payment is dishonored, the creditor may resort to his original claim, on the ground that there has been a failure of the consideration on which the check was taken. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15.

In an action on an account for goods sold and delivered, a plea of payment cannot be maintained on the ground that a check was given for the amount, when in fact there were no funds to meet it in the hands of the drawee. Fleig v. Sleet, supra.

Where an executor holding a mortgage drawing 10 per cent received from the mortgagee his check for the amount due, and immediately handed back the check to represent a new loan for the same sum at 8 per cent, the transaction was not a payment of the first mortgage, where there was no money on deposit to pay the check; and 10 per cent interest could be collected on the debt. Woodburn v. Woodburn, supra.

The presumption that a third person's check is only a conditional payment may be rebutted. Briggs v. Holmes, 10 Cent. Rep. 627, 118 Pa. 283.

Where no notice of the dishonor of the check was given the defendants for over six months, binding instructions should not have been given in favor of the plaintiff. Ibid.

Bank checks and promissory notes might be considered payment if the parties so understood and agreed; and a fortiori, without such an understanding, agreement or direction, a promissory note would not be converted into an indebtedness by account, by a simple transfer or memorandum of such note made on the books of the creditor. Hatcher v. Comer, 75 Ga. 723/.

and did nothing to make the drawee its debtor. The principle which gives force and strength to the decisions referred to fails entirely where there is no act done by the holder of the check save that of receiving it in the form in which it is presented, for the element which sustains those decisions is, that the holder, by procuring the certification of the check after he becomes the owner, voluntarily makes the bank upon which it is drawn his debtor, thus releasing the drawer. It is, in such a case, the holder's own act that changes the relation and situation of the parties.

The certification of a check does not completely change its character; on the contrary, it changes it only in one particular, although the change, it is true, does produce a difference in the relation of the original parties, inasmuch as the drawee ceases to be the debtor of the drawer for the amount represented by the check. But this is the extent of the change in the situation of the respective parties in all cases where the certification is not procured by the holder of the check after it passes into his hands. It remains an order for the payment of money, and the certification, when made before delivery, operates in favor of third parties simply as an assurance that it is genuine and will be paid. The bank that certifies it becomes bound, but beyond this, nothing is added to the legal force or effect of the instrument, except, as we have said, in cases where the holder himself procures its certification.

The party who accepts a certified check in the usual course of business is not bound to take the risk of the solvency of the bank upon which it is drawn. He is bound only to do what the law requires, and that is, to promptly and seasonably present the check for payment. A party to whom a debt is owing has a right to demand payment of his claim in money, for, in the absence of an express agreement, payment can only be made in money. Hancock v. Yaden (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 576.

In accepting a check instead of money the creditor dispenses with the necessity of payment in the legal mode, and the reasonable implication is that the check shall be a payment only in the event that it is honored on presentation. To hold otherwise would, as the Supreme Court of the United States has suggested, seriously interfere with commercial and financial transactions, and break down an established system. Boston M. Nat. Bank v. Boston State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 648 (19 L. ed. 1019).

Nor is there any rule of law which requires it to be so held; the analogies are, indeed, the other way, for, as only money is payment where there is no express agreement, there is no sufficient reason for inferring that an order for money, although accepted, is money, or has the same effect as money.

A bank upon which a check is drawn is not liable upon the check unless it is certified as good. Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515.

The certification fixes the liability of the bank, but it does no more. It does not change the situation of the party who takes the check, nor does it make the check money. As it is not money, but is simply an accepted order for money, it does not, of its own force and vigor, operate as money. It cannot take the place of money without an express agreement to that effect, and therefore cannot, by its own intrinsic force, operate as payment. To make it a payment something must be added, and that something must be an agreement, express or implied, that it shall be regarded as money, the legal medium of payment.

The obvious purpose of certifying checks is to assure the persons to whom they are offered that they are genuine and will be paid, and not that the bank that certifies them is solvent. There is nothing in the nature of the transaction that suggests in the faintest degree that certification is evidence of the solvency and ability of the drawee. It is perfectly clear that the certification of a check means simply that the bank upon which it is drawn will honor it, and there is no reason for implying that one who receives it in the usual course of business does so upon the faith that the certification implies that the bank is both willing and able to pay it. The certification is not intended to convey information as to the solvency of the bank; none of the parties can be regarded as giving it that force, and if not, then it cannot be inferred that any of them agreed that the certification of the check impressed it with the character of money.

We suppose that no one who accepts a certified check gives a thought to the question of the solvency of the bank upon which it is drawn, other than such as he would give if there were no certification, for it would be unnatural and unreasonable to do so, inasmuch as the certification is, in terms and in implication, no more than an agreement that the check will be paid on presentation. It neither represents nor touches the question of the solvency of the bank upon which it is drawn. There is therefore no just reason for concluding that the party who takes a certified check in the ordinary course of business assumes the risk of the solvency of the bank chosen by the drawer of the check as his place of deposit. The fair and reasonable implication is that the party who selects for himself the bank which he will trust with his money assumes the risk of its solvency.

The certification of a check is not intended to convey to the person to whom it is offered an assurance that the bank upon which it is drawn is solvent, for there is nothing in the nature of the transaction nor in the form of the contract which authorizes the inference that any of the parties expected or intended that it should have that effect. It cannot, therefore, be implied that the acceptance of the check by the creditor, ipso facto, released the drawer, and imposed upon the creditor the risk of the solvency of the bank by which the check was certified.

It is, and long has been, settled law that an ordinary check does not constitute payment. This doctrine is so well settled that it is unnecessary to refer to the authorities. Accepting, as we must, this rule as obligatory, we cannot conclude that a certified check constitutes payment unless we assume that the certification makes it the equivalent of money as a medium of payment. But neither in principle nor authority is there to be found warrant for this assumption, for, as we have seen, the nature of a check is not changed by certification, except in the one particular already indicated. As there is no other change, it is logically imposable that the effect of that change can make the check the equivalent of money.

From whatever point of view the question is examined, it appears clear that there is no release of the drawer of the check unless there is either an express or an implied agreement to that effect.

There is scant authority upon the direct question. The reason for this barrenness is that the use of certified checks is of modern origin. But, scarce as the authorities are, our conclusion that a certified check does not of its own force and vigor operate as a payment is not without support from the decided cases.

In Bickford v. Chicago First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 238, it was expressly decided that a certified check does not constitute payment. To the same effect are the decisions in Rounds v. Smith, 42 Ill. 245; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill. 497; Mutual Nat. Bank v. Rojce, 28 La. Ann. 938; Andrews v. German Nat. Bank, 9 Heisk. 211, 24 Am. Rep. 800.

The question received consideration in the recent case of Larsen v. Breene, 12 Colo. 480, and it was held that a certified check was not a payment. This general doctrine is asserted by Mr. Tiedeman, who says: "And the same rule applies, although the check had been certified before its delivery to the payee or holder, the certification only having the effect, in that case, of increasing its currency by adding the liability of the bank to that of the drawer. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 456.

There was no substitution of one debtor for another in this instance, and the contention of appellant's counsel that there was a novation cannot prevail. The delivery of the check was simply a conditional payment. The release of the original debtor was dependent upon the condition that the check should be honored on presentation. He still remained the debtor, for he was bound for the debt as long as the check remained unpaid. Culver v. Marks, post, p. 489.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

EXCHANGE BANK of Dallas

W. W. TUTTLE, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(.....N. M.....)

1. The provision in a promissory note for attorney's fees of a fixed and definite amount in case the note is collected by suit is not contrary to public policy and therefore void, although courts might interfere to prevent oppression or collusion.
2. Where the amount of attorney's fees called for by a promissory note is fixed by the contract, it will be presumed to be the reasonable value of the services rendered, unless the contrary appears.

(January 24, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant Tuttle from a judgment of the District Court for Socorro County, in favor of plaintiff, in an action upon a promissory note which contained a provision for attorney's fees. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Neill B. Field, for appellant:

There was no evidence offered to sustain the plaintiff's claim except the note sued on. This evidence was insufficient to support a judgment for attorney's fee.

Oelrichs v. Spain, 83 U. S. 15 Wall. 231 (21 L. ed. 45); Day v. Woodworth, 54 U. S. 18 How. 371 (14 L. ed. 184).

It is against public policy to allow the recovery of attorney's fees on contracts of this character in any case; but if they are to be allowed at all, they can be allowed only upon evidence of the value of the attorney's services.

1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 82, 62 A; Gaar v. Louisville Bkg. Co. 11 Bush, 182; Merchants Nat. Bank v. Sevier, 14 Fed. Rep. 662 and notes; Bullock v. Taylor, 39 Mich. 138; Myer v. Hart, 40 Mich. 517.

Mr. Isaac S. Tiffany, for appellee:

The stipulation is not against public policy. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 259.

In the cases where the doctrine of public policy has been applied the aid of the law is not withdrawn from any consideration of the rights or equities of the parties as between themselves, but solely to prevent an infringement of the public law or policy of the State. Lodgwick v. Skanton, 14 N. Y. 289.

The following authorities sustain the validity of stipulations in notes providing for the payment of attorney's fees:

First Nat. Bank v. Breese, 39 Iowa, 640; Garver v. Pontious, 66 Ind. 191; Miner v. Paris Rch. Bank, 53 Tex. 559; Seaton v. Scott, 18 Kan. 435; Overtown v. Matthews, 35 Ark. 147; Parham v. Pulliam, 5 Cold. 497; Imler v. Imler, 94 Pa. 872; Clawson v. Munson, 55 Ill. 895; Peyer v. Cole, 11 Or. 37; Farmers Nat. Bank v. Rasmussen, 1 Dak. 57; Schlesinger v. Artine, 31 Fed. Rep. 649; Bank of British

NOTE.—Promissory note; stipulation for attorney's fee.

A stipulation in a note for 10 per cent attorney's fees, in addition to interest, is void. Wright v. Traver (Mich.) 8 L. R. A. 50.

But a stipulation in a promissory note for payment, in addition to interest, of costs of collection, including attorney's commissions, on failure to pay at maturity, is valid, although rendering the note non-negotiable. Bowie v. Hall, 1 L. R. A. 546, 69 Md. 433.

So a contract in a note for the payment of attorney's fees, if the note is placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, is valid. Horton v. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank, 11 West. Rep. 389, 122 Ill. 352; Holmes v. Bemis, 14 West. Rep. 383, 124 Ill. 453.

A provision, in a promissory note, for a stipulated attorney's fee of 10 per cent upon the amount found due is unreasonable, and of no legal effect, and cannot be enforced. The court, in such case, will not modify the amount, and enforce it as modified, except so far as offered and admitted by the defendant. Kimball v. Moir, 15 Or. 427.

North America v. Ellis, 2 Fed. Rep. 44; Adams v. Addington, 16 Fed. Rep. 89; Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Moreno, 7 Fed. Rep. 806; Howenstein v. Barnes, 5 Dill. 482, 9 Cent. L. J. 43; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 205; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 62, p. 72; Smith v. Silvers, 82 Ind. 821.

McFie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the District Court for Socorro County upon the following promissory note:

$3,500.

Dallas, Texas, October 23, 1885.

On December 1, '85, after date, without grace, we or either of us promise to pay to the order of Exchange Bank, Dallas, thirty-five hundred dollars, for value received, at the Exchange Bank of Dallas, with interest from maturity at the rate of twelve per cent per annum, with ten per cent for attorney's fees in case this note is placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, or collected by suit.

L. B. Collins,
C. E. Odem,
W. W. Tuttle.

The declaration, in addition to the usual demand for debt, interest and costs, asked judgment for attorney's fees, as provided by the terms of the note. Collins and Odem were not served with process, but W. W. Tuttle entered his appearance, and filed one plea, that of non assumpsit. The defendant, Tuttle, waived a jury, also written finding of facts, and consented to trial by the court, which was had, and the following judgment was rendered by the court at the November Term, A. D. 1888: "At this day, this cause having been heretofore submitted to the court, and the court being now sufficiently advised, doth find the issues for the plaintiff, and assess its damages against defendant, Tuttle, at the sum of four thousand seven hundred thirty and 00-100 dollars, and also the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars as attorney's fees; wherefore it is ordered and adjudged that plaintiff recover of defendant W. W. Tuttle the sum of four thousand seven hundred thirty and 00 100 dollars damages, with 12 per cent interest from this day until paid, and also the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars as attorney's fees, together with its costs in this behalf laid out and expended, to be taxed herein, and that execution issue therefor."

To reverse this judgment, the case is brought to this court by appeal.

Appellant seeks a reversal solely upon the ground that the court gave judgment for attorney's fees, and assigns the following errors: (1) that the district court erred in its finding that the appellant was liable for attorney's fees on the contract sued on; (2) that the district court erred in giving judgment against the appellant for $350 attorney's fees, when there was no evidence of the value of the attorney's fees before the court; (3) that the judgment of the district court against this appellant is wholly without evidence to support it.

The note was the only evidence offered by the plaintiff, and, although the entire cause of action was put in issue by defendant's plea, no evidence was offered in support of the plea. The introduction of the note in evidence was sufficient to warrant a judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the note, interest and costs. We are now called upon to say whether or not the court erred in allowing attorney's fees as specified in the note.

Let us consider the first assignment of error: "That the district court erred in its finding that the appellant was liable for attorney's fees on the contract sued on." This question of the allowance or disallowance of attorney's fees provided for in promissory notes and written contracts has been before the courts for many years in this country, and many learned opinions of able judges and courts have been rendered on both sides of the question. An examination of the authorities will show, however, that the fruitful cause of this contrariety of opinion is due mainly to the varied forms in which the question is presented to the courts. One instrument sued on differs in its provision, upon that subject, from that of another. Therefore the phraseology of a decision, apparently applicable, may be, and often is, found to be inapplicable when examined in the light of the facts before the court.

Take the case of Oelrichs v. Spain, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 231 [21 L. ed. 45], cited by appellant. The case is sometimes cited as showing that the Supreme Court of the United States is opposed to the allowance of attorney's fees in any case, whether provided for in the instrument or not; but an examination of that case shows that it was a suit on an injunction bond, with no provision in the instrument for attorney's fees, and the question in that case was whether attorney's fees should be allowed as part of plaintiff's damages, which is a very different proposition.

The case of Bullock v. Taylor, 39 Mich. 187, cited by appellant, is not in point in this case. The notes in that case provided that "the undersigned agree to pay $15 attorney's fee, over and above all taxable costs," each, on six small notes, two of them for $41.50 each. The surety did not sign the notes, but signed a bond as surety for the makers. The court says, among other things: "The surety insists that such notes are not within the terms of his undertaking. . . . (3) Because they provide for the payment of an attorney's fee, to which he has never consented." Again the court says: "In this State, the attorney's fees which the successful party is permitted to recover in courts of record are prescribed by statute or by rule of court. In justices' courts, none are given except in a few special cases. The policy of our law is to limit such recovery to a very moderate sum in every case where it is permitted at all; . . . and it is a question of very grave importance whether the policy which thus limits attorney's fees, and also limits the rates of interest, can be set aside by provisions like that under review."

It is very apparent that this case was decided mainly upon the ground that such fees as were contracted were prohibited by the statute law or rules of court of Michigan; the contract, therefore, was in violation of law, and the court would not enforce it. In this Territory we have no statute upon the subject.

In Stoneman v. Pyle, 85 Ind. 104, the note provided for attorney's fees in case suit was brought, and it was sustained, the court saying: "On the maturity of the note, the maker knew precisely what he was bound to pay, and the holder what he was entitled to demand. . . . The stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees could have no force, except upon a violation of his contract by the defendant," etc.

In Churchman v. Martin, 54 Ind. 888, the court held void a note providing for "10 per cent attorney's fees, if suit be instituted."

It might be said, without examination, that these two decisions are contradictory; but they are not so, for the reason that between the two decisions a statute had been passed in that State, as follows: "That any and all agreements to pay attorney's fees, depending upon any condition therein set forth, and made part of any bill of exchange, acceptance, draft, promissory notes or other written evidence of indebtedness, are hereby declared illegal and void." Act March 10, 1875.

The provision was held to be void under the Statute, because upon "condition," and not because it was against public policy.

It may be admitted, however, that some of our ablest courts hold opposite views on some of the points arising out of this question. Our own federal courts are somewhat divided in opinion, Judges Dearly, Pardee and Speer sustaining the validity of contracts for attorney's fees, while Judges Caldwell and McCreary take the opposite view. The early cases upon this subject were disposed to hold against the validity and also negotiability of such contracts, a leading case being that of Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, placing it upon the ground of uncertainty; but in later decisions a different view is taken, and there is now a large preponderance of decisions that where the amount provided for in a promissory note, at maturity, is fixed and certain, it is negotiable. Applying that test to the note sued on in this case, we are of the opinion that it is negotiable. The weight of authority is to the effect, also, that where a promissory note provides for a fixed and reasonable amount for attorney's fees, if the note is collected by suit, it is valid, and will be sustained by the courts. Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Indiana, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, California and the federal courts in Oregon, Kansas and Georgia, sustain the validity of such notes. Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Missouri and the federal court in Arkansas are not disposed to enforce such provisions.

This case is brought within very limited bounds by the record. We are not called upon to construe the clause of the note sued on, which provides for "10 per cent attorney's fees in case this note is placed in hands of an attorney for collection," because it is not properly raised. The provision just quoted is certainly a questionable one. It is susceptible of being used in a very oppressive and collusive manner. Therefore, if this record showed that the defendant, Tuttle, paid, or tendered payment, of the debt and interest at maturity, or before suit was brought, and the payment tendered was refused for the reason that the note was placed in the hands of an attorney, who demanded 10 per cent more for attorney's fees, a very different case would be presented; but in this case there was neither payment nor tender of any part of the note, so far as the record discloses. On the contrary, suit was actually brought for the collection of the note, and the defendant, by pleading non assumpsit, denied the entire indebtedness, in law, and put the plaintiff upon proof of the entire amount; and while the judgment, except as to the amount of attorney's fees, is in fact admitted, still the entire amount is suspended, and the plaintiff is deprived of the benefit of judgment for the debt and interest. If to declare the clause as to attorney's fees invalid would void the entire note, there would be some justification for the practice; but it will not be contended that such would be the effect, and hence this court cannot, by reversing the judgment of the court below, approve a practice which practically deprives the plaintiff of his legal rights, when, by payment or tender of amount due and admitted, such results would be avoided without depriving the defendant of any legal right. To reverse this case, the court must declare that a provision in a promissory note for attorney's fees of a fixed and definite amount, in case the note is "collected by suit," is contrary to public policy, and therefore void. This we cannot do, as we are satisfied that the weight of authority sustains the validity of such a provision in a promissory note by contract of the parties. We are aware of the force of the argument "that to sustain such contracts, because they are the contracts of the parties, would admit of oppression of the debtor by the grasping creditor," but we cannot presume that such will be the result; and besides it does not follow, and this court does not hold, that the courts will not interfere to prevent oppression and collusion, where the facts are brought before the court in the proper manner. The courts have held void many of the provisions for attorney's fees in notes and contracts, where they are uncertain, excessive or oppressive. Even where a fixed sum has been agreed upon by the parties, the courts have interfered to afford relief, where the amount was clearly exorbitant or oppressive, and the facts were shown to the court. In this case, services of the attorney were rendered. It is not shown that the amount contracted for was excessive, nor that the contract was not a voluntary one, with a full knowledge of all the facts. The note was sufficient evidence to warrant the court in giving judgment for attorney's fees, and in doing so there was no error.

The second assignment of error is, in substance, that the court allowed attorney's fees without requiring proof of their value. If the note sued on provided for a "reasonable attorney fee," the amount not being fixed, such proof should be required; but in this case the amount has been fixed by the contract, and we must presume that the amount fixed was the reasonable value of the services rendered, until the contrary appears. The amount being fixed, and value reasonable, the court below committed no error in giving judgment for the amount provided for in the note.

The third assignment of error is not well taken. There was sufficient evidence to warrant the court below in giving judgment for attorney's fees upon the note; in fact, the note was the best evidence of the fact, and proved itself.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Jennie E. EVANS, Appt.,

v.

James G. EVANS, Resp.

(....Minn....)

*A decree a mensa et thoro, entered under the provisions of § 80 et seq., chap. 62, Gen. Stat. 1878, and remaining in force, does not bar an action for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, upon any of the grounds specified by statute.

(February 18, 1880.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County denying her application for an absolute divorce from defendant. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. F. H. Ewing, for appellant:

Since the passage of the Act of 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. chap. 85), making adultery on the part of the wife, and adultery coupled with desertion on the part of the husband, causes for divorce a vinculo, it has been held in England that after a decree a mensa et thoro a divorce a vinculo may be granted for the statutory cause of adultery occurring after the granting of a divorce a mensa et thoro.

Bland v. Bland, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 237; Ritchie v. Ritchie, 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. 162.

No appearance for respondent.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

But one question is presented upon this appeal, and that is, Does a decree of separation from bed and board, forever, made by virtue of the provisions of § 80 et seq., chap. 62, Gen. Stat. 1878, and still in force, bar an action for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, upon the statutory ground of habitual drunkenness (subd. 6, § 6, chap. 62, supra), the cause of action having arisen subsequent to the date of the decree a mensa et thoro. The court below found as a fact that the defendant had been guilty of habitual drunkenness for the space of one year immediately preceding the filing of the complaint in the case at bar, but refused the relief demanded in the complaint because of the existence of the decree before mentioned from bed and board, and which had been obtained by plaintiff some four years prior to the exhibition of her complaint herein.

Prior to the passage in 1876 of the Act Authorizing Limited Divorces, so called, the only form of divorce proceeding provided by statute was one from the bonds, and by which both parties, without regard to cause or guilt, were equally and absolutely liberated from the obligations of the marriage contract. Such divorces were to be granted upon proof of the existence of either of six distinct and specifically mentioned grounds, one of which is that specified in the complaint herein. The Statute in question places these separately stated causes of action upon a common level; it makes no attempt to distinguish or discriminate between them; and, if either be established by proper evidence, an unconditional decree must follow. Good morals might suggest that this is unjust, but we take the law as we find it.

The Statute under which the plaintiff obtained a decree a mensa et thoro was not intended to abridge the Statute upon the subject of absolute divorce, nor to restrict its operation. To the female only is granted the right of complaint, and she alone can procure the decree. The corresponding privilege is not given an aggrieved husband. The marriage relation is merely suspended as to certain marital rights and relations, not annulled, and, save as they may be regulated by the terms of the decree, property interests remain undisturbed. In case of the death of either party, the survivor becomes a widow or widower, as the case may be. Dean v. Richmond, 5 Pick. 461; Hokamp v. Hagaman, 36 Md. 511.

And when a decree has been duly announced the court is powerless to revoke it, except upon the joint application of the persons interested and in case of reconciliation. To hold that a divorce from the bonds cannot be adjudged so long as a decree of separation is in force, would lead to the most surprising results. It would confer upon the wife the power to obtain a perpetual decree a mensa et thoro from an offending husband, and thereafter to openly give cause for a divorce a vinculo, while the husband, no matter how irreproachable his behavior and character might have become in the mean time, remains without remedy or relief. Such a rule would compel an unfortunate wife to ask for an absolute divorce in the first instance, if she regarded a reconciliation as doubtful, or that, possibly, she might want, at some time, to be wholly freed from her marriage vows, instead of simply seeking temporary relief and separation. In the hope, perhaps, of such conduct in the future as would warrant a revocation of the decree.

The Act of 1876 does not expressly provide that a decree under it is in lieu of all other relief, and it is manifest that such was not the intention of the legislators.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions that judgment be entered as demanded in the complaint.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Edgar POPPLETON, Appt.,
v.
YAMHILL COUNTY, Resp't.

(....Or.....)

- *1. The notice given by the board of equalization, or county court sitting as such board, to a taxpayer, of a proposed increase of his assessment, need not specify the property to be added thereto.
2. It is not necessary, where a taxpayer appears before a board of equalization in pursuance of a notice to show cause why corrections should not be made in his assessment, and files an answer in response to such notice, that a reply to such answer be filed.
3. In proceedings before a board of equalization to make corrections of the assessment of the property of a taxpayer, the rules of practice in civil actions or suits do not apply.
4. The appellant, a resident of the County of Yamhill, Or., sent a sum of money to Washington Territory, to be loaned out through agents there, which said agents loaned accordingly, and took notes upon such loans, secured by mortgages on real property in the Territory, retaining the notes and mortgages there, and which had never been in this State. Held, that the board of equalization of said county had no authority, under the statutes of this State, to include the said money, notes or mortgages in the assessment of appellant's property for the purpose of taxation.

(January 27, 1890.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Yamhill County dismissing a petition for a writ of review to set aside the action of the County Court in adding to petitioner's tax assessment the amount which he had invested in certain securities out of the State. Reversed.

Statement by Thayer, Ch. J.:

Appeal from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the County of Yamhill, rendered upon a writ of review, issued out of that court, directed to the County Court of said County, to review certain proceedings of assessment and taxation. The assessor of the County of Yamhill applied to Edgar Poppleton, the appellant herein, for a list of his taxable property for the year 1888. That thereupon the appellant furnished him a list purporting to be all of such property. Subsequently the board of equalization of the County caused a notice to be served upon appellant, requiring him to appear, and show cause why his assessment should not be increased. In accordance with the said notice, the appellant appeared, and filed a motion to dismiss the proceedings for the reason that no proper notice had been filed and served; but said board refused to act in the matter, and adjourned without day. The business was then taken to the county court, sitting as a board of equalization, and another notice to the same effect was by the said court caused to be served upon the appellant. In pursuance of said last notice the appellant appeared by counsel in said court, and filed another motion to dismiss the proceeding on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction in the premises, for the same reason assigned in the former motion. The county court overruled the motion, and the appellant then filed an answer setting forth what he claimed to be all his taxable property. No reply was filed to the answer, and thereupon the appellant filed a motion for judgment in the proceedings, that they be dismissed, which motion the county court denied. The matter was then heard on testimony and proofs, and said court found the following facts: "First. That previous to his assessment for the year 1888 said taxpayer had sent to Washington Territory money, to the amount of $4,500, to be loaned out in said Territory by his agents there, and which said money was so loaned, before said assessment, on mortgage securities on land, and that the notes therefor were held in said Territory, and never had been in this State. Second. That said notes are taxable in this State and County, where said taxpayer resides." Whereupon said court decided as follows: "It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the assessment of said taxpayer be, and the same is hereby, raised and increased the sum of $4,500."

The said writ of review was issued out of the said circuit court to review the said decision. The said last-mentioned court, after hearing the case, decided that the grounds of error assigned in the petition for said writ were not well taken, and adjudged that the writ be dismissed at the cost of appellant, and that the said decision of the county court be affirmed, from which judgment the appeal herein was taken.

Mr. H. Hurley, for appellant:

Courts have repeatedly held that States could not tax personal property situated in another State, including notes and bonds.

People v. Comrs. of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 224; People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 577; Tuzenell Co. v. Davenport, 40 Ill. 197; Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152; Fisher v. Rush Co. 19 Kan. 414; State v. St. Louis Co. Ct. 47 Mo. 594; Albany v. Powell, 2 Jones, Eq. 51; Lewis v. Chester Co. 60 Pa. 325; Finch v. York Co. 19 Neb. 50; State Bank v. Richmond, 79 Va. 118; Redmond v. Rutherford Co. 87 N. C. 122.

The theory that intangible personal property has no situs except the domicile of the owner is at best nothing but a fiction, and has been frequently ignored by courts when the subject has been brought in question.

People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 580, 583; People v. Comrs. of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 228-239.

Mortgages, bonds, bills and notes are by the common understanding of business men in commercial transactions, as well as of jurists and legislators, for many purposes, considered property, and not as mere evidence of debt, and they may thus have a situs at the place where they are found, like other visible, tangible chattels.

State v. Howard Co. Ct. 69 Mo. 454; People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 585; Blain v. Irby, 25 Kan. 501; Wilcox v. Ellis, 14 Kan. 588; Fisher v. Rush Co. 19 Kan. 414; Desty, Taxn. 326.

*Head notes by THAYER, CH. J.

This property being in the hands of an agent in Washington Territory for the purpose of being loaned out, and being taxable there, its actual situs is thereby established in that Territory, and the fiction must yield to the facts.

1 Desty, Taxn. p. 323; King v. McDrew, 81 Ill. 418; McCutchen v. Rice Co. 7 Fed. Rep. 558; Duer v. Small, 17 How. Pr. 201; People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 588; Fisher v. Rush Co. 19 Kan. 414. See Wilcox v. Ellis, 14 Kan. 603.

Protection and taxation are co-relative terms. Without protection, or some benefit to be returned therefor, taxation would be but another form for spoliation or confiscation.

Fisher v. Rush Co. 19 Kan. 416.

Messrs. J. E. Magers and H. H. Hewitt for respondent.

Thayer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The notices to the appellant, given by the board of equalization and county court, regarding the proposed increase of his assessment, were ample and sufficient; nor was any reply to the answer filed by appellant in response to the notice necessary. Proceedings for the equalization of taxes are not governed by the rules of practice in civil cases, but are necessarily summary. The taxpayer is entitled to be notified of the proposed increase; and, however informal the notice may be, it will answer the purpose intended, as he will be very likely to get there, and usually will not stand upon the order of his going. Besides, the board will not be apt to get at the bottom of his affairs by the most diligent search and inquiry to which it may subject him.

The only matter that need be considered in the case is the right of the said county court to include in the appellant's list of taxable property the money, notes and mortgages he owned and held in the then Territory, now State, of Washington. The question as to a right of government to tax choses in action due to its subjects from those of another jurisdiction has been a great source of embarrassment to the courts. The difficulty, to a great extent, has been occasioned by attempting to apply the maxim that movables follow the person of the owner. The maxim, at best, is only a legal fiction which may be resorted to or brushed aside as the justice of the case requires. If the right, in the outset, had been considered from an equitable standpoint, the law upon the subject would have been relieved of much uncertainty. I can discover no justice whatever in a government exacting from an owner of property which is within the territorial jurisdiction of another government the payment of a property tax thereon, when it is subject to a like burden under the laws of the latter government, whether it be tangible or intangible, as courts have been pleased to distinguish certain kinds of property.

In the present case, what grounds can there be, in sense and reason, entitling the County of Yamhill to claim that the appellant should pay, in support of the county and state government, a tax upon the $4,500 loaned out in the State of Washington, when neither said County, nor the State of Oregon, can afford him any protection whatever to the property? He loaned the money under the laws of the then Territory; and if it is not paid, and he is compelled to resort to compulsory means to enforce its payment, it is to the laws of that government he must look for his remedy. And the case would be the same if his agents were to embezzle the funds. Not a judge, justice of the peace, sheriff or constable within the State of Oregon could, by virtue of his office, render him the slightest assistance. How can the State, then, demand from the appellant a contribution on account of his ownership of this property except as an arbitrary exaction, which is but another name for robbery? The money, notes and mortgages were undoubtedly subject to taxation in Washington Territory. The right to tax them there is sustained by a line of decisions of the courts upon the subject, since the one made in Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152, down to the present time, including Crawford v. Linn Co. 11 Or. 482; and they are undoubtedly correct in principle.

Property, in all cases, unless exempt by law, should contribute to the expense of the government which protects the owner in his enjoyment of it. But upon what principle a government can claim that property which is outside of its jurisdiction, and subject to the jurisdiction of another government, shall contribute to its expenses, I cannot imagine, unless it be upon the ground that it has the sovereign power to enforce it.

The counsel for the respondent claims that the situs of property of the character of that in question must necessarily, from the nature of it, be with the person of the owner, and would have this court infer from that, I suppose, that the $4,500, or the notes and mortgages, were at the time of the assessment with the person of the appellant. The county court, however, found that the money was sent to Washington Territory, and loaned out by appellant's agents there, before the assessment, upon notes and mortgages which had never been in this State. The counsel's logic may be on the principle of that of the lawyer who assured his client that the authorities would not put him in jail, while the latter was listening to him from within the bars of a cell, conscious of the fact that he was already in jail; though they probably intended to claim that the legal fiction of the property being with the appellant is paramount to the actual fact. But it seems to me, under the circumstances and situation of the property, it had a situs in Washington Territory for the purposes of taxation under its laws, and that therefore it could not be regarded, by force of a mere fiction, as being with the person of the appellant.

If the appellant had been a resident of Washington Territory, and had sent the money to this State, to be loaned out by his agents here, and they had accordingly loaned it, and taken notes and mortgages in security therefor, and the securities had been left in the hands of such agents, the property would have been taxable under the laws of this State, beyond a peradventure; and the statute of Washington Territory in force at the several times when the money was loaned, and the assessment made, to which our attention has been called, is sufficiently broad in its terms to have authorized the taxation of the property in that Territory. The authorities of this State, therefore, had no moral right to tax the property in question. Nor had they any legal right to do so, unless it is conceded that the statutes of this State require the taxation of property so situated, whether taxable under the laws of another government or not, and that such a requirement is lawful,—a proposition to which I should be exceedingly loath to assent. But even then the assessment in question cannot be upheld, as our statutes, by any fair construction, do not go to that extent.

Section 2731, Hill's Ann. Code, provides that "the terms 'personal estate' and 'personal property' shall be construed to include all household furniture, goods, chattels, moneys and gold dust on hand or on deposit either within or without this State; all boats and vessels, whether at home or abroad, and all capital invested therein; all debts due or to become due from solvent debtors, whether on account, contract, note, mortgage or otherwise,"—which is the only provision from which it could possibly be inferred that the property in question might be taxable in this State. The section was adopted in 1854, and undertook to define the words "personal estate" and "personal property" as used in the Revenue Act of which it was a part. Said words were to be construed as meaning certain articles on hand or deposit, within or without the State; also, boats and vessels, whether at home or abroad, and all capital invested in them; and also all debts, whether on account, contract, etc. The clause relating to debts due or to become due, etc., was evidently intended to include domestic debts only, as it does not declare, like the other two clauses, that it includes debts due from parties "either within or without this State," or "at home or abroad," or contain terms of equivalent import. Leaving out of the latter clause the qualifying words referred to, after having inserted them in the two former ones, would indicate on the part of the Legislature an intent not to include debts due from parties living out of the State as "personal property" or "personal estate," and authorize the construction indicated. The first clause of the section would include property like that in question, if it had not limited the construction to articles "on hand or on deposit." The property in question was neither on hand or on deposit, but was in the hands of the appellant's agents in Washington Territory,—invested by them, and under their control.

The case is very similar in its features to that of People v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 576, and I think we can safely follow the decision therein made.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the case remanded to that court, with directions to entertain the said writ of review, and determine the same in accordance with the principles announced herein.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Robert KINNAIRD, Appt.,

STANDARD OIL CO.

(...Ky....)

1. Although one may appropriate all the underground water in his soil he has no right to poison it, however innocently, or to contaminate it, so that when it reaches his neighbor's land it will be unfit for use by either man or beast.
2. The owner of oil stored in large quantities near a spring of water cannot resist a claim for damage to the spring, by its leakage and pollution of the underground currents of water that feed the spring, because he did not know the water was affected by it, when the oil could be seen in puddles outside of the building in which it was stored.
3. If one has on his own premises that which is dangerous or a substance that he is constantly using, which is liable to escape and injure others, whether above or under the ground, and injure the property of his neighbor, or that which his neighbor has the right to use, he must answer for the consequences.
4. On the question of damages for injury to a spring, the water of which is not totally destroyed, evidence that the owner had previously sold water from it is inadmissible.

(January 26, 1890.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Garrard County, in favor of defendant in an action to recover 7 L. R. A.

damages for the pollution by defendant of plaintiff's spring. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. J. Landram, for appellant:

One may no more befoul a subterranean stream than a surface stream.

Hodgkinson v. Ennor, 4 Best & S. 229; Turner v. Mirfield, 84 Beav. 390. See also Ballard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 115, 24 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 634.

It may be stated as a general proposition that every enjoyment by one of his own property which violates the rights of another in an essential degree, is a nuisance and actionable as such at the suit of the party injured thereby.

Wood, Nuis. § 1; Gould, Waters, pp. 388, 389, 482, 485, 493.

Mr. M. H. Owsley, also for appellant:

There is no property in underground waters; but they are subject to appropriation and use to the fullest extent by the proprietors of the lands, but not to their abuse of it. In other words, whilst they may appropriate the water, they are responsible if they pollute or poison that which is permitted to escape and enters his neighbor's premises in whatever way it may find its entrance, whether by percolation or in defined streams.

Ballard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 115, 24 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 637.

The American cases, while recognizing to its fullest extent the right of every land owner to use certain, and even totally abstract all, underground percolating waters, hold him liable for corrupting them.

Chase v. Silverstone, 63 Me. 175; Roath v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 533; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528; Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294.

The true cause of action in Ballard v. Tomlinson, supra, is not exactly that the defendant contaminated underground percolating water, but that he allowed his impure sewage to escape from his premises to the plaintiff's, and the circumstance that it reached there by underground percolation instead of by a surface stream is immaterial.

Nat. Law Rev. March, 1888.

Messrs. Brown, Humphrey & Davie for appellee.

Pryor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Kinnaid, is the owner of a small tract of land containing about four acres, lying adjacent to or within the boundary of the Town of Lancaster, in the County of Garrard. On this land is a valuable and never-failing spring, that appears upon the surface of the ground at the foot of a hill, and had been used as such for a long period of time. In November of the year 1886 the appellee, the Standard Oil Company, leased from the Kentucky Central Railroad Company a site upon which to build a warehouse for the storage of its coal oil. They erected the warehouse, and placed in it their coal oil, that leaked from the casks, and saturated the ground, both on the inside and outside of the building. The floor of the house consisted of a bed of cinders about twelve inches in depth, that supplied the place of plank, that, as the proof shows, would become very inflammable when saturated with the oil. The bed of cinders, therefore, rendered the property much more secure than if a floor had been laid in the building. The spring of the appellant is located about 200 yards from the oil-house of the appellee, with a hill or rise in the ground between the two, and the proof conduces to show that water on the surface of the ground at the oil-house would naturally flow in an opposite direction from the spring, because it is lower than the ground where the spring emerges from the hill. After the oil had been deposited in the building erected for that purpose, it is manifest that it leaked from the casks, and, being of such a penetrating character, it passed into the ground, and polluted the water or stream from which the spring of appellant was supplied. While it is argued that the proof on this subject is by no means satisfactory, we think it apparent from the testimony that the oil mingled with underground currents of water that fed the spring of the appellant, and caused the injury. The court below, on hearing the testimony, gave a peremptory instruction to the jury, on the ground that no action could be maintained for contaminating the subterranean water that flowed into the spring of the appellant, as the appellee had the right, in the exercise of its legitimate business, to build the house, and store the oil within it, on its own land, although the property of its neighbor was injured by it. If this had been surface water, or a vein of water underground, with a well-defined and known channel, the right to maintain the action cannot be doubted; but, as to hidden or unknown veins of water, it is said they belong to the soil, constitute a part of it, and may be used, controlled or removed by the owner in the same manner that he could the soil through which the water percolates or runs.

The theory of the defense is that, this water being the property of the owner of the land, its use, if not forbidden by law, cannot work an injury to his neighbor, in the absence of a design to do so, however great the damage sustained. This view of the legal rights of these parties seems to be sustained by numerous reported cases, involving questions analogous in almost every particular, and if followed by this court, it must be held that the peremptory instruction was proper.

The case of Brown v. Illius, reported in 27 Conn. 84, was an action on the case for a nuisance, and in the declaration it was alleged that offensive matter in the manufacture of gas, deposited on the surface of the ground, had permeated into the soil around and adjoining the well, and into the well itself, corrupting the water and rendering it unfit for use. The court, in applying the rule in regard to subterranean currents, and in discussing the instruction given by the lower court, held that the ownership of the land sanctioned and justified the use made of it by the defendant, and, although the latter was injured, if the damage resulted from the mingling of the noxious matter with the underground vein of water, it was an injury without any violation of the plaintiff's legal rights by the defendant, and the latter "was under no legal obligation to prevent it in the first instance, or a continuance of it afterwards."

The rule that gives to the owner of the soil all that lies beneath its surface, whether oil or water, was made to apply in the case cited, with the right of the owner to use it at his pleasure, and in any legitimate mode, and the plaintiff denied the right of recovery upon that ground.

The case of Dillon v. Acme Oil Co., 49 Hun, 565, was where the plaintiff owned two lots, upon which he had erected dwellings, and had dug a well on each lot, that he used for household purposes. The defendant erected an oil refinery about 800 feet distant from the lots of the plaintiff, and the oil, leaking on the surface, had permeated the ground until it reached some underground stream that carried it to the wells of the plaintiff. An injunction was sought, and the relief denied, for the reason that the defendant had the right to use that which he owned for legitimate purposes, provided, in doing so, he exercised proper care and skill to prevent injury to others; and, as an illustration of the rule, it was there said that he might dig a well or ditch, and cut off a hidden stream of water that supplied his neighbor's well, and thereby render it useless.

In Bloodgood v. Ayers, 108 N. Y. 400, 11 Cent. Rep. 108, it was also held that no person is liable for interrupting a stream supplying a well or spring, unless he knew beforehand where the stream was,—a doctrine, we think, well settled by an unbroken line of authority. That one may divert or consume all the water from underground currents, that have no fixed known channels, and appropriate all the water to his own use, and that he is the absolute owner of this water while it remains under his soil, with the right to appropriate it as he pleases for legitimate use, will not be denied. This use or right of property is, however, only temporary, and remains only so long as the water stands on or under his land. He cannot follow it when it leaves his premises, and passes to the land of his neighbor; and it may therefore be said that he has not the absolute title, as each owner of the land is vested with the right to use the water, and appropriate the whole of it when it reaches him.

In the case of Ugjohn v. Richland Board of Health, reported in 46 Mich. 542, the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Cooley, it was held to be an established rule that owners of the soil have no rights in subsurface waters not running in well-defined channels, as against their neighbors who may withdraw them by excavations; and therefore, if no right of action exists for ruining the plaintiff's well by withdrawing the water, it is difficult to understand how corrupting its waters by a proper use of the adjoining premises can be actionable, when there is no intent to injure, and no negligence, as each act would destroy the well of the plaintiff. It seems to us, after a careful review of the authorities referred to by counsel for the corporation, all of which are entitled to great weight, that there is a manifest distinction between the right of the owner of land to use the underground water upon it, that originates from percolation or is found in hidden veins, and the right to contaminate it so as to injure or destroy the water when passing to the adjoining land of his neighbor.

It is a familiar doctrine that one must so use his property as not to injure his neighbor, and because the owner has a right to make an appropriation of all the under-ground water, and thus prevent its use by another, he has no right to poison it, however innocently, or to contaminate it, so that when it reaches his neighbor's land it is in such condition as to be unfit for use either by man or beast. One may be entitled by contract with his neighbor to all the water that flows in a stream on the surface that passes through the land of both, and, while he can thus appropriate it, he has no right to pollute the water in such a manner as, when it passes to his neighbor, its use becomes dangerous or unhealthy to his family, or to the beast on his farm. As soon as the water leaves the land of the one who claims the right to use it, and runs on the land of another, the latter has the same right to appropriate it, and, if property, it then becomes as much the property of the last as the first proprietor. The owner of land has the same right to the use and enjoyment of the air that is around and over his premises as he has to use and enjoy the water under his ground. He is entitled to the use of what is above the ground as well as that below it, and still it will scarcely be insisted that he can poison the atmosphere with noxious odors that reach the dwelling of his neighbor, to the injury of the health of himself or family. If not, we see no reason why he should be permitted to so contaminate the water that flows from his land to his neighbor's, producing the same results, and still escape liability for the damages sustained, and whether the water escapes the one way or the other is immaterial. The simple question is, Can the owner, with a knowledge of the penetrating character of its oil, and the effects following its leakage, store large quantities of it near the spring of the plaintiff, when the oil is seen in puddles outside of the building, the result of leakage of the casks on the inside, and resist the claim of the plaintiff on the ground that it did not know the water was affected by it? The injury has been done, and can it be said that it presents a case of damnum absque injuria? We think not.

The case of Ballard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 115, 24 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 634, contains the correct rule on the subject. In that case the water in the plaintiff's well was injured by sewage from the defendant's well, and it was held that an injunction to restrain the defendant from so using his well was proper, and the plaintiff entitled also to damages for what he had suffered by reason of the pollution. While the unlimited right to use the percolating water was conceded to the plaintiff, the right to contaminate the water so as to render it unhealthy or unfit for use, when it came to his neighbor's land, was held to be a violation of plaintiff's rights, for which an action could be maintained. If one has that on his own premises that is dangerous, or a substance that he is constantly using which is liable to escape and injure others, whether above or under the ground, and injure the property of his neighbor, or that which his neighbor has the right to use, he must answer for the consequences.

A recovery was had against gas companies in the case of Ottawa Gas-Light Co. v. Graham, 28 Ill. 74; Pottstown Gas Co. v. Murphy, 89 Pa. 257; Columbus Gas-Light Co. v. Freeland, 13 Ohio St. 392.

In the case in 28 Ill. 74, the gas company erected works near the dwelling of Graham, and injured the water in his well by permitting the substances used in its manufacture to permeate the soil, and find their way to plaintiff's well. The court told the jury that if such substances did soak into the ground, and permeate and pass along and through the earth, mingling with the water of the well, and did thereby render it nauseous to the taste, or unfit for use, the jury should render a verdict for the plaintiff. This branch of the instructions was held to be proper, and no question raised as to the right of recovery, if the jury believed the facts existed as alleged and proven.

In Pottstown Gas Co. v. Murphy the court held the company answerable for the corruption of the plaintiff's well by reason of fluids percolating from the works. The entire dominion of the defendant over its property in the present case is undenied, but it had no right, while enjoying its use, although in a legitimate way, to violate, by the manner of its use, the rights of others. It seems to us unreasonable to adjudge that the erection and operation of gas works, or buildings for the storage of oil, with the noxious and injurious substances, by reason of the deposit on the surface permeating the ground, and injuring or destroying the taste or use of water belonging to and on the property of others, is such a legitimate use of one's property, and his dominion over it, as to preclude any recovery for an injury to the property of his neighbor, however great: and to require a notice that the injury has been inflicted before the action can be maintained would be to destroy the theory or the principle upon which a recovery in the case is permitted. It is argued that the appellee was ignorant of the existence of the nuisance or injury to appellant's spring, and had no right to suppose that its oil was affecting the water in the spring of the plaintiff. This may be so, and still the defendant is responsible for the injury, although it was not aware that its neglect in permitting the oil to leak from the casks, and stand in pools outside the building, had or would work an injury to the plaintiff. If a nuisance, whether neglect or not, the appellee is liable.

We have assumed, in the consideration of the questions presented, that the injury complained of resulted from the manner in which the oil was kept in the store-house of the defendant, but we are not to be understood as taking that question from the jury on the return of the case. Some question was made in the court below as to the right of the plaintiff in estimating the value of his spring, or the damages occasioned by the act of the defendant, to show that years before he had sold water from it; this testimony was properly excluded. We do not understand that the injury has resulted in the entire destruction of the spring or the water for use, and for that reason the actual damage sustained is the criterion of recovery,—the deprivation of the use of the water for domestic or farm purposes up to the time of the trial. The continuance of the use of the building for the purposes of storing the oil, without any additional protection to the flow of the oil to the spring of the plaintiff, would subject the appellee to another action. We cannot well see how the plaintiff can be fully compensated in any other mode; and to make the injury permanent, when it is certainly in the power of the defendant to prevent it, would be subjecting it to the payment of damages, although the beneficial use of the spring had been again restored.

Judgment reversed, and remanded, with directions to award a new trial, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Messrs. O. H. Waddle, J. T. May and T. Z. Morrow for appellees.

Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record, as we think, establishes substantially the following state of case: In 1849 the appellant, William McQuerry, and his father, John McQuerry, bought two land warrants each, of 160 acres each, which had been issued by the federal government to the soldiers of the Mexican war. These warrants were for land in the State of Iowa. The appellant, by an arrangement with his father, went to the State of Iowa, in company with his younger brother, Milton Green McQuerry, then about seventeen years old, for the purpose of locating said warrants, and of obtaining patents, two of which were to be in his own name and two in the name of his father, John McQuerry. But, if from any cause, patents on the two warrants could not be obtained in the father's name, they were to be obtained in the appellant's name, for the benefit of the father. The appellant, on arriving at the land office in the State of Iowa, found, owing to the absence of his father from the State, and not having his written power of attorney, that he could not obtain the patents in his father's name, and, pursuant to the alternative agreement, caused them to be issued in his own name, but failed thereafter to convey the land to his father. His father, in 1852, died, leaving a last will, which was recorded in Pulaski County; and the appellant was named in the will, and qualified, as one of the executors, and entered upon, and continued to discharge, his duties as executor of the will. He was also one of the devisees of the will, and received the portion of the estate devised to him. The testator, among other things, willed to his wife, during her life, this Iowa land, remainder to his son, Milton Green McQuerry, and recited the fact that he bought the two warrants, and that the appellant had to have the patents issued in his own name, and requested him to convey the land to his wife for and during her life, remainder to Milton Green McQuerry. Milton Green McQuerry died soon after the war, without having had issue; and the widow of the testator, John McQuerry, having died in 1884, the appellees brought this action in equity against the appellant, to compel him to convey to the appellee, Mrs. Gilleland, sister of the appellant, and the other appellees, children of his other sister, deceased, their respective portions of said land, they claiming as co-heirs with the appellant of Milton Green McQuerry. The lower court adjudged that appellant should make the conveyance. From that judgment he has appealed.

It is to be observed that appellant is one of the devisees under the will, and is one of the executors of the will. Also, supposing that the testator was mistaken as to owning, or ever having owned, any interest in said land, that the appellant was bound to respect, and that it in fact belonged to the appellant, yet it is a fact that the testator devised a portion of his own estate to the appellant, and directed (the request is in this will a direction) the appellant to convey this land to his widow for life, remainder to Milton Green McQuerry. The testator, in making this direction, assumed to dispose of this land as his own, and, in connection with other estate, certainly his own, devised portions of the whole to all of his children; and, but for reckoning the whole as his, he doubtless would have made a different disposition of the estate that did in fact belong to him.

So the question arises, supposing that said land belonged to the appellant, but, the testator having assumed to dispose of it by will, and the appellant having been made a devisee under the will, and having accepted its provisions, has he not thereby elected to surrender all right to said land, and to make the conveyance according to the direction of the will? The principle is well settled, where a testator devises his own estate, or a part of it, to a person, and also devises that person's estate to another, and that person accepts the estate thus devised to him,

Brown* (Minn.) 44 N. W. Rep. 250.

A man who wrote his wife's will, and, after an executor had renounced, took administration cum testamento annexo, and acted for two or three years, and filed an account as administrator, and received some benefits under the will, must be held to have elected to claim under the will, instead of against it. Scholl's App. (Pa.) 17 Atl. Rep. 208.

such person will not be heard to assert his old right, but by thus accepting the provisions of the will, he relinquishes his old right to the other person. He cannot enjoy the bounty conveyed by the will, and at the same time claim his old right. The intention of the testator, in such case, is that both bounties shall take effect, and the conscience of the devisee is affected by this intention; and having accepted the bounty, it would be a fraud upon the testator to allow him to thus accept the bounty, and at the same time hold on to the bounty that the testator intended for another; and, but for the belief that such other would receive the bounty, the devisees would not have been thus made. It is to prevent this fraud that equity puts this donee to his election, and, having made his election to accept the provision for his benefit, he thereby elects to abide by all of the provisions of the will, and surrender all rights inconsistent with them, and to do whatever the will directs him to do in order to carry out its provisions. The right of the appellees did not accrue until after the death of the widow of the testator, which occurred in 1884.

The appellant contends that, as the will was not recorded in Lucas County, Iowa, where the land was situated, the appellees cannot maintain this action. This contention is based upon the fact that, as Milton Green McQuerry could not have maintained an action in the State of Iowa for the recovery of the land, because the will was not recorded in that State, it follows that his heirs cannot maintain this action to compel a conveyance. We cannot agree to this contention. It is well settled that the performance of an equitable obligation, or an obligation that may be enforced by an action in personam and not in rem, may be enforced wherever the chancellor may obtain personal jurisdiction of the person, without regard to the fact that the real estate to which such obligation relates is situated in another State.

In the case of Massie v. Watts, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 148 [8 L. ed. 181] (case going to the supreme court from this State), the court said: "Either in consequence of contract, or as trustee, or as the holder of a legal title acquired by any species of mala fides practiced on the plaintiff, the principles of equity give a court jurisdiction wherever the person may be found; and the circumstance that a question of title may be involved in the inquiry, and may even constitute the essential point on which the case depends, does not seem sufficient to arrest that jurisdiction. . . . This court is of opinion that, in case of fraud or trust or of contract, the jurisdiction of a court of chancery is sustainable wherever the person be found, although lands not within the jurisdiction of that court may be affected by the decree."

In such case the subject matter is not that of the recovery of land. In other words, it is not an action in rem. The court need not have the land before it in order to be able to render a judgment. But the action is in personam, for the purpose of enforcing a personal obligation of contract or of trust. It is true that the title to land is to be affected by the decree, in so far as it compels the party to convey; but, as said, by reason of his trust or contract duty, he is personally obliged to convey, and that duty may be discharged in one State as well as another, although the land may not be situated in such State. It is the breach of trust or contract to convey, that may be complied with without regard to the location of the land, that gives the right of action in personam. If Milton Green McQuerry were alive, he, for the foregoing reasons, could maintain this action in this State; and, he being dead, the appellees can maintain it.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed and on February 4, 1890, Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is true that the children of Mrs. Gilmore, the appellee's deceased sister, are not made parties to this action. The reason for not making them parties is that they, as is alleged and proven, in 1872, received from the appellant a conveyance to all of said land, except 120 acres thereof, which is not of greater value than one third of the whole tract, less 20 acres sold by Milton McQuerry in his lifetime. It is true that said children, as representatives of Milton McQuerry, were entitled to one third of the land thus conveyed to them; and, if they or their mother purchased the same from the appellant, the purchase was wrongful, for it belonged to them. It is also true that appellant conveyed to said children the third of said land that belonged to him. It is also true that the appellees only sued for one third of said land, and the court adjudged that she was entitled to the 120 acres of the land, as one third of the whole, and ordered the appellant to make a deed to the same. So the intimation of counsel, to the effect that the appellant's right to only one third of the land was ignored by the judgment, is a mistake. Also, the appellees were entitled to one third of the whole tract, less what Milton McQuerry sold, notwithstanding the fact that Mrs. Gilmore might have waived or failed to assert her right to one third by inheritance, and have bought the same from the appellant. The fact that she failed to do so, if she did, can in no wise prejudice the appellee's right to her third of the whole. The record shows that the appellant conveyed equivalent to two thirds of this land to the children of Mrs. Gilmore,—one third that they were entitled to in right of their mother, as heir of Milton Querry, and one third as a purchase from the appellant, his inheritance from said Milton,—leaving only one third in value of the land, the quantity that the appellee is entitled to. We are at a loss to know why the appellee may not recover this, as it is set off from the balance by metes and bounds, without joining said children.

Petition overruled.

Pollution of stream. Plaintiffs are the owners of a tract of land through which the Papillion Creek flows, and which land is used for general farming purposes and for stock raising, watering their cattle from the creek. The defendant owns a larger track of land immediately adjoining, up the stream from the plaintiffs. The defendant erected a large feeding stable for cattle, in which were kept and fed a maximum of 3,750 head of cattle. The barn was washed out by means of steam pumps twice daily, and the dung, urine and droppings from the cattle carried by means of sewers into the creek, and by force of the stream down to and upon the plaintiffs' land, thereby fouling and polluting the water, and rendering it unfit for use, creating an atmospheric stench and nuisance. This was continued for about two years. In an action in equity by the plaintiffs against the defendant, —Held, that the defendant would be enjoined from continuing such nuisance.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was appealed from the judgment of the District Court of the County of Sarpy, which dissolved the injunction against the defendant, and dismissed the action of the plaintiffs. The suit was brought to restrain the defendant from polluting the waters and injuring the flow of the current of Papillion Creek, by discharging into it the manure and offal from the extensive cattle-feeding barns maintained by the defendant, in such manner and degree as to injure the stream for husbandry, and destroy it for watering live stock, on the adjacent premises of the plaintiffs. The facts appear that in 1885 the plaintiffs bought two parcels of land lying on said stream. The one of eighty acres was originally pre-empted by Gilmore, and was bought of one Frost, by which names it is designated; the other, of 160 acres, was bought of Gates, after whom it is called,—both lying on the creek below the defendant's lands and barns. In the same year the defendant bought 400 acres of land on the creek, adjacent to and above the lands of plaintiffs, for feeding barns and grounds for its cattle. The barns are alleged to provide stalls for 3,500 cattle, each animal having a small separate stall, ranged in rows, heads and tails, in uniformity, with aisles for feeding between head rows, and the like between tails for carrying away manure and offal; the droppings falling into a trough to be carried off by a flow of water, in quantities, two or three times daily, and thus conveyed to a sewer, through which it is carried on into the stream, amounting to 1,000,000 gallons daily. By this method it is claimed by the plaintiffs the water of the stream is disturbed and polluted, rendered foul for all common uses, and impregnated with noxious exhalations, destructive to husbandry and dangerous to health. The plaintiffs ask that the judgment below be reversed; that the injunction against the defendant be restored and continued, remedying the injuries complained of, and for general relief. The answer of the defendant admits the location of the land and property of either party on Papillion Creek, in Sarpy County, as alleged, and admits maintaining the cattle barns in the manner stated; and sets up that the plaintiffs had notice and full knowledge of the manner and results of defendant's business prior to establishing it, and consented thereto, and therefore have no cause of complaint.

Upon the trial the allegations of the petition as to the ownership and occupation of the property constituting the plaintiffs' riparian proprietors of a portion of the small stream called the "Papillion," in Sarpy County, was fully proved; that they owned and occupied said property on either side of said stream for general farming and cattle raising purposes. The allegations of the petition as to the occupation of a large tract of land upon said stream immediately above and adjoining the land of the plaintiffs by the defendant Company, and the use of it by said defendant in the manner and for the purpose as set out in the plaintiffs' petition, was also fully proved. The nature, character and extent of the damage and injury to the plaintiffs caused by the use of the defendant's feeding barn, and the casting of the manure and urine of their cattle, and other foul and deleterious substances therefrom, into the said stream, and such substances mixing with the water of said stream, and floating down to and upon the land of plaintiffs, was also proved.

I shall not deem it necessary to set out specifically the dates of the acquisition of their several rights in their respective properties upon said stream by the parties plaintiffs and defendant, as, upon a careful examination of the evidence applicable to that branch of the case, it does not appear that either party has acquired any prescriptive rights, or been guilty of laches which can be urged against them in the case. While from the evidence it may be deemed probable that the nuisance to the plaintiffs' land by the defilement of the water of the creek was aggravated by the discharge of premature calves, or, as one of defendant's witnesses called them, "slumps or deacons," therein, along with the ordinary dung and urine from the cattle, during a portion of the time covered by the pleadings, to an extent not to be apprehended generally in the future, yet it appears from the evidence that the method used by the defendant of using warm or heated feed tends to cause cows to prematurely drop their calves, and where large numbers of them are kept together, and fed in that manner, an entire cessation of that source of defilement is scarcely to be expected. But, aside from this, it is fully established by the evidence that the maintenance of defendant's feed stable in the manner contemplated by its owner and those skilled in that method of feeding cattle, and operated strictly in accordance with the rules and requirements of the system adopted, contemplates, and will inevitably cause, the destruction of the stream below, so far as its value to the plaintiffs is concerned, and for the use and purpose for which it has heretofore been deemed most useful and valuable.

Considerable evidence as well as discussion on the part of defendant is devoted to the proposition that the injury complained of is trifling; and it is sought to show that plaintiffs may provide means of watering their stock without resorting to Papillion Creek, by the outlay of a few hundred dollars, and an annual expenditure of 20 per cent of the original cost. To this point defendant cites the case of Jacobs v. Allard, 42 Vt. 803. In that case plaintiffs were the owners and operators of a starch mill propelled by water. Defendant was the owner of a shingle mill on the same stream above. The cause of action was "that the defendant, 'with the intent and design to injure the orators, and damage and hinder them from the use of the water for the purpose of their starch factory,' threw into the stream the saw-dust and shavings and waste from the shingle mill. . . . and that they render the water impure and unfit for making starch, and clog the flume and penstock, and prevent the use of the starch factory," etc. The court, in the opinion, says: "The evidence makes a rather strong impression on our minds that much of the trouble which the orators claim, and give evidence to show, that they experience in the condition of the water as it comes to their works, is attributable to the manner in which they have constructed and adjusted a new dam, in reference to their works, and to the lack of proper fend-ers and strainers to protect against impurities that may get into the stream from the mills and works above the orators. It would seem that by proper modes and means, which they could, without unreasonable pains and expense, have adopted and put in use, they could have secured themselves from the troubles complained of while the defendant was using his shingle mill, and letting the saw-dust and waste from it go into the stream."

The distinction between the above case and the case at bar in respect to the remedy suggested is that in the one case it is a prevention of the effect of the pollution, and in the other it contemplates the enduring of the effect of the pollution of the stream, but suggests the creation of an artificial watercourse to supply plaintiff's land, and contemplates the abandonment of the stream, which is the subject of the litigation. The difference, as it seems to me, is radical in principle, and I do not think that the comparatively small cost at which plaintiffs might be able to supply water for their cattle from an independent source can be considered in connection with their right to have the stream remain uncontaminated in the manner shown by the pleadings and bill of exceptions.

I cannot agree with the defendant in the assertion in the brief under the second point, that "the waters of the Papillion before the building of the defendant's barn were unfit for cattle." I do not so understand the evidence. While it was doubtless inferior in sparkling clearness to the waters of streams of mountainous regions, where the soil is poor, consisting in great part of sand and gravel, the evidence as a whole fails to distinguish it from the general run of Nebraska streams of about the same size, in respect to the clearness and salubrity of its waters, and the height of its banks and firmness of its bottom. That it has been used by the inhabitants of the country along its banks for the purposes of stock water since the first settlement of the territory is sufficiently established by the evidence.

Defendant in the brief under the third point uses the following language: "We admit the general rule that the proprietor above must so use the water as not to impair the enjoyment of it by the proprietor below, and therefore must not pollute it. But that general rule is subject to a qualification inherent in the nature of the subject, and the relative rights of the parties." The rule is stated in nearly the same language by Judge Maxwell, in the article on injunctions, 10 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 844: "Every owner of land through which a stream of water flows is entitled to the use and enjoyment of the water, and to have the same flow in its natural and accustomed course, without obstruction, diversion or pollution. The right extends to the quality, as well as the quantity of water. If, therefore, an adjoining proprietor corrupts the water, an action will lie against him;" and this is the law substantially as laid down in the cases there cited, especially Holman v. Boiling Spring Bleaching Co. 14 N. J. Eq. 335; Richmond Mfg. Co. v. Atlantic De Laine Co. 10 R. I. 106; Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. 162; Baltimore v. Warren Mfg. Co. 59 Md. 96.

These cases are authority for the plaintiffs in the case at bar as to all its branches. In most or all of them it was held that an injunction would be granted without regard to the magnitude of the interest enjoined. It is true, as stated by the defendant in the brief, that no complaint is made that the defendant's barns were improperly built or negligently managed. Nor can it be denied that the defendant's business might be legitimately carried on without damage to adjoining land owners upon a stream of the size of the Missouri or the Platte, but it is manifest from the evidence that it cannot, in the magnitude described in the evidence, be carried on without infringing upon the rights of the lower land owners upon a stream of the size of the Papillion.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss the question whether the plaintiffs have a remedy by action at law, for I understand it to be settled by the authority of the cases cited, as well as many others, that a continuing nuisance by polluting the waters of a stream, and others of a like character, may be proceeded against either by law or in equity at the election of an injured party. See also Webb v. Portland Mfg. Co. 8 Sumn. 189; Ang. Watercourses, § 444, and cases there cited; Atty-Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415; Lyon v. McLaughlin, 32 Vt. 423.

The injury complained of by the plaintiffs is the pollution of the watercourse, and not the improper or unreasonable use of the water of the stream by the defendant. This is a question of fact, and, as the decree of the district court was for the defendant, it must be presumed that it found that there was no pollution of the stream; but such finding is unsustained by the evidence as contained in the bill of exceptions, and is clearly against it. The decree of the district court is reversed, and a decree for the plaintiffs, as prayed, will be entered in this court.

to lower the outlet and draw down the water in the pond or lake below its natural low-water line.

2. The right to divert water from a stream, under Rev. Stat., chap. 82, § 1, does not include the right to lower the outlet of a great natural pond or lake, and lower the surface of the water.

3. An injunction may be granted to prevent drawing down the water of a pond below its natural low-water line where defendants avow an intention to do so whenever, in times of drought, the water is needed, and have already lowered the outlet to some extent, although the damages have thus far been nominal only.

(June 28, 1889.)

ON report from the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County, for the opinion of the full court, of a suit brought to enjoin defendants from drawing down the water in certain ponds below its natural level and to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted from such action. Judgment for plaintiffs.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Private persons may restrain a nuisance affecting the public rights, when they receive special damages.

Potter v. Howe, 2 New Eng. Rep. 167, 141 Mass. 357.

Messrs. William H. Fogler, Charles E. Littlefield and T. R. Simonton for defendants.

Walton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity, the prayer of which is that the defendants may be restrained by injunction from drawing off the waters of certain ponds named in the bill below their natural low-water mark.

It appears that the plaintiffs own land bounded on the ponds, and that the defendants own mills on the outlet; and the complaint is that by excavating the channel the defendants are able, in times of drought, to draw down the water in the ponds below their natural low-water line, and that this is a damage to the plaintiffs' land.

We think the injunction prayed for must be granted. We do not think the owners of mills on a stream, flowing from a great natural pond or lake, have a right to lower the outlet, and draw down the water in the pond or lake below its natural low-water line.

Such a right is inconsistent with the existence of the pond as a pond. If exercised to its fullest extent, it would destroy the pond. All the water might be drawn out, and its bed left dry, a mere stream of running water only remaining. And, if exercised to any extent, the necessary effect must be to widen the shores, and deprive the adjoining land owners of their natural water frontage; for it is the settled law of this State that lands bounded on a great pond or lake extend only to the natural low-water line, and that all beyond is owned by the State; and this natural water frontage may be as valuable to the land owner as the right to draw water is to the mill owner. But, whether of equal value or not, it is of equal validity in law, and entitled to equal protection.

This precise question was recently considered in Massachusetts, and the court held that the water of a great pond could not be lawfully drawn down below its natural low-water line; 7 L. R. A.

that such a use of the water would be unreasonable; that great ponds belong to the public; that to draw down the water below its natural level is inconsistent with the common right to the use of the pond as a pond; that for such an abstraction of the water an information or an indictment would undoubtedly lie for the public wrong; and that an adjoining landowner thereby deprived of his natural water frontage could obtain redress by injunction. Potter v. Howe, 141 Mass. 357, 2 New Eng. Rep. 167.

As great ponds and lakes are public property, the State may undoubtedly control and regulate their use as it thinks proper. But, in the absence of legislative authority, no individual or corporation can lawfully draw down the water of a great natural pond or lake below its natural low water line.

It is urged in defense that our Mill Act secures to mill owners the right to cut canals and divert water, and that the lowering of the outlet of a pond, and the drawing down of the water, may be justified under this Act. We think not. The language of the Statute is that a man may cut a canal on his own land, "and thereby divert from its natural channel the water of any stream," etc. Rev. Stat. chap. 92, § 1.

To divert is to turn aside. The mere abstraction of water can hardly be called a diversion of it. The lowering of a natural channel can hardly be called the diversion of water "from its natural channel." Nor can the water of a pond properly be called the water of a stream. The terms "pond" and "stream" do not mean the same thing. Nor is there anything in the history of the Act, or the inconvenience to be remedied, which leads us to believe that the Legislature could have intended that the word "stream" should include a pond. We think the Statute does not apply.

The evidence fails to satisfy us that at the time of the commencement of this suit the defendants had drawn down the waters of the ponds referred to in the plaintiffs' bill below their natural low-water level more than once, and then only for a short time, during the dry season of 1886. The damages, therefore, can be nominal only. But, as the defendants admit that they have lowered the outlet of the ponds some four feet more, and avow their intention to draw down the water below its natural low-water line, whenever, in times of drought, the water is needed for their mills, we think the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction prayed for.

ON report from the Supreme Judicial Court for Oxford County, for the opinion of the full court, of a suit to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's lands, which were alleged to result from the interference by defendant with the natural flow of a certain stream which crossed them. Judgment for defendant.

Defendant was incorporated and given power to improve certain streams for the purpose of facilitating the driving of logs. It built a dam across the Swift Cambridge River above plaintiff's lands, and thereby accumulated a head of water which it permitted logowners to use in driving their logs upon payment of certain tolls. The action of the logs and water injured plaintiff's lands, and he brought this action to recover damages therefor. The case was submitted on an agreed statement of facts, and in case defendant was liable damages were to be assessed by a referee, otherwise judgment to be for the defendant.

Mr. D. Hammons for plaintiff.

Mr. A. E. Herrick, for defendant:

The provisions in the Constitution of the State, art. 1, § 21, as to making compensation for property taken, applies only to such a taking as transfers the title from the owner to others for public use.

That indirect and remotely consequential injury might arise would not make the defendant liable when such injury was not the result of its action.

Sumner v. Richardson Lake Dam Co. 71 Me. 109.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Facts agreed. Swift Cambridge River in Maine is a non-tidal stream, but is capable, in its natural state, of floating to market logs and other products of the forest, and hence is a public highway for all the people of the State. Brown v. Chadbourne, 81 Me. 9.

The Legislature authorized the defendant Company, among other things, to build dams across this river for the purpose of facilitating the driving of logs and improving the navigation. Spec. Laws 1875-77, chap. 106.

The defendant Company, in pursuance of its charter, and for the purposes named, built a dam across the river, about four miles above the plaintiff's land. There is no suggestion, in the statement of facts, that the dam is not properly constructed, and not wholly within the terms of the defendant's charter.

The head of water accumulated by this dam increases the flow below the dam, when the gates are opened for the passage of logs. This increased flow facilitates the driving of the logs, which is the object of the Company's charter and works. The greatest increase in the height of the river, where it passes through the plaintiff's land, caused by this increased flow, is one foot. The action of this increased flow of water, and of the logs borne along upon it, "has tended to widen and deepen the stream by gradually wearing away the soil of the banks and bottom across the plaintiff's land."

The plaintiff brings this common-law action to recover damages for that injury to his land. He makes no other complaint. None of his land has been appropriated by the defendant. It has not flowed nor occupied his land. It has not diverted any water from or upon it. So far as appears, it has by their erections detained the water a reasonable time, and let it down in reasonable quantities, at proper seasons. This is just what is being continually done on nearly every stream in the State, and what every riparian owner submits to, with little thought of claiming damages.

The plaintiff's injury, if any, does not flow from the wrongful act of anyone, and hence is damnum absque injuria. To hold otherwise,—to hold that the mere tendency of an increased flow of water, at times, in its natural channel to wear away soil, is in itself a cause of action against the owners of mills and dams,—would prevent all improvement of inland navigation, and would paralyze all industries dependent on water power. A law requiring such a judgment can never have been established by the people.

The plaintiff urges, however, that the Legislature cannot authorize the improvement of the navigation of the public streams of the State without providing compensation to riparian owners for such injuries as his. It may be at once conceded, fully, that the Legislature cannot authorize the taking any property of a riparian owner, for use in improving the navigation, without providing compensation. If riparian land is taken for storage of water, or for a receptacle for discharged waters, or for dams, locks, etc., the owner is entitled to compensation for the injury caused by such taking. This concession, however, does not include incidental injuries, where no land is appropriated, and no water is diverted.

The riparian owners on all public streams in this State hold their riparian lands subject to the paramount right of navigation of such streams by the public. The public right of navigation existed before the private ownership of the land under or adjoining the public streams. The title to the whole, lands and rivers, was first in the sovereign, whether king, province or State. In all the grants of lands from the sovereign, there is always, at least unless otherwise expressly stipulated, a reservation of the public right to use all navigable rivers as public highways. Such a reservation naturally and properly retains with it the right for the sovereign to make and authorize all reasonable improvements, from time to time, to facilitate the use of the river by the public, even though the land owner thereby suffers inconvenience or loss, so long as none of his property is actually appropriated by the sovereign. This sovereign right has been continuously exercised in this State since its first settlement, and by the general, if not universal, consent of all its citizens. The statutes of nearly every legislative session contain Acts authorizing the improvement of rivers as public highways, by the erection of dams, and applying to nearly all the public rivers of the State. All these Acts assume the right of the State to make such improvements, without making compensation, except where private property is actually appropriated. The General Statute authorizing the erection of dams for creating water power contains no provision for compensation to riparian owners, when the stream is not diverted, nor the land overflowed. The early, long-continued and universal acquiescence in the exercise of such a right is the strongest evidence of its existence. A judicial decision can hardly be necessary to establish it.

The courts, however, have recognized this right of the State.

In Moor v. Veazie, 82 Me. 343, 357, the court, through Chief Justice Shepley, declared (quoting from Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 4, prop. 8) that "the common law accorded to the sovereign power the care, supervision and protection" of the common right of navigation in navigable rivers," and the court further used the following language: "The power which has the care, supervision and protection" of a common right is bound to regulate its use in such manner that it may be safe and convenient. The duty to make the use safe and convenient involves the right to remove obstructions, to improve, or to render more safe and convenient the water for the purpose of navigation."

In Sumner v. Richardson Lake Dam Co., 71 Me. 106, it did not appear that the defendant's dam in any way caused the injury complained of, and hence the case is not directly in point. Still, the defendant company was chartered to build dams to improve the navigation of a public stream, and the court plainly intimated that the charter was lawful, though it did not provide compensation for consequential injuries,—such injuries as are complained of here.

In other States, this question between the State and the riparian owners has been directly presented and adjudicated.

In Hollister v. Union Co. 9 Conn. 436, the defendant company was authorized by the Legislature to build piers, wharves, bridges, etc., in the Connecticut River, to improve its navigation. The company's works, built under its charter, deflected the current of the river against the plaintiff's land, washing it gradually away. It was held that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The decision was put on the ground that the State had the control of the river, and the right to improve its navigation by any appropriate means, and that every grantee of land on the river took subject to that right.

In Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Connecticut River Co., 20 Fed. Rep. 71, the same doctrine was upheld by the federal court in the Connecticut District.

In Henry v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 30 Vt. 638, the defendant company, in pursuance of legislative authority, constructed works that turned the current of a stream, so that it washed away the plaintiff's land. It was held that the injury was consequential only, and that the plaintiff could not recover.

In Alexander v. Milwaukee, 16 Wis. 264, the city, under legislative authority, made a "straight cut" across a point of land, to improve the harbor. The current flowing through this straight cut came against and wore away the plaintiff's land. Held, that the plaintiff had no cause of action.

In Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536, the defendants, by legislative authority, changed the current of American River, so as to make the floods less dangerous at Sacramento. This change caused the current to wash the lands of the plaintiff. Held, that the defendant was protected by the legislative authority.

In Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coon, 6 Pa. 383, the company, under its charter, built dams and locks in the Monongahela River to improve its navigation. These works so held back the water as to retard the current in the Youghiogheny River above, to the injury of the plaintiff. Held, that the State had the right to improve the navigation of its rivers, and that the plaintiff had no cause of action.

The same doctrine is well expressed in a later Pennsylvania case, McKeen v. Delaware D. Canal Co., 49 Pa. 439, by Agnew, J., as follows: "The injury, therefore, which followed the raising of the water in the stream to improve the navigation, was not a taking of property, but one merely consequential, which he must suffer without compensation. . . . Everyone who buys property upon a navigable stream purchases subject to the superior rights of the Commonwealth to regulate and improve the stream for the benefit of all her citizens."

It is urged, however, that the defendant's charter makes it responsible, in this action, for the plaintiff's injury.

By the second section of the charter the Company is authorized to take land and materials, "being accountable to the owners thereof for all damages, if any, to be ascertained by reference, or by actions on the case." This does not include consequential injuries. The right of action here specified is clearly confined to land and materials taken by the Company. No land nor materials have been taken in this case. Hollister v. Union Co. 9 Conn. 436, supra.

1. A town has no authority to vote a tax for reimbursement of a collector who has improperly taken a note for taxes, and after accounting for it as money, been unable to collect it.
2. The designation of a person against whom a tax warrant is issued by a wrong name will not exonerate the collector's failure to collect the tax where the mistake is too slight to raise any question of identity.
3. Citizens can be taxed only for lawful public purposes.

(June 26, 1880.)

ON defendants' exceptions to a judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County (Danforth, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover back money paid by plaintiff as tax collector to the town treasurer, upon a certain tax warrant which he afterwards failed to collect. Sustained.

The case was referred to the court without the intervention of a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"This is an action for the recovery of an amount voted by the Town to be paid to the plaintiff, and interest on same.

"It is agreed that plaintiff was collector of taxes of said Town for the year 1873, and that among the various taxes intrusted to him for collection for that year was one against D. Knowlton & Co. amounting to more than $300; that he failed to collect of them a portion of said tax, amounting to $316.06 except to take the note of said D. Knowlton & Co., running to himself; that said note was never paid to him, or any part thereof, owing to the insolvency of said D. Knowlton & Co.; that the plaintiff, supposing said note to be collectible, paid the amount of the same to the town treasurer for the said Town of Camden; that he did not, as collector, attempt to enforce any portion of said tax against the real estate of said company, as the tax was assigned to D. Knowlton & Co., while the property meant to be taxed belonged to and was in the name of D. Knowlton Company, a corporation, there being no such party as D. Knowlton & Co.; that in 1885, at the annual meeting of said defendant Town, on an article of the following tenor, to wit:

"Art 31st. To see if the Town will vote to refund to Larkin Thorndike so much of the tax assessed to D. Knowlton & Co. in 1873 as was paid to the Town, but never collected, amt. to $316.06, and interest on same; also, what sum of money they will vote to raise to pay the same,"—It was voted as follows:

"Art. 31st. Voted the selectmen be authorized to pay Larkin Thorndike the sum of three hundred dollars ($300) the same to be raised by assessment; that this sum was early in the year of 1885 demanded of the selectmen of said Town, but has never been paid to the plaintiff, nor assessed by said Town. Luke Upham protested against the payment of said 7 L. R. A.

sum, which was recorded. The taxes on the property of D. Knowlton Company, corporation, for years 1872 and 1877 were assessed in the name of D. Knowlton & Co., and paid to collector."

Mr. Thomas A. Hunt, with Mr. T. R. Simonton, for defendants.

Mr. J. H. Montgomery, for plaintiff:

A municipal corporation has power to settle disputed claims against it, and an agreement to pay these is not void for want of consideration.

Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 477.

A vote by a town is in law a promise express, and if there be a consideration, it is a foundation for an action.

Nelson v. Milford, 7 Pick. 25.

The collector paid the amount of the tax to the Town under a mistaken idea of his rights, and the Town voted to refund the money inadvertently paid to it by the plaintiff. This is a good consideration for the vote and binds the Town.

Nelson v. Milford, supra; Bean v. Jay, 23 Me. 121.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is presented by the defendants' exceptions to the ruling of the presiding justice awarding judgment for plaintiff on an agreed statement of facts. In submitting a case upon an agreed statement, the plaintiff has the burden of stating all the facts necessary for the maintenance of his action. He must not depend on inferences. Omissions will be construed against him.

In this case we must assume that the plaintiff was the duly elected and qualified collector of taxes in the defendant Town for the year 1873; that he had a legal and sufficient warrant to collect a tax of $316, legally assessed against a party liable to taxation in said Town, and styled in the warrant, "D. Knowlton & Co.," that he made no effort to collect said tax further than to illegally permit them to give their note instead of the money for their tax; that he took the note as money, and accounted for it as money to the town treasurer; that twelve years afterwards, in 1885, the note not having been paid, the Town voted, under proper articles in the warrant, to pay him $300 in consideration of the premises, the said sum to be raised by assessment.

Has the Town the power to impose a tax for such purpose? Clearly not, unless the plaintiff's claim is incident to, or connected with, the exercise by the Town of its legal powers.

A town is not a business or a charitable corporation. It is simply a political organization, created as a convenient agent for the performance of certain governmental duties and purposes. Its powers are almost entirely political, and are properly limited to its duties. It has only such control over the citizen and his money or property as is expressly granted to it, or is necessary to the performance of its duty to the public. Indeed, a town is only a trustee for the public. It does not own the money in its treasury, nor the municipal property generally, but only holds them in trust for the public, and subject to public control through the Legislature. Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 61; Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472 [26 L. ed. 197].

The narrow limit of the taxing power of a town, and of its power over money paid into its treasury from other sources than town taxes, is illustrated by many decided cases. In the absence of a special statute, a town cannot raise money for purposes of local defense against an invading enemy (Stetson v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 272); nor to build places of amusement for its inhabitants (Ibid.); nor to abate taxes (Cooley v. Grantville, 10 Cush. 56); nor to celebrate an anniversary (Tash v. Adams, Id. 252), not even "Fourth of July" (Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen, 103); nor to provide uniforms for a local military company (Claffin v. Hopkinton, 4 Gray, 502); nor to obtain a city or town charter (Frost v. Belmont, 6 Allen, 152); nor to oppose division of the town (Coolidge v. Brookline, 114 Mass. 592; Westbrook v. Deering, 63 Me. 231); nor to pay a private fire company (Greenough v. Wakefield, 127 Mass. 275); nor to build a courthouse (Bachelder v. Epping, 28 N. H. 354); nor to build a county jail (Drew v. Davis, 10 Vt. 506); nor to build a bridge in another town (Concord v. Boscawen, 17 N. H. 465); nor to aid a private cemetery association. Luques v. Dresden, 77 Me. 186.

It cannot divide among its inhabitants money received from the State (Hooper v. Emery, 14 Me. 375); nor assess a tax to pay back money voluntarily paid into its treasury to aid in relieving the town from military draft. Perkins v. Milford, 59 Me. 315.

Within its sphere, a town may exercise some discretion as to what claims to pay or to contest. In the matter of schools, roads, paupers, fire-engines, town-houses, etc., matters which towns are created to care for, the town may determine what claims on these accounts it will pay. The claim in suit, however, arises out of matters which are not intrusted to the control of town meetings. It concerns the collection of public taxes.

The Statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 3, § 46) empowers a town to raise money for specified purposes,—that is, to fix and order by vote the amount to be assessed and collected for proper town charges; but there the discretionary power of the town seems to end. The Statute gives it no control over the assessment or collection of any taxes. It is true the Statute requires the town to appoint the assessors and collectors of all state, county and town taxes to be levied within its territory, but the town does this as the political agent of the State. The appointment could have been intrusted to any other agency. These officers are not corporate agents. They are public officers, owing to the public, and not to the town alone, the duties imposed by Statute. Only their appointment comes from the town. Their authority is from the Statute, and they cannot be controlled by the town in the execution of that authority. Desty, Taxn. 508, 685; State v. Wulton, 62 Me. 106.

No vote of the town can relieve the assessors of any part of their statute duty; nor can such vote control their action in any detail. The town cannot by vote increase, diminish or vary the duties which the tax collector owes to the public, nor relieve him in case of his neglect, except in the very few cases where the Statute so provides. There is an implication, perhaps, in Rev. Stat., chap. 6, § 173, that the town may relieve a collector who has made a fruitless arrest after one year. In general, the negligent collector is dealt with, not by the town, but by other public officers clothed with authority for that purpose.

The assessors are authorized by statute in certain contingencies to take his tax warrant from him (§§ 147, 149); the state, county and town treasurers may each issue his warrant of distress against a delinquent or slothful collector. §§ 151, 152, 158. All these officers proceed, not under any vote of the town, but independent of it, and under statute authority. It would be their duty to act, when the occasion arises, even in spite of a vote of the town. When a tax collector has once received a legal tax warrant, he becomes chargeable with the whole amount of the tax, state, county and town. He must account in money to each treasurer for the amount ordered to be paid to him. Fake v. Whipple, 39 Barb. 839; Gorham v. Hall, 57 Me. 58.

This liability is not a private debt, due to the town as a corporation, which the corporation may release. It is an official liability to the public, which he can acquit himself of only by executing his warrant. If he neglects to execute his warrant, his liability to pay to the treasurers the amounts due them is as living and binding as if he had collected the money. His payments to the treasurers are general, on account of the whole sum ordered to be paid each, and not particular, on any individual tax. His warrant commands him to pay over a certain gross amount, not any particular taxes, to each treasurer. Any money he officially pays the treasurer, he pays on account of and to diminish this gross sum,—this liability. If he be dilatory, his own money or property can be taken on a treasurer's warrant of distress, and no vote of the town can restrain the treasurer or restore the money. If he be dilatory in collecting, and voluntarily pays his own money to the treasurer without waiting for the warrant of distress to be issued, he only does his official duty,—only pays what he was bound to pay, and could be compelled to pay. If no vote of the town can restrain the treasurer from compelling payment, it would seem that no vote of the town can force him to restore what has been voluntarily paid him by the collector on account of his official liability. In neither case does the collector acquire any right to repayment from his subsequent omission to collect of the taxpayer.

Without the execution or revocation of his warrant, the tax collector seems to have no claim in law, morals or good conscience, either to be excused from failure to collect, or to receive out of the town treasury sums he has paid under his liability, though in anticipation of collection. Such a claim on its face, whatever the particular facts, does not come within the purview of town meetings. If a town has no power to raise money from taxes to restore a gift voluntarily made to the town by one of its citizens, as was held in Perkins v. Milford, 59 Me. 315, much less has it power to raise money from taxes to restore to a public officer money he has paid to the town treasurer under an official obligation to do so.

This claim is that of a public officer to be compensated for a loss suffered by his neglect of his public duty. We nowhere find any authority for a town to make such compensation. For a town to make such a compensation to a delinquent collector, or to otherwise relieve him, would be in effect abating the taxes he omitted to collect. A town has no power to abate a tax. Cooley v. Granville, 10 Cush. 56.

The only tribunals authorized to grant abatements are the board of assessors and the appellate tribunal,—the county commissioners. A town meeting has no authority to review, modify or reverse the judgment of the assessors as to the persons or property to be taxed. Nor has it any authority to excuse a man from paying his tax, or to refund to him a legal tax once paid. To concede that a town can, directly or indirectly, abate a tax by vote in town meeting, is to concede the power of a town to determine who shall pay taxes and who shall be exempt, and the consequent power to place the public burdens wholly on such citizens as the majority shall single out for that purpose. This court has emphatically held that a town has no such power, and that the Legislature cannot confer it. Brewer Brick Co. v. Brewer, 62 Me. 62.

If the town cannot abate the tax, it certainly cannot excuse the collector from collecting it. The town cannot do indirectly what it has no direct power to do.

The agreed statement of facts does not disclose any legal excuse for the collector's failure to collect the tax in question. He had no concern with the ownership of the property, nor with the propriety of the tax. It is said in the agreed statement that the property meant to be taxed belonged to, and was in the name of,

"D. Knowlton Company," a corporation, there being no such party as "D. Knowlton & Co." It is said, however, that D. Knowlton & Co. gave a note for the tax, and that afterwards D. Knowlton & Co. became insolvent. There must therefore have been a party called "D. Knowlton & Co.," and it was unquestionably the same party as "D. Knowlton Company." The variation was simply in the name of the same party, and too slight to raise any question of identity. The agreed statement negatives the possibility of any other party. There was nothing in the matter of name to hinder the collector a moment. Farnsworth Co. v. Rand, 65 Me. 19.

The validity of the tax was not questioned.

We cannot see any ground upon which to sustain the vote of the Town directing the assessment of a tax upon its citizens to pay this claim. The law has not made town meetings the courts of last resort in a matter so highly important to every citizen as the prompt collection of public taxes. It does not permit the bestowal of public money upon a delinquent officer by a friendly majority in a town meeting. The limited power of towns over public money was well stated in Westbrook v. Deering, 63 Me. 281. The taxpayer is by no means at the mercy of local majorities. The law carefully guards his rights and immunities, and only permits him to be taxed for lawful public purposes. It gives the courts power to afford him ample protection against the inconsiderate, unauthorized action of towns.

Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law by defendants in error to recover damages resulting from an alleged negligent construction of a sewer, whereby both storm and sewage water, in times of unusual freshet, have been discharged from the sewer upon the premises owned by them. The market value of the freehold is charged to have been depreciated, and damages are sought both for injury and destruction of household furniture, as well as for permanent impairment of value of the realty. There was evidence admitted going to show value of the premises before and after the alleged wrong. The trial judge charged the jury that, if they found from the evidence "that the market value of the plaintiff's property has been permanently impaired by the construction of the sewer, its proximity and liability to back up surface water, and discharge offensive sewage matter upon his premises, he would be entitled to recover the difference in the market value of the property before and since the building of the sewer." This is assigned as error.

The sewer complained of was erected by the City, and is upon the public street upon which the property of Comer abuts. A private tributary sewer, erected and maintained by Comer, crosses his property, and passes under his house, and enters the public sewer. The supposed defect in the public sewer seems to be that in times of unusual rains it has not capacity sufficient to carry off the storm water flowing into it, and upon several occasions the accumulated sewage and storm water has been so great as to result in backing the water into the smaller and tributary sewer of Comer, whereby his premises have been flooded. Assuming that defendants in error were entitled to recover damages, the question is, What damages? Were they limited to such actual damage as they had sustained up to the time of their bringing of their suit, or may they recover not only past, but prospective, damages? If the latter, then the charge of his honor is correct; but, if limited to damages already sustained, then the charge is erroneous. The learned counsel for Comer and wife defend the measure of damages stated to the jury by the circuit judge upon the suggestion that "the sewer was a permanent improvement, and whatever damage it occasioned is of a permanent character," and that for this reason plaintiff cannot bring successive actions, but must recover his damage once for all. The recovery of prospective damages can only be justified upon the assumption that the premises of Comer will for all time to come be subject to the same disgusting invasion of sewage as has heretofore occurred. Damages assessed upon this basis, as is frankly conceded by counsel, would operate as a perpetual license to the City to continue the wrong of which it has been convicted. This we hold to be the consequence of a recovery upon a similar charge in a case of an action for a nuisance, where the judgment was submitted to by the defendant. Harmon v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 87 Tenn. 614. See, to same effect, 3 Sutherland, Damages, pp. 412, 414.

Is it just or right to assume that the wrong of which Comer complains is produced from a cause permanent in its character? That the sewer is a permanent improvement, and cost a great deal of money, will not, as we shall undertake to show, be a conclusive factor in the settlement of the question. It was lawfully constructed by the City, upon a public street. It was not erected with any purpose to discharge its sewage upon the premises of Comer, but, rather, to carry off the drainage, as well as that of others in the same territory. The complaint is not that the City has been guilty of any misconduct in erecting a sewer where this has been constructed, but that its servants have so unskillfully built it that upon the recurrence of certain unusual conditions it discharges its contents upon the premises of defendants in error. Now, upon what authority is it to be assumed that the negligence or unskillfulness of the servants of the City in the construction of this sewer will not be remedied? The argument is advanced that, inasmuch as it will require the expenditure of human labor to remedy the defects in this sewer, therefore the damages are to be treated as permanent and original, and recoverable in one action. This test is supported by the opinion of Judge Bell, who delivered the opinion of the court in the case of Troy v. Cheshire R. Co., 23 N. H. 88. In that case it appears that the railway company had built its roadway in and upon a public highway, in such manner as to obstruct and destroy its value as a street. The town was held entitled to recover as for a permanent occupation of the street, and damages were assessed accordingly. Now, if the railway was lawfully upon the street, then the damages recoverable were properly recovered in one suit. Harmon v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. supra. But, if it was unlawfully there, then it was a trespass, and an abatable nuisance, and successive actions would lie so long as it continued thereon, the recovery in such actions being limited to damages already accrued, and subsequent to the last recovery. Whether there rightfully or as a trespasser does not appear from the report of the case before us, but the inference is that it was not a trespasser; for otherwise there would have been no occasion for propounding the rule by which the permanent character of an injury is to be determined. This rule, as announced by Judge Bell, was that "wherever the nuisance is of such a character that its continuance is necessarily an injury, and where it is of a permanent character, that will continue without change from any cause but human labor, then the damage is an original damage, and may be at once fully compensated." 23 N. H. 102.

This seems to us an artificial and arbitrary test. There are supposable nuisances, which, by the effect of time, might at last abate themselves, but by far the greater number of trespasses, wrongs and nuisances would continue indefinitely, without the expenditure of human labor to remove or abate them. It is a rule which does not recommend itself by either its reasonableness, its certainty of application or its justice. It seems, however, to have commended itself to the Supreme Court of Iowa, who adopted it as a light sufficient to guide their decisions. One of the most signal illustrations of the unfortunate results flowing from a departure from the general rule which allows successive actions so long as a wrong in the nature of nuisance is continued, is found in this Iowa case. The facts of that case were that the plaintiff's lots were washed and cut by a ditch dug by the city, into which a natural watercourse was turned. After the cutting and removal of the soil had gone on for several years, the plaintiff sued for damages, alleging the negligent cutting of the ditch. It was held that his entire damages had accrued when the diverted stream first began to injure him, and that, not having then sued, he was bound by the Statute of Limitations. The judge who delivered the opinion, after quoting the principle above cited from Troy v. Cheshire R. Co., said: "If we apply the principle above stated to the case at bar, we must hold that the damages were original. The plaintiff's ground of complaint is that the ditch was improperly constructed. As constructed, it resulted in the excavation of the plaintiff's lots. The damage consisted, not in excavating the lots, but in doing an act which resulted in their excavation. The result, too, was a necessary one, the ditch remaining as constructed. The cause of the difficulty was a permanent one, in that it would not grow less unless remedied by human labor. The case, therefore, is strictly within the rule applied in Troy v. Cheshire R. Co., above cited." Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 656.

Thus the application of the rule now contended for would require a plaintiff to foresee all the possible results, and to convince a jury of what he, with prophetic ken, is required to foresee, on penalty of subsequently having to quietly endure consequences which he could not reasonably have conjectured as likely to result from what at first seemed a trifling injury.

The cases of North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 814, 1 West. Rep. 566, and Fonle v. New Haven & N. Co., 112 Mass. 334, have been examined, and we find that they do measurably support the contention of defendants in error. None of these cases are satisfactory in their reasoning, and the decided weight of authority is opposed to them. They are all reviewed in the case of Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 101 N. Y. 98, 2 Cent. Rep. 116, and an opposite conclusion reached.

In reviewing the case of North Vernon v.

Voegler, a case more analogous to the one under consideration than any other to which we have been referred, Earl, J., said: "What right was there to assume that the street would be left permanently in a negligent condition, and then hold that the plaintiff could recover damages upon the theory that the carelessness would forever continue? A municipality or a railroad corporation, under proper authority, may erect an embankment in a street; and if the work be carefully and skillfully done it cannot be made liable for the consequential damages to adjacent property. But if it be carelessly and unskillfully done it can be made liable. It may cease to be careless, or remedy the effects of its carelessness, and it may apply the requisite skill to the embankment; and this it may do after its carelessness and unskillfulness, and the consequent damages, have been established by a recovery in an action. The moment an action has been commenced, shall the defendant, in such a case, be precluded from remedying its wrong? Shall it be so precluded after a recovery against it? Does it establish the right to continue to be a wrong-doer forever by the payment of a recovery against it? Shall it have no benefit by discontinuing the wrong? And shall it not be left the option to discontinue it?" 101 N. Y. 125, 2 Cent. Rep. 126.

This assumption that a wrong-doer is to be presumed from the mere character of the work to intend to continue in his wrong, and that he will not remedy his defective or unskillful work, is repudiated in the majority of American cases.

In Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 787, the action was for diverting the course of a stream so as to throw surface water upon the lands of plaintiff. The damages were limited to such as had been already sustained, the court saying "that in all those cases where the cause of the injury is in its nature permanent, and a recovery for such injury would confer a license on the defendant to continue the cause, the entire damage must be recovered in a single action. But where the cause of the injury is in the nature of a nuisance, and not permanent in its character, but of such a character that it may be assumed that the defendant would remove it rather than suffer at once the entire damage which it might inflict, if permanent, then the entire damage cannot be recovered in a single action, but actions may be maintained, from time to time, as long as the cause of the injury continues."

In the case of Plate v. New York Cent. R. Co. the plaintiff in a former action had recovered damages of defendant for injuries sustained by the flooding of his land resulting from the negligent construction of its embankment and ditches, causing water to flow back upon his land. The same cause continuing, and other damages accruing, a second action was brought. It was held that the former judgment only established the right of plaintiff to recover damages subsequently sustained from the same cause. 37 N. Y. 472.

In Thayer v. Brooks, 17 Ohio, 489, the action was for damage for diverting water from the mill of the plaintiff by means of a canal cut by defendant. The jury were charged that they might render judgment for such damages as plaintiff has sustained by the mill-site having been diminished in value in consequence of the diversion of the water. The case was reversed, the supreme court saying: "This was going too far. . . . He was only liable . . . for the damages actually sustained prior to the commencement of the suit."

In Duryea v. New York the action was for wrongfully discharging water and sewage upon the premises of the plaintiff. Recovery was limited to damages actually sustained. 26 Hun, 120.

In Bars v. Hoffman the action was for diverting water from plaintiff's tannery by means of a pipe laid on the defendant's land. The jury were charged that they might recover the permanent damages to the freehold. The supreme court said a severance of the connection of the pipe with the stream would remove the whole cause of the complaint. "The act he committed was not of such a permanent character as to assume it to continue through all coming time, and to justify the assessment of damages accordingly. The general rule is that successive actions may be brought as long as the obstruction is maintained. A recovery in the first action establishes the plaintiff's right. Subsequent actions are to recover damages for a continuance of the obstruction." 79 Pa. 71.

Cases might be indefinitely multiplied in line with those cited. The line of cases presented by defendants in error is reviewed by Mr. Sutherland, who says, as to the effect of a recovery based upon the presumption of the permanent character of the wrong, that "such recovery will have the effect to give the defendant a permanent right to do the acts which constitute the nuisance, as fully as though there had been a condemnation of the property by the exercise of the power of eminent domain. But the option to recover permanent damages in a common-law action, with this effect, is not generally admitted in this country, and is wholly unknown in England." 3 Sutherland, Damages, 413, 414.

The weight of authority and the weight of reason alike condemn, as contrary to a true public policy, any rule by which a wrong-doer may thus procure a license to continue his misconduct. Such a rule would in many instances operate as a method by which private property would be condemned to private use against the will of the owner. It seems to us that the true rule deducible from the authorities is that the law will not presume the continuance of a wrong, nor allow a license to continue a wrong, where the causing the injury is of such a nature as to be abatable either by the expenditure of labor or money; and that, where the cause of the injury is one not presumed to continue, the damages recoverable from the wrong-doer are only such as have accrued before action brought, and that successive actions may be brought for the subsequent continuance of the wrong or nuisance.

It follows that it was error to admit proof as to the effect of the overflowing sewer upon the market value of Comer's property, and error to charge the jury that they could assess the damages upon any assumption that the wrong of the City would be perpetuated.

SMITH, County Clerk, Appt.,
 MAYOR, etc., OF NASHVILLE.
 (.....Tenn.....)

1. A city is not liable for a privilege tax on its waterworks under the Revenue Act of 1887, where the works are corporate property provided for furnishing water to extinguish fires and sprinkle the streets, and to supply its citizens either as a gratuity or for a compensation.
2. The liability of a city for a privilege tax of its waterworks on the ground of furnishing persons and corporations outside the corporate limits cannot be determined in a suit to recover back money paid under protest for a privilege tax assessed under the Revenue Act of 1887, for exercising the privilege of running a water company within its own limits, where there was no assessment for doing business elsewhere than in the city, and it does not appear that parties receiving the water outside of the city were in any city, town or taxing district, or if in any of these what was the number of inhabitants therein; as the amount of the tax depends on such population.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount paid under protest in satisfaction of a claim for alleged illegal taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ed. M. Woodall for appellant.

Mr. Lutton Taylor for appellee.

Caldwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This record raises the question of the liability of the City of Nashville for a privilege tax on the waterworks, under the Revenue Act of 1887. The case was before the court on petition for certiorari and supersedeas at the December Term, 1887, and the opinion there delivered is reported in 2 Pickle, beginning at page 214. The petition alleged the construction and maintenance of the waterworks by the City in its corporate capacity, for the public good, and not as a private enterprise for pecuniary gain or profit, and this court held that, in the absence of express statutory provision on the subject, the exemption from taxation arose by implication of law from the public ownership, nature and use of the property, as revealed by the allegations of the petition. It was further decided, however, that the City could not in that mode question its liability for that part of the tax assessed in favor of the State; but that its remedy was to pay the same under protest, and sue to recover the amount in thirty days, as provided by the Act of 1873. Hence, so far as the State was concerned, the petition was dismissed. As to the county it was retained, and remanded for further proceedings. Subsequently, the amount claimed for the State was paid under protest, and suit to recover the same was brought in due time. This new suit and what remained of the former one were then consolidated by mutual agreement, and heard together before the Honorable W. K. McAllister, Circuit Judge, without the intervention of a jury. Judgment was for the City, and there is an appeal in error on behalf of the State and county.

7 J. R. A.

The correctness of the decision heretofore made by this court on the allegations of the petition is conceded, but counsel for the State and county say that the proof on the trial refutes those allegations, and shows that the waterworks were used for pecuniary gain and profit, and not exclusively for the public good. P. J. Flanigan, comptroller of the City, was the only witness introduced. We give the material part of his evidence in his own words, as found in the bill of exceptions. He said "that said City always owned and operated the waterworks, . . . and it was maintained by levying a tax upon persons in said City who used the water supplied. That the water was used for extinguishing fire, sprinkling streets and the use and benefit of citizens in said City. That there were several factories adjacent to said City, but beyond its corporate limits, and several thickly-settled places in close proximity to said City, which from time to time were annexed to said City. That the factories laid their own pipe, connecting with the City's water-mains, and, in case of emergencies, when their private water supplies were exhausted, they used water furnished by the City; but this was only occasionally. The main reasons why connections were made was to provide for an abundant supply of water in case of fire. That in all there were about $6,000 paid by factories and persons living adjacent to the corporate limits. That this . . . was not the real source from which the revenue was derived. That about $85,000 annually were derived [from all sales of water], $50,000 of which went to pay the operating expenses, and the remainder to pay the interest on about $1,000,000 invested by said City in the waterworks improvement, and that the remainder was not sufficient, and that there was a deficit annually which was made up from other sources. . . . That the fire companies responded to alarms when given, if adjacent to the City, and used water furnished by the City in extinguishing them, and had frequently responded to alarms sent in from factories beyond the corporate limits."

It is seen at once that the waterworks are corporate property. That is not denied. The debate is with respect to the nature of the use. As to that, for the sake of convenience, we divide all the purposes for which the City furnishes water into three classes: (1) to extinguishing fires and sprinkling the streets; (2) to supply citizens of the City; (3) to supplying persons and factories adjacent to but beyond the corporate limits. If the business were confined to the first class, there would be no ground to base a decision on, so clearly would the use be exclusively for public advantage. We think there can be but little more doubt about the second class, especially in view of certain words in the city charter, to which we will advert presently. Nothing should be of greater concern to a municipal corporation than the preservation of the good health of the inhabitants. Nothing can be more conducive to that end than a regular and sufficient supply of wholesome water, which common observation teaches all can be furnished in populous cities only through the instrumentalities of well-equipped waterworks. Hence, for a city to meet such a demand is to perform a public act, and confer a public blessing. It is not strictly a governmental or municipal function, which every municipality is under legal obligations to assume and perform, but it is very closely akin to it, and should always be recognized as within the scope of its authority, unless excluded by some positive law. If the responsibility be voluntarily assumed or fixed by law, whether the one or the other, the performance of it is the doing of an act for the public weal,—a lending of corporate property to a public use.

The eighth subsection of section 17 of the Charter of the City of Nashville (Acts 1883, chap. 114) enumerates some of the powers conferred upon the mayor and city council in these words: "To provide the City with water by waterworks, within or beyond the boundaries of the City, and to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires, and organize and establish fire companies." Here the first clause, "to provide the City with water by waterworks," is very broad and comprehensive, and was obviously intended to authorize the corporation to furnish the inhabitants of the City with water. Having accepted the charter, and undertaken to exercise this authority in the manner detailed by the witness, it cannot be held that the City in doing so is engaging in a private enterprise, or performing a municipal function for a private end. It is the use of corporate property for corporate purposes, in the sense of the Revenue Law of 1877. It can make no difference whether the water be furnished the inhabitants as a gratuity or for a recompense, the sum raised in the latter case being reasonable and applied for legitimate purposes. So raising a fund to help defray the expense of operating the waterworks, and to keep down the interest of the City's indebtedness, incurred in the construction thereof, is no more engaging in business for gain and profit than would be the assessment and collection of taxes for that or any other legitimate object. To the extent that money is realized by sale of water, if it be so termed, the necessity of laying taxes in the usual way is diminished. If the water were furnished free of charge, then the expenses of operating the works and meeting the interest on the debt would have to be met by an increased tax assessment.

We believe the views here expressed are sustained not only by sound reason and policy, but also by the weight of adjudged cases. In a Connecticut case it was decided that land owned by the City of Hartford, and used for reservoirs for collecting and storing water for the benefit of its inhabitants, was not subject to taxation by the Town of West Hartford, in which the land was situated; and, further, that the question of exemption was not affected by the fact that the water was sold to consumers, and the water rents applied in payment of interest on the investment, and incidental expenses. In the same case it was further held that another portion of the same tract, bought by the water commissioners at the same time, was not exempt, because not used for reservoirs or other public purposes. West Hartford v. Bd. of Comrs. 44 Conn. 867.

By Act of the Legislature of New York a certain board of commissioners of Rochester was authorized to determine and execute the best and most expedient plan of supplying that city "with a sufficient quantity of pure and wholesome water for the use of its inhabitants and the extinguishment of fires." Laws 1872, chap. 387. As a part of this plan lands were purchased in the Town of Rush, and a reservoir was erected thereon. Water was supplied therefrom for the city's own use, and for the consumption of the inhabitants, the latter paying prescribed water-rates. The amount of rents received from consumers of the water was less than the interest on the bonds issued for the construction of the works. One question submitted to the court on those facts was: "Can the Town of Rush legally impose a tax upon the said property of the City of Rochester?" The court of appeals, speaking through Danforth, J., said that it could not, because the waterworks, being "for the public good," were in legal contemplation "held for public purposes." Rochester v. Rush, 80 N. Y. 302.

Other cases in harmony with these two might be cited, but that is not deemed necessary.

The cases relied on as in direct conflict we do not find to be so. The strongest adverse case is that of Louisville v. Com., 1 Duv. 295. There the court, in discussing the implied exemption of municipal property from taxation, used this language: "The more precise and distinctive test for classification is this: Whatever property, such as court-house, prison and the like, which became necessary or useful to the administration of the municipal government, and is devoted to that use, is exempt from state taxation; but whatever is not so used, but is owned and used by Louisville in its social or commercial capacity, as a private corporation, and for its own profit, such as vacant lots, market houses, fire engines and the like, is subject to taxation." 1 Duv. 298.

It will be observed that reservoirs or waterworks are not enumerated here; and we are not informed, and cannot with certainty determine from the language used, on which side of the line the learned judge would have placed such property if he had mentioned it in the classification of exempt and non-exempt property. So it is not necessarily an authority in point.

The Iowa case does not touch the question at all. Here the waterworks were owned and operated by a private company, and not by the city. The company bound itself to furnish the City of Des Moines and its inhabitants with pure and wholesome filtered water at certain rates, and, after a limited period of time, to sell all of its property used in its business to the city, at its election. Because of this arrangement and contract with the city, the company denied its liability for taxes. Chief Justice Rothrock, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The fact that the city is furnished water for which it pays what is presumed to be a fair consideration does not change the property from a private to a public use. The reservation of the city of the right to purchase the works does not invest it with any title or right to the property, or in any sense make it public property, until it shall elect to purchase." Re Des Moines Water Co. 48 Iowa, 324.

If possible, the decision in the case of Bailey v. New York, 8 Hill, 581, is still further from the question before us. That was an action against the city for damages for injuries resulting from the negligent and unskillful construction of a dam by the city water commissioners. The commissioners were held to be the agents of the city in such a sense that it was liable for the injuries complained of. No question of taxation was raised in the case.

Mr. Cooley and Mr. Deady both lay down the rule that municipal property is by implication exempt from taxation when put to a public use, and that it is not exempt when not so used. They give instances of both classes and cite the cases. Each author gives some prominence to the Kentucky case reported in 1 Duvall, but Mr. Cooley, in his concluding sentence, says that the doctrine of that case would seem to limit implied exemptions unreasonably, unless restricted to the case of special assessments. Cooley, Taxn. 172-174; 1 Deady, Taxn. 48, 49.

With respect to the third class, there is an equally obvious, though altogether different, solution of the question. It is this: The tax in litigation was assessed against the City of Nashville for "exercising the privilege of running a water company" within her own limits, in a city "of 40,000 inhabitants, or over;" the amount of the tax, as to the State's part, being determined by the statute according to the population. There is no assessment for the privilege of doing the business of a water company elsewhere than in the City; hence, if there be liability to the tax for furnishing water to any other person than her own citizens, to individuals and factories adjacent to and beyond her corporate limits, that liability cannot be adjudged in this case because not put in issue. Moreover, in addition to the lack of such issue, it does not appear in this record that the persons and factories receiving the water outside of the limits of Nashville were in any city, town or taxing district, nor, if in any of these, the number of inhabitants therein. Yet such facts are indispensable to a correct determination of liability or non-liability for the tax, and for an ascertainment of the amount of tax, if liability exists. The tax is to be assessed against water companies doing business "in cities, taxing districts or towns," and the amount of the State's part of the tax varies from $50 to $300, according to population ranging from 500 to 40,000 or over. Acts 1837, chap. 1, § 4, pp. 20, 21.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

Michael KIRCHER, Appt.,
v.
J. H. CONRAD et al., Respts.

(....Mont.....)

1. One who purchases wheat for seed is subject to the rule of caveat emptor, and representations on the part of the seller as to the kind or quality of the grain, which do not amount to an express warranty, will not render him liable to an action for damages on the part of the buyer although the grain proves to be different from what it was represented to be.

2. A warranty that certain wheat purchased after inspection was spring wheat is not made where the seller said that he did not know what kind it was, but agreed to write and find out if he could do so, and when subsequently asked if he had got an answer said, "We have. It is spring wheat."

(January 6, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Custer County granting defendants' motion for a new trial in an action to recover damages for the breach of an alleged warranty that certain wheat was spring wheat, in which judgment had been rendered for plaintiff. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Warranty of quality.

It is the general rule of law "that no warranty of the quality of a chattel is implied from the mere fact of sale." The rule in such cases is caveat emptor, by which is meant that when the buyer has required no warranty, he takes the risk of quality upon himself. This rule and its exceptions are fully discussed in an excellent annotation of Mr. Bennett to Benjamin on Sales, ed. 1883, 564, 623. 7 J. R. A.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Strevell and James H. Garloch, for appellant:

The defendants knew before and at the time they sold the wheat to the plaintiff that he was inquiring for and wanted spring wheat to be used for seed. To constitute a warranty under such circumstances it is sufficient that the agent of the defendants on finally making the sale represented to the plaintiff that the wheat was spring wheat.

Benjamin, Sales, §§ 618, 624; Thorne v. McVeagh, 75 Ill. 81.

Where the buyer goes to the vendor of an article, seeking to purchase an article of a particular kind or quality for a particular purpose, and so informs the vendor, there is a warranty on the part of the vendor that the thing sold is of the kind and is fit for the purpose for which the buyer requests it.

Milburn v. Belloni, 89 N. Y. 53.

Plaintiff is entitled to, as damages, the value of the crop which he would ordinarily have had from his land under the circumstances in that year, after deducting the expenses of harvesting the crop, which he would have had to incur had the wheat corresponded with the warranty.

Passenger v. Thorburn, 84 N. Y. 634; Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61; White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118.

The first and general rule relating to warranty in contracts of sale is that the buyer purchases at his own risk—caveat emptor—unless the seller either gives an express warranty, or unless a warranty is implied by law, or unless the seller is guilty of a fraudulent representation or concealment (Story, Sales, 401); but the rule caveat emptor never applies to cases of fraud. Irving v. Thomas, 13 Me. 418; Ottis v. Alderson, 10 Smedes & M. 476.

Mr. George F. Shelton, for respondents:

If the sale of wheat was by sample, then the only warranty that could be implied from the language used was the warranty that the bulk corresponded with the sample.

Benjamin, Sales, § 650; Carter v. Crick, 4 Hurl. & N. 412, 28 L. J. N. S. Exch. 238. See also Gachet v. Warren, 73 Ala. 288.

Upon the sale of a specific article then present and subject to examination, no warranty of its quality or fitness for a particular use will be implied, though the seller is aware that the article is purchased especially for such use.

Benjamin, Sales, § 661, note U; Lord v. Grow, 39 Pa. 88; Deming v. Foster, 42 N. H. 165; Shisler v. Bazter, 109 Pa. 443, 58 Am. Rep. 738; Lindley v. Hunt, 23 Fed. Rep. 52. See also elaborate note to Reynolds v. Palmer, 21 Fed. Rep. 433, 439; Salem India Rubber Co. v. Adams, 28 Pick. 256; Moore v. McKinley, 5 Cal. 471; Byrne v. Jansen, 50 Cal. 624.

When an article is sold upon an executory contract, like the one in question, the delivery and acceptance of the article, after an examination, or an opportunity to examine, is a consent or agreement that the article corresponds with the contract and precludes a recovery for any difference.

Blake, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the order of the court below, in granting the motion of the respondents, who were the defendants in the action, for a new trial. The questions to be investigated may be readily understood by stating the substance of the pleadings.

The complaint alleges that the defendants were merchants in 1887, and that plaintiff purchased, through their "duly authorized agents and clerks," 81 bushels of wheat, to be used by him in the spring of 1887 for seed; that he informed the agents of the defendants that he desired the wheat to be spring wheat for seed, to be sown that year; that defendants, by their agents, sold and delivered said wheat to plaintiff, and represented and warranted the same to be spring wheat, and fit to be used for sowing in the spring of 1887; that defendants charged plaintiff therefor $85, which plaintiff agreed to pay; that plaintiff believed the representation of the defendants, that said grain was spring wheat, to be true, and sowed the same in the spring of 1887; that said wheat was not spring, but winter, wheat, and therefore failed to produce any crop; and that plaintiff lost his entire crop of wheat for the season of 1887, and his labor in putting said seed into the ground, and was damaged in the sum of $1,585.

The answer denies that plaintiff purchased any seed wheat, and alleges that he bought a quantity of wheat which was kept and sold as "chicken feed," and that plaintiff was informed of the character and quality thereof at the times alleged in the complaint; denies that the agents or clerks of the defendants represented or warranted to plaintiff that said wheat was spring wheat, and says that the clerks and agents of defendants told plaintiff that they did not know whether the grain was spring or winter wheat; denies that the agents or clerks of defendants made any representations to plaintiff by which plaintiff was misled or deceived as to the kind or character of said wheat; alleges that said clerks and agents told plaintiff, at the time and before he bought the wheat, that they did not know whether it was winter or spring wheat, and that defendants had bought and sold said wheat for feed, and no other purpose, and defendants could not warrant the wheat in any manner as suitable for seed; and denies that plaintiff was misled, or deceived, or damaged by any representations of the clerks or agents of defendants. The replication denies the averments of the answer.

The testimony at the trial tended generally to prove the allegations of the respective parties in their pleadings, and was conflicting. The jury found for the appellant, who is the plaintiff in the action. The transcript does not disclose the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was granted, and which may have been errors in law, or the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. If they were founded upon the last, then, as the testimony is conflicting, we must follow the case of Chauvin v. Valton, 7 Mont. 581, and affirm the order appealed from.

In conformity with the best practice, which has prevailed in this court, and in order to settle the law of the case upon another trial, we deem it necessary and proper to review the questions which have been submitted, and decide every subject of controversy. It is admitted that the respondents were dealers in general merchandise at the times which are mentioned in the pleadings; that one Tompkins was employed by them as clerk and salesman and was in charge of their business, when the wheat was delivered to the appellant; that the grain was subject to the inspection of the appellant, who bought the same in the belief that it was suitable for seed in the spring of 1887; that no person can ascertain by inspection the difference between spring and winter wheat; that this grain was winter wheat; and that the appellant suffered damages through the total failure of his crop. We shall assume, for the purposes of the discussion, that the testimony of the appellant is a narration of the facts, and can thereby distinguish some of the cases which have been cited by counsel as authority from that at bar.

Kircher testified that, in the fall of 1886, he looked at some wheat in the store of the respondents, and asked what kind it was. Tompkins said he didn't know, and that he sold it for chicken feed. Kircher then said that, if he knew it was spring wheat, he would buy 60 or 70 bushels; and that Tompkins replied, "If you want to buy that much, we can find out." Kircher said, "If you can do that, find out;" and Tompkins told him "he would write and find out." That Tompkins then took Kircher back to Flager, in his office. That Flager, one of the respondents, told Kircher "he would write and find out." That afterwards Flager told Kircher "he did not have an answer, but expected one in a short time." That afterwards Flager said "he did not have an answer yet, but expected one every day." That in March, 1887, Kircher went into the store, and said to Tompkins, who was then in charge of the business of the respondents: "How about that wheat? Have you got an answer yet?" He said: "We have. It is spring wheat. We have just got a load of it." Kircher said: "Are you sure it is spring wheat?" and Tompkins replied: "What do you take me for?" The appellant then bought the wheat, but did not receive any statement or memorandum in writing concerning the transaction.

Did Tompkins, under these circumstances, and by virtue of his employment, have the authority to make this warranty that the grain, which was purchased by the appellant, was spring wheat? This court has adopted the rule, which is not disputed, and has held, that the principal is responsible for the acts of his agent when they have been done within the scope of his authority, and that his liability will not be enlarged. Herbert v. King, 1 Mont. 475; Deer Lodge Bank v. Hops Mining Co. 3 Mont. 146; First Nat. Bank v. Hall, 8 Mont. 841.

The power of Tompkins is also defined in the following authorities:

In Upton v. Suffolk Co. Mills, 11 Cush. 586, Mr. Justice Metcalf says: "A general agent is not, by virtue of his commission, permitted to depart from the usual manner of effecting what he is employed to effect. 3 Chitty, Law of Com. and Man. 199. When one authorizes another to sell goods, he is presumed to authorize him to sell in the usual manner, and only in the usual manner in which goods or things of that sort are sold. Story, Ag. § 60. See also Shaw v. Stone, 1 Cush. 228. The usage of the business in which a general agent is employed furnishes the rule by which his authority is measured."

Mr. Benjamin, in his treatise on Sales, says: "The general rule is, as to all contracts, including sales, that the agent is authorized to do whatever is usual to carry out the object of his agency, and it is a question for the jury to determine what is usual." 2 Benjamin, Sales, 3d Eng. ed. § 945. See also Pickert v. Marston, 68 Wis. 465; Smith v. Tracy, 36 N. Y. 79; Palmer v. Hatch, 46 Mo. 585; Stewart v. Woodward, 50 Vt. 78; McCormick v. Kelly, 28 Minn. 135; 2 Addison, Cont. 988.

Many of the cases which are relied on by counsel to establish the right of Tompkins to warrant the quality of the wheat are inapplicable to the facts before us. The foregoing testimony of Kircher proves that the respondent Flager and Tompkins refused, upon several occasions, to express any opinion as to the character of the grain, except that it was chicken feed. In reply to the request of the appellant, Flager promised to write a letter and find out what he could on this point. The conversation between Tompkins and Kircher, in which the words constituting the alleged warranty were used, was in logical effect a statement that an answer had been received by Flager, from some person who is not affected by these proceedings, conveying the information that the grain was spring wheat. Tompkins was not a party to this correspondence. The complaint does not allege that Tompkins or the respondents have been guilty of fraudulent conduct, and the gist of the action is the warranty by the agent of the respondents that the grain referred to was spring wheat. No form of words is essential to constitute an express warranty in the sale of chattels. There is no controversy relating to these principles.

Do the conditions which have been presented subject the appellant to the rule of caveat emptor? The case of Lord v. Grow, 89 Pa. 83, is on all fours with the case set forth in the pleadings of the appellant. A portion of the statement of facts is as follows: "On the 9th of April, 1859, the plaintiff went to the defendants, who are dealers in grain, for the purpose of purchasing some seed spring wheat for sowing. He asked F. P. Grow, one of the defendants, whether he had any good seed spring wheat. Mr. Grow answered in the affirmative. . . . The plaintiff took the wheat, which he and the miller thought was spring wheat (there being both kinds in the mill), and sowed it; but it proved to be winter wheat." Mr. Justice Strong, in the opinion, says: "We have here the bald question whether, in sales of personal property on inspection, without express warranty, the law presumes an engagement on the part of the vendor that the article sold is of the species contemplated by the parties. . . . The tendency of the modern cases has also been to the doctrine that, in sales of articles in regard to which the seller is presumed to have superior knowledge, there is a warranty that the thing sold shall be in kind what it is represented to be. Illustrations of this are found in sales of wine by wine merchants, of jewels by a jeweler, and of medicines by a druggist. In this class of cases the buyer and the seller do not deal on equal terms. . . . The case before us is not one of this character. The wheat was not sold by sample, and neither the contract of sale, nor the identity of the article, was defined by a bill of parcels, nor was the subject of the contract a manufactured article, ordered and supplied for a particular purpose. True, the difference between spring wheat and other wheat is not ascertainable by inspection, and it may be assumed that they are not the same in species. Still, the case is one of a purchase on inspection of an article, of which the vendor's means of knowledge were no greater than those of the vendee. . . . To the purchaser of goods on inspection the language of the law is caveat emptor. There may be a few exceptions, such as we have referred to, but a sale of such an article as wheat is not one of them. When the purchaser has seen it, and gets what he saw, no warranty is implied that it is properly described by the name which the vendor gives to it."

The authorities hold that it is the duty of the buyer to make an inspection of goods, and the consequence of any omission so to do must be suffered by him.

In Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 388 [10 L. ed. 987], Mr. Justice Davis says: "No principle of the common law has been better established, or more often affirmed, both in this country and in England, than that in sales of personal property, in the absence of express warranty, where the buyer has an opportunity to inspect the commodity, and the seller is guilty of no fraud, and is neither the manufacturer nor grower of the article he sells, the maxim of caveat emptor applies. Such a rule requiring the purchaser to take care of his own interest, has been found best adapted to the wants of trade in the business transactions of life. And there is no hardship in it, because, if the purchaser distrusts his judgment, he can require of the seller a warranty that the quality or condition of the goods he desires to buy corresponds with the sample exhibited." See also Reynolds v. Palmer, 21 Fed. Rep. 438, note by Lawson, 439; Lindley v. Hunt, 22 Fed. Rep. 52; 1 Pars. Cont. 5th ed. 577; Story, Sales, 4th ed. §§ 849, 878; Biddle, War. § 5; 2 Benj. Sales, 6th Am. ed. 843, note 23.

The case of Lord v. Grow, supra, is doubted by Mr. Biddle, and the American edition of the work on Sales by Mr. Benjamin. Biddle, War. § 125; 2 Benjamin, Sales, 6th Am. ed. 843, note 23.

But other text writers have cited it with approval, and the same court has reiterated its doctrine in the recent case of Shisler v. Baxter, 109 Pa. 443, 58 Am. Rep. 788. It appeared that Shisler purchased of Baxter what both parties called "Wakefield cabbage" seeds, which cannot be distinguished by their appearance. After referring to Lord v. Grow, supra, Chief Justice Mercur says: "The vendee had just as much knowledge in regard to the kind and quality of the seed as they (the vendors) had. In such case, in the absence of express warranty, the exemption of liability of the vendor is too well settled to need any further citation of authorities."

The application of these principles to the evidence of the appellant is sufficient to justify the court below in sustaining the motion for a new trial, and virtually disposes of the action, unless additional facts are shown.

While the form of the warranty is unimportant, the circumstances attending it must be critically examined. Prof. Parsons expounds the law on this subject, and writes: "All warranties, however expressed, are open to such construction from surrounding circumstances, and the general character of the transaction, and the established usage in similar cases, as will make the engagement of warranty conform to the intention and understanding of the parties: provided, however, that the words of warranty are neither extended nor contracted in their significance beyond their fair and rational meaning. For these words of warranty are usually subjected to a careful, if not a precise and stringent, interpretation, as it is the fault of the buyer who asks for or receives a warranty if it does not cover as much ground and give him as effectual protection as he intended." 1 Parsons, Cont. 5th ed. 576.

When the evidence of the appellant is subjected to this test, it is difficult to say that Tompkins made a warranty in any form which would be recognized by the courts. It was the duty of the appellant to protect his interests by securing a bill of parcels which described in certain terms the wheat he purchased. The authorities hold that Tompkins had the power under his employment to execute this instrument, and thereby make an express warranty of the quality of the grain. The secret instructions of the respondents to their salesmen, which were not known by the appellant, cannot affect the transaction, and were properly excluded by the court below.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO.,

Appt.,

v.

(.....III.....)

1. Controverted questions of fact cannot be considered on appeal from the appellate court, although the court has not expressly found, in terms, against appellant on those questions, and portions of its opinion are inconsistent with and negative the presumption of such a finding.
2. The question whether or not telegraph dispatches are sufficient to inform the operator of their meaning, and of the possible risk of loss by mistake, is not to be determined solely by the dispatches themselves, but all the facts and circumstances, including previous messages sent by the operator for the same parties, may be considered.

3. Where enough appears in a telegraph message to show that it relates to a commercial business transaction, it is sufficient to charge the company with damages resulting from its negligent transmission, although the operator may not be able to understand its meaning as to quantity, quality, price, etc., as the sender and the party to whom it is sent understand it.
4. A message saying: "Please buy in addition to thousand August 1000 cheapest month," is sufficiently explicit to charge a telegraph company with the loss resulting from inexcusable mistake; and the same is true of a message stating: "Put stop order on 5000 Dec. at seventeen cents, this order good until countermanded."
5. Instructions which are lengthy and in the nature of a résumé of the evidence, and an argument, do not constitute reversible error if they are not so unfair to appellants as to have misled the jury to his prejudice.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover damages for losses alleged to have resulted from mistakes made in the transmission of certain telegraph messages. Affirmed.

The messages were delivered by plaintiffs to defendant's operator in Chicago to be transmitted to New York. The first one, as received by the Company, read as follows: "Please buy in addition to thousand August 1000 cheapest month." As delivered by it, it read: "Please buy in addition, two thousand August, one thousand cheapest month."

The other read: "Put stop order on 5000 Dec. at seventeen cents, this order good until countermanded." As delivered it had the word seventy substituted for seventeen.

Mr. James L. High, for appellant:

If appellant was not apprised, either from the messages or otherwise, of their meaning and of the possible risk involved, it cannot be charged with having contemplated the extraordinary damages claimed.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It seems to be thought by counsel for appellant that, notwithstanding the judgment of affirmance in the appellate court, controverted questions of fact may still be reviewed in this court; because, as is said, the appellate court has not expressly found, in terms, against appellant on these questions, and because portions of its opinion are inconsistent with and negative the presumption of such a finding. This position is untenable. Sections 87 and 89 of our Practice Act (Rev. Stat. ed. 1899, chap. 110) prohibit this court from re-examining controverted questions of fact in all cases of this kind. We may look into the evidence for the purpose of deciding as to the correctness of instructions, or, in a proper case, to determine whether or not there is any evidence tending to support a material element in the cause of action or defense. In such cases it becomes necessary to examine the evidence in order to settle questions of law, but we have uniformly held that we cannot examine evidence to determine whether the appellate court found correctly as to the facts in issue. See Montgomery v. Black, 124 Ill. 62, 12 West. Rep. 594, and cases cited; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Proctor, 98 Ill. 561; Darlington v. Chamberlain, 120 Ill. 585, 9 West. Rep. 466; Sangamon Coal Mining Co. v. Wiggerhaus, 122 Ill. 281, 11 West. Rep. 578; Hayes v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 125 Ill. 631, 1 L. R. A. 308.

We also said in Coalfield Coal Co. v. Peck, 98 Ill. 145, that we could not look to the opinion of the appellate court to ascertain what that court found the facts to be.

The controlling question in the case, so far as we are at liberty to pass upon it, arises on the refusal of the trial court to give the third instruction asked by appellant, as follows: "(3) The jury are instructed that the defendant is only liable for such damages, if any, as were actually contemplated, or which might reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated, by the parties in the delivery and receipt of the messages in the transmission of which the alleged errors occurred; and if the jury believe from the evidence that such messages were not sufficiently clear or precise to inform the agents of the defendant receiving them of their meaning, and of the possible risk and damage which might result from mistakes in their transmission, and that such facts were not disclosed by the plaintiffs to the defendant or its agent, then the defendant cannot be charged with having contemplated the special damages claimed by the plaintiffs in this action, and plaintiffs are only entitled to recover the amount actually paid by them for the sending of such messages, with interest at 6 per cent from the date of payment to the date of your verdict."

It is earnestly contended by counsel for appellant that the messages, "Please buy in addition to thousand August one thousand cheapest month," and "Put stop order on five thousand Dec. at seventeen cents," were, unexplained, meaningless and unintelligible to the operator of appellant who transmitted them; and therefore, as in case of cipher dispatches, no special or consequential damages could have been reasonably contemplated by the parties when they were sent, and hence none can be recovered in this suit. This position is based on the rule of damages announced in Hadley v. Bazendale, 9 Exch. 341, and followed generally in this country as well as in England. In any view of that rule, as applied to this case, the instruction is too narrow.

The evidence shows that at the time of sending these dispatches appellees were, and had for some time prior thereto been, engaged in the business of jobbers in coffee, tea and sugar in the City of Chicago; that Crofman & Bro. were commission merchants in New York, buying and selling coffee, rubber and hides on commission; that appellant had a branch office near the place of business of appellees, from which the messages in question were sent, and had frequently sent others pertaining to their business. It also tends to show that from business transactions in New York between appellant and the firm of Crofman & Bro. appellant knew the business in which the latter firm was engaged. It is in proof that during the month of June, 1887, and prior to the first mistake complained of, a number of dispatches were sent by appellees to Crofman & Bro. from appellant's Chicago office. One on the 13th read: "Please wire us to-day whether you do or do not execute an order for five thousand bags, as we must place it elsewhere if you decline." Another of the same date refers to "five thousand bags." It must, at least, be conceded that there is evidence tending to show that from their previous dealings appellant knew, or might by reasonable diligence have understood, the purport of these messages. Therefore, in determining whether or not the messages were sufficient to inform the operator of their meaning, and of the possible risk of loss to appellees by a mistake in transmitting them, the jury should have been left free to consider all the facts and circumstances proved in the case bearing on that question, whereas the instruction limits the inquiry to that which appears in the dispatches themselves, and to such facts as may have been disclosed by the plaintiff to the defendant or its agent at the time they were sent. See 2 Thomp. Neg. 857.

On the question as to how far mere indefiniteness in the language of a message will defeat a recovery for consequential damages against a telegraph company, the decisions cannot be said to be harmonious. Counsel for appellant contends that the better line of authorities sustains the rule announced in this instruction, viz., that the operator who transmits a message must be able to understand its meaning as to quantity, quality, price, etc., as the sender and party to whom it is sent themselves understood it; otherwise it is said he cannot reasonably be supposed to have contemplated damages as the probable consequence of a failure to correctly transmit it. While some of the cases cited go to that extent, especially where the message is in cipher, another line of decisions, and we think founded on the better reasons, hold that where enough appears in the message to show that it relates to a commercial business transaction between the correspondents it is sufficient to charge the company with damages resulting from its negligent transmission.

In U. S. Teleg. Co. v. Wenger, 55 Pa. 262, a message read: "Buy fifty (50) North Western fifty (50) Prairie du Chien, limit forty-five (45)." There was a delay by the telegraph company in its delivery, resulting in a loss to the sender on account of the advance in price of Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company stock and the Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railway Company stock, which the message was intended to order purchased. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania sustained a recovery, saying: "The dispatch was such as to disclose the nature of the business to which it related, and that the loss might be very likely to occur if there was a want of promptitude in transmitting it, containing the order."

In Tyler v. W. U. Teleg. Co., 60 Ill. 421, the message was: "Sell one hundred (100) Western Union. Answer price." The message, as delivered, read, "Sell one thousand (1,000)," instead of "one hundred (100)." The message was intended as an order to sell 100 shares of stock in Western Union Telegraph Company. The agent, obeying the order as delivered, sold 1,000 shares of said stock, and to fill the order was compelled to buy 900 shares. We held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference between the price for which the shares of stock were sold and that which he was compelled to pay for those purchased. On the question as to the sufficiency of the dispatch to inform the agent of the transaction to which it referred so as to charge the telegraph company with resulting damages, the rule announced in U. S. Teleg. Co. v. Wenger, supra, was approved, and it was held that the dispatch disclosed the nature of the business as fully as the case demanded. On a second appeal (74 Ill. 168) by general language the decision is reaffirmed.

In W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Griswold, 37 Ohio St. 802, a dispatch read: "Will you give one fifty for twenty-five hundred at London?" Answer at once as I have only till to-night." As delivered, it read "one five" instead of "one fifty," as written. It was an inquiry whether the sender would pay 150 in gold for 2,500 bushels of flax-seed at London, Ontario, the parties having previously corresponded on the subject. The sender replied to the dispatch as received, ordering the purchase, and recovered from the telegraph company the difference in price. On appeal to the supreme court, it was contended, as it is here, that the message was indefinite, and therefore the recovery below unauthorized. But the court said: "It appeared upon its face that it related to a business transaction,—a transaction involving the purchase and sale of property. The company was therefore apprised of the fact that a pecuniary loss might result from an incorrect transmission of the message. Where this appears, there is no such obscurity as relieves the company from liability for negligently failing to transmit and deliver the message in the language in which it was received."

In Marr v. W. U. Tele. Co., 85 Tenn. 530, a message was delivered to the company reading: "Buy one hundred shares Memphis and Charleston." As delivered it read: "Buy one thousand shares Memphis and Charleston." The recovery for consequential damages was sustained, the supreme court of that State saying: "This message was so written that the slightest reflection would enable the operator, who understood its transmission, to see its commercial importance, and put him on his guard against error."

In W. U. Tele. Co. v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, the message sent read: "Cover two hundred September one hundred August." By an error in its transmission, as received it read 200 August instead of 100. As sent, it was an order to sell 100 bales of cotton for August delivery, and 200 for September delivery. The agent sold 200 bales for August, and plaintiff was compelled to buy 100 at a loss in order to meet the sale. A recovery for this loss was sustained by the Supreme Court of that State in the following language: "As to the fifth ground in the request to charge, we do not see but what the message sought to be transmitted was, according to the proof, an ordinary commercial message, intelligible to those engaged in cotton dealing; and we can see no such special purpose intended by the sender, which was unknown to the company, as to vary the rule of liability. There was at least enough known to show it was a commercial message of value attached to the message, and that is sufficient." See also Squire v. W. U. Tele. Co. 93 Mass. 232; Pepper v. W. U. Tele. Co. 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L. R. A. 660; 8 Sutherland, Damages, 801.

All cases which hold that a telegraph company is not liable for consequential damages for a failure to transmit a dispatch as received, on the ground of indefiniteness or obscurity in the language of the message, do so upon the ground that, unless the agent of the company may reasonably know from the message itself, or is informed by other means, that it relates to a matter of business importance, he cannot be supposed to have contemplated damages as a result from his failure to send it as written, as in the case of cipher dispatches.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Candee v. W. U. Tele. Co., 84 Wis. 472, says: "The operator who receives and who represents the company, and may for this purpose be said to be the other party to the contract, cannot be supposed to look upon such a message as one pertaining to transactions of pecuniary value and importance, and in respect to which pecuniary loss or damages will naturally arise in case of his failure or omission to send it. It may be a mere item of news, or some other communication of trifling and unimportant character."

It is clear enough that, applying the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, supra, a recovery cannot be had for a failure to correctly transmit a mere cipher dispatch, unexplained, for the reason that to one unacquainted with the meaning of the ciphers it is wholly unintelligible and nonsensical. An operator would therefore be justifiable in saying it contains no information of value as pertaining to a business transaction, and a failure to send it, or a mistake in its transmission, can reasonably result in no pecuniary loss.

The messages in this case, however, are not cipher dispatches. Their language is plain and intelligible to everyone who can read, so far as they purport to disclose the business to which they relate. They are abbreviations, and clearly indicate that they relate to business transactions between the sender and addressee. The first message, "Please buy in addition to thousand August one thousand cheapest month," was notice to the agent at Chicago that appellee was ordering the agent in New York to purchase merchandise for them. We do not agree with counsel in saying that it might as well be construed to be an order "for a thousand tooth-picks or a thousand papers of pins as anything else." Everyone of intelligence knows that such articles are not purchased in that way. Suppose, however, that the agent was not informed as to the quantity, quality and value of the merchandise to be purchased by the message, would that justify him in contemplating, within the rule in the Hadley Case, supra, no damages as a result of his negligence or omission of duty in promptly and correctly sending it forward? It certainly cannot be contended that the agent must be informed of all the facts and circumstances pertaining to a transaction referred to in a telegram, which are known by the parties themselves, to make his company liable for more than nominal damages. If it should be so held, the telegraph would cease to be of practical utility in the commercial world.

It is not easy to state a case in which it can be said the parties contemplated, at the time of contracting, all the damages which will probably result from a failure to perform the contract. We think the reasonable rule, and one well sustained by authority, is that where a message as written, read in the light of well-known usage in commercial correspondence, reasonably informs the operator that the message is one of business importance, and discloses the transaction so far as is necessary to accomplish the purpose for which it is sent, the company should be held liable for all the direct damages resulting from a negligent failure to transmit it as written, within a reasonable time, unless such negligence is in some way excused. Under this rule, both dispatches as presented to appellant's operator were sufficiently explicit to charge it with the loss sustained by appellee, resulting from what has been found by the jury to be its inexcusable mistakes.

Objection is also urged to the ruling of the circuit court in giving, modifying and refusing other instructions; also in excluding certain evidence offered on behalf of the defendant below. We have examined these several points of objection, and think they are without substantial merit, unless it be as to the giving of the fourth and fifth instructions on behalf of plaintiffs. They are subject to just criticism. They violate a wholesome rule of practice announced in Merritt v. Merritt, 20 Ill. 80. They are very lengthy; are rather in the nature of a résumé of the evidence and an argument than concise statements of the law, and for that reason should have been refused. But, after having carefully compared them with the evidence, we cannot say that they are so unfair to appellant as to have misled the jury to its prejudice.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

Thomas DWYER

v.

GULF, COLORADO & SANTA FÉ R. CO.

(.....Tex.....)

1. A state statute providing a penalty for the refusal of a railroad company to deliver freight on payment or tender of the charges due as shown by the bill of lading, is not invalid as a regulation of commerce.
2. A carrier cannot be considered as ratifying the original contract for shipment of goods which it receives from another company and transports when it is bound by statute to perform such service.
3. The penalty provided by the statute for the refusal of a railroad company to deliver freight on payment or tender of the charges due as shown by the bill of lading, applies only to a company which has itself executed, authorized or ratified the execution of the bill of lading.
4. The original way-bill is admissible in evidence in a suit against a connecting carrier for refusal to deliver the goods on tender of the charges agreed on in the bill, where, in connection with other evidence, it shows that the carrier had paid accrued charges in amount equal to the sum specified, as tending to show that it did not intend to ratify that contract.
5. The exhibition of the bill of lading at the time of the tender of the charges and demand of the goods is not a condition precedent to the recovery of a penalty under the statute for refusal to deliver the goods, although such penalty should be inflicted only for a willful disregard of the law.

(January 14, 1880.)

CROSS appeals from a judgment of the District Court for Washington County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the statutory penalty for refusal to deliver freight upon tender of the charges specified in the bill of lading. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Terry for appellant.

Messrs. Bassett, Muse & Muse for appellee.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was before this court at a former term, and was reversed, and remanded for a new trial, in accordance with an opinion which is reported in 69 Tex. 707. The question then presented is not now involved. The action was brought by appellee against appellant to recover the penalty prescribed by the Act of May 6, 1882, for the failure of the Company to deliver to him certain merchandise transported by it, upon his tender of the charges for carriage specified in the bill of lading. The defendant interposed an exception to the petition, and now insists that the court erred in overruling it.

The bill of lading was for a certain carload of nails received at the City of Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company, and bound that company to transport the merchandise from that city to the City of Brenham, in the State of Texas, for a freight charge of $197.50. The Statute under which the proceeding was instituted reads as follows: "That any railroad company, its officers, agents or employes, that shall refuse to deliver to the owner, agent or consignee, any freight, goods, wares and merchandise of any kind or character whatever, upon the payment or tender of payment of the freight charges due as shown by the bill of lading, the said railroad company shall be liable in damages to the owner of said freight, goods, wares or merchandise to an amount equal to the amount of the freight charges, for every day said freight, goods, wares and merchandise is held after payment or tender of payment of the charges due as shown by the bill of lading, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction." Laws Called Sess. 17th Leg. 35.

It is urged that the law as applied to the transaction alleged in the petition is a regulation of commerce between the States, and is such as only the Congress of the United States has the power to make. If so, the Legislature had no power to make such a law in reference to bills of lading for the carriage of goods from another State into this State; and it would be our duty either to construe the Act as not applying to such bills of lading, or to hold that, as so applied, it is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. We would not, however, in construing the Act, give it an application that would render any part of it void, unless the intent to so apply it was made manifest by the language of the Act itself.

But the question recurs, Is the provision under consideration in contravention of the Federal Constitution? As to what laws passed by the Legislature of a State are to be deemed a regulation of commerce between the States, within the meaning of that Constitution, there have been numerous decisions in the courts of the United States. Considering the all-pervading influence of the commerce of the country, and that any state law in relation to commercial transactions, not confined to those begun and completed within the State, would almost necessarily affect in some degree the commerce between the States, the result is not surprising.

From the opinions delivered in the case of Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557 [30 L. ed. 244], it would seem that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon these questions have not been altogether consistent; but it also appears, from that and later cases in the same court, that the tendency now is to extend the power of Congress over matters affecting interstate commerce, and correspondingly to restrict that of the States. We think, however, that by the decisions of that court (which are authoritative upon these questions) the following propositions must be deemed to have been settled: (1) that a State can make no law regulating the rate of freight for the carriage of goods between that and another State, although the regulation be construed as applying only to so much of the line of transit as lies within its own borders (Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, supra); (2) that it can make no law which empowers, either directly or indirectly, a burden by way of taxation upon interstate commerce (Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 84 [29 L. ed. 785]; State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232 [21 L. ed. 146]; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196 [29 L. ed. 158]; Waring v. Michigan, 118 U. S. 446 [29 L. ed. 691]; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 [26 L. ed. 1067]; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [26 L. ed. 238]; Robbins v. Shelby County Taring Dist. 120 U. S. 489 [30 L. ed. 694]; Leloup v. Mobile, 127 U. S. 640 [32 L. ed. 311]; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129 [32 L. ed. 638]); (3) that wharves and bridges and ferries across streams, constituting the boundaries between the States, may be established and regulated by the States, in the absence of legislation on the same subject by Congress, provided no burden other than an ordinary charge for their use be imposed upon the commerce passing over them (Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 713 [18 L. ed. 96]; Es-canaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [27 L. ed. 442]; Parkersburg & O. R. Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [27 L. ed. 584]); and (4) that, in the exercise of their police powers, the States may enact laws which, though they affect commerce between the States, are not to be considered regulations of that commerce, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560 [21 L. ed. 710], and cases there cited; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465 [31 L. ed. 503].

Is the law in question in this suit a proper exercise of the police power of the State? This power relates to such a number and variety of subjects that it is impossible to define it, except in terms so general that the definition is of but little practical utility in any case difficult of solution. We think, however, the opinions in the cases last cited throw much light upon the question before us.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller the question was as to the validity of a statute of 7 L. R. A.

Iowa which required all railroad companies in the State, in September of each year, to fix their rates of fare for passengers and freight, and on the 1st day of October following to post up at their depots a printed copy of such rates, and to cause a copy to remain posted during the year, and subjected the companies to penalties in case of a failure to comply with its provisions. In the conclusion of its opinion the court uses this language: "If the requirements of the statute here in question were . . . regulations of commerce, the question would arise whether, regarded in the light of the authorities referred to, and of reason and principle, they are not regulations of such a character as to be valid until superseded by the paramount action of Congress. But, as we are unanimously of the opinion that they are merely police regulations, it is unnecessary to pursue the subject."

In Smith v. Alabama, supra, the court says: "A carrier exercising his calling within a particular State, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable, according to the laws of the State, for acts of non-feasance or misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fails to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time or place, he is liable in an action for damages, under the laws of the State, in its courts; or if, by negligence in transportation, he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another State, a right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. In neither case would it be a defense that the law giving the right to redress was void as being an unconstitutional regulation of commerce by the State. This, indeed, was the very point decided in Sherlock v. Alling, 98 U. S. 99 [23 L. ed. 819]."

The Statute we have under consideration, like every other law which gives a remedy to the shipper against the carrier for a violation of his contract, does in some remote degree affect interstate commerce, when applied to a contract of carriage from one State to another. But it imposes no tax. It neither fixes nor regulates any rates. It makes no discrimination between commerce wholly within the State and that between the State and other States. It imposes no duty upon any carrier not already imposed by the common law. It applies to all railroad companies in the State and to all contracts of carriage alike, and merely provides a penalty for the purpose of enforcing a compliance with an obligation which already existed at common law. In respect of the question before us, the Statute is not distinguishable from any other law affording a remedy for the breach of a contract of carriage of goods between two States. We conclude that the Statute was a proper exercise of the police power reserved to the State, and is therefore valid. The court, therefore, did not err in overruling the defendant's exception to the petition.

In answer to the petition, the defendant pleaded that the shipment which gave rise to this controversy was over the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway to St. Louis, and thence over the Texas & St. Louis Railway to McGregor, Tex., where the freight was delivered to its road for transportation to Brenham; that the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Company had no authority to contract for the carriage of the nails over its road, and that its agents at McGregor received the freight for transportation to Brenham at its customary rates, without having any knowledge of the bill of lading executed by that company; that upon receipt of the freight it paid the accrued charges, as shown by the way bill to be $197.50, and that its charges in addition amounted to $35. The entire charges, as shown by the bill of lading, were $197.50. The defendant introduced evidence of the facts alleged in its answer, and the court charged the jury as follows: "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant Company received the nails at the Town of McGregor from another company, and transported them to the Town of Brenham, this would constitute an affirmation of the original contract of shipment, and the defendant thereby became bound by the terms of the shipment as shown in the bill of lading." In this we think there was error. Our statutes made it obligatory upon any railroad company in this State to draw over its road, without delay, the passengers, merchandise and cars of every other railroad company which may enter and connect with its road. Rev. Stat. art. 4251. See also articles 4226, 4227, 4251-4254.

In the absence of a provision of this character, it might be proper to hold that a carrier who has received freight from another carrier upon a through bill of lading, without any express agreement as to the charges, should be presumed to have ratified the bill of lading, though made without its authority, and to have become a party to the contract. But certainly, when the carrier is bound by statute to receive and transport the goods without delay upon tender by the connecting carrier, no such presumption should be indulged. Such a rule would be to force a contract upon a carrier to which he had not given his consent, and compel to carry at a rate fixed by another company. The result of the construction of the law by the court below is that a railroad company is not permitted to refuse to receive the goods for transportation; yet, if it does receive them, it ratifies by that act a bill of lading made without his authority. This, in our opinion, cannot be tolerated. We so held at the last Tyler Term in a case not yet [officially] reported. R. Co. v. Baird, 12 B. W. Rep. 580.

Should a railroad company in Arkansas receive freight to be transported to El Paso, in this State, for a less charge for the whole distance than the customary charge of the Texan road for the transportation over its own line, could the latter be forced to accept the contract? We think not. We do not think the Legislature intended that such a construction should be given to the Statute under consideration. Our opinion is that the Act only applies when the railroad company that is sought to be charged in damages has either itself executed the bill of lading, or authorized another company to execute it, or has ratified it by some voluntary act on its part. Instead of the charge complained of, the court should have given an instruction, in substance, the same as charge No. 1, requested by defendant.

We think the court should not have excluded the original way bill, when offered in evidence. In connection with other testimony, it showed that defendant paid, at the time it received the nails, accrued charges amounting to as much as the entire charge agreed upon on the bill of lading, for the transportation of the property for the whole distance, and tended to show that it never intended to ratify that contract. We infer from the statement appended to the bill of exceptions that the depositions of the witnesses Murray and Dodge were objected to in writing, and were suppressed at a term of the court previous to the trial. If so, the bill of exceptions should have been then taken, and the depositions were properly excluded when offered on the trial.

The plaintiff has filed cross-assignments of error. The goods were first demanded on the 15th of December, 1884, and again on the 27th of January, 1885. On both occasions the charges shown by the bill of lading were tendered. There was a dispute whether or not the bill of lading was presented at the time of the first demand. It was formally exhibited to the Company's agent when the second tender and demand were made. Under these circumstances, the court charged the jury, in effect, that, in order to make the demand effectual under the Statute, the plaintiff must at the time have exhibited his bill of lading, and refused to charge that such presentation of the instrument was not necessary. We are of opinion that the court erred in these rulings. The Statute does not expressly require that the bill of lading shall be shown to the agent of the railroad company when the goods are demanded, nor do we find anything either in the words of the Act, or the nature of the business, from which it ought reasonably to be inferred that the Legislature so intended. It is to be presumed, as a matter of law, that a party to a contract knows its contracts; and, as a matter of fact, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the agents of a railroad company, who receive freight at its destination, know the charges which the company is entitled to receive as shown by the bill of lading. We think, therefore, that it was not intended that the exhibition of the bill of lading at the time of the tender of the money and demand of the goods should be a condition precedent to the recovery of the damages. But the Statute is strictly penal, and the penalty is severe, and we think a case may arise in which the owner of the goods should not recover if he has refused to exhibit his contract. It is only for a willful disregard of the law that its penalties should be inflicted. Hence, if there should be a mistake, if the agent of the company should not in fact know the contents of the bill, and should the owner of the goods having it in his power refuse to produce it, he would not be entitled to recover. In regard to appellee's second assignment of error, it is sufficient to say that it was decided upon the former appeal that the defendant had no right to require of plaintiff a receipt for the overcharge; and that if such a right should be insisted upon, on another trial, it would be proper to instruct the jury that it did not exist. If no issue should be again made upon the question, we do not see that such an instruction would be either necessary or proper.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is re- versed, and the cause remanded. Each party will pay one half of the costs of this appeal.

v.

Albert D. BURGESS et al.

(....Ind.....)

1. A surviving partner has the right to sell and convey partnership real estate if necessary to pay the debts of the firm, and such conveyance passes an equitable title.
2. Prior conveyance of partnership real estate by the trustee of a deceased partner, and by his grantees to the surviving partner, do not invalidate a sale finally made by the surviving partner to liquidate the firm debts.
3. The widow of a deceased partner who has received all such partner's share of the proceeds of partnership real estate in excess of the amount necessary to pay firm debts, is estopped from claiming any interest in the real estate as against the purchasers.
4. Error in overruling demurrers to certain paragraphs of an answer is immaterial where the same evidence could be introduced, and the same facts found under the general denial as under these paragraphs of the answer, and there is a special finding of facts which controls the judgment.

Accounting of surviving partners.

The widow, legatee, distributee or creditors of the general estate of a deceased partner not charged with the duties of administering, cannot maintain a bill for an accounting against the surviving partners. Linds, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This is an action brought by the appellees, as plaintiffs, against the appellants, to obtain possession of real estate, and quiet title thereto. The complaint is in two paragraphs. The first alleges that appellees are the owners and entitled to the possession of the undivided one half of lots 70 and 73, in Mitchell's Addition to the City of Kendallville, Noble County, Ind., and that appellants have possession without right, claiming title. The second paragraph alleges appellees and appellants are tenants in common of the real estate, and appellants are in possession, claiming title to the whole, and denying appellees' title. Appellants answered in four paragraphs. The first is a general denial. The others set up special defenses. Demurrers were filed to each of the second, third and fourth paragraphs, and overruled, and exceptions and reply filed, and trial had. The trial resulted in a finding for the appellee Albert D. Burgess that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of the undivided one fourth of the real estate, and in favor of the appellants against appellee Zoradia Hanvell, and judgment rendered accordingly, and this appeal is prayed by appellants, and errors assigned by them. Appellee Zoradia also asked and obtained leave, and assigns cross-errors. The court, at the request of the appellees, found the facts specially, and states its conclusions of law thereon. We deem it unnecessary to set out the finding of facts in full. The conclusions of law were to the effect that appellee Albert D. Burgess inherited the undivided one fourth of the real estate from his deceased father, and that the title had not been divested, and that the appellee Zoradia Hanvell's interest was bound by a decree against her, quieting the appellants' title, in the Noble Circuit Court. Appellants excepted to each of the conclusions of law; also moved for judgment in their favor against both of appellees, the plaintiffs below; and also moved for judgment in their favor against appellee Albert D. Burgess,—which motions were overruled, and exceptions and errors properly assigned. The appellee Zoradia Hanvell also excepted to the conclusions of law.

The facts found, summarized, amount to this: That Burgess and Hildreth were equal partners, engaged in the business of running a foundry and machine-shop, and Burgess died. At the time of his death they owned, as partnership property and as assets of the firm, the real estate in question, consisting of lots 70 and 73, on which was erected the building in which they conducted said business, and in which building was the necessary machinery for conducting the business, which was attached to and was a part of the real estate, and was adapted to and used for conducting the business. One of the lots was conveyed to them jointly, and the others conveyed to them by their firm name. They also owned a small amount of personal property, and the firm owed debts in excess of the value of the personal property of the firm. On the day Burgess died he made a written instrument conveying and transferring all of his personal property, except his household goods, to one David S. Welch, in consideration of $1, in trust to be sold by him, and the debts of Burgess to be paid out of the proceeds, and balance to be paid to his heirs pro rata, according to their legal interest. Burgess died, leaving Hildreth as surviving partner. At the time Burgess died the assets of the firm, independent of the lots and fixtures, amounted to the value of $1,005.40, and the indebtedness of the firm amounted to $2,564, leaving a deficiency of $1,558.60, after applying the proceeds of the personal property to the payment of the debts. Welch, with the consent of Hildreth, and in the belief on the part of Welch and Hildreth that he had the authority to do so, took possession of the Burgess interest in the partnership, and Welch and Hildreth ran the business for a time in the name of Welch & Hildreth. Then, with the consent of Hildreth, Welch sold and conveyed the one-half interest in the business and property, including the real estate, to Hopkins & Hopkins, in consideration of $2,400 and the payment of one half of the firm debts. In the sale by Welch to Hopkins & Hopkins, he purported to act as trustee of the Burgess estate, and he and Hildreth believed he had the right to so act and convey a good title, and Hopkins & Hopkins also relied on his having authority to convey. Hildreth and the Hopkinses ran the business for a short time, and the Hopkinses sold out to Hildreth, and Hildreth executed his note to Welch for the balance that the Hopkinses were to pay him, and paid the Hopkinses the balance, and borrowed $2,333 in money, part of which he used in paying firm debts, and the balance in making improvements on the property. Hildreth paid off the indebtedness, and paid Welch, and Welch paid over to the widow of Burgess, Zoradia Burgess, all he received for the purchase. Albert D. Burgess was a minor. Afterwards Hildreth sold and conveyed all the property, including the real estate in question, to the appellants and one Amos B. Park. Zoradia claimed an interest in the real estate for herself and minor son, Albert D., and a compromise was effected, and a suit brought by appellants and Amos B. Park against them to quiet title. Zoradia was properly served, and authorized an attorney to appear for her. Albert D. was at the time a minor and a resident of Ohio, and the notice as to him was insufficient, and he was sued by the wrong name. A guardian ad litem was appointed for him, and judgment was rendered against them, quieting title in the plaintiffs to that suit against the appellants. Amos B. Park afterwards sold and conveyed his title to the appellant Henry S. Park. All of these sales were made in good faith, and for the full value of the property.

The firm being in the financial condition which it was, it is important to inquire into the authority of Hildreth, as surviving partner, in the settlement of the partnership. It was made the duty of the surviving partner at that time to file an inventory of the assets and a list of the liabilities of the firm in the clerk's office, but no forfeiture attached if he failed to do so; and, if the survivor proceeded to settle the partnership, accounted for the assets and paid the debts, we fail to see how he would be deprived of any right which he would have possessed if he had filed the inventory of assets and list of liabilities, as provided for by the statute. According to the settled law of this State, and which is supported by many authorities, the lots in controversy were liable for the debts of the firm, and are regarded in equity as personal property, and liable to be sold for the payment of the firm debts. As against the firm creditors and firm liabilities, the widow and heirs of the deceased partner took no interest in this property. The property (the lots in question), according to the finding of the court, were at that time, the date of the death of Burgess, worth $4,458.23, and were liable for $1,558.60 of firm indebtedness, and subject to sale for the payment of the same; and the widow and heirs of the deceased partner, Burgess, had an interest in the undivided half in excess of the amount necessary to pay said firm indebtedness.

It is held in the case of Huston v. Neil, 41 Ind. 504, that when the members of a firm executed a mortgage without the wives of the individual members of the firm joining, and which was foreclosed without the wives being made parties, and sold for the payment of the mortgage debt, that, as there was no surplus above the payment of the mortgage debt, the wives had no interest in the real estate, and were not necessary parties. Suppose, for instance, that, immediately before the death of Burgess, Burgess & Hildreth had sold and conveyed their real estate without the wife of Burgess joining, and the purchase money had been paid to the members of the firm, and become a part of the partnership assets, it would seem clear that the widow and heirs could not have claimed and held any interest in the real estate so sold and conveyed. One of the purposes and objects of treating the partnership real estate as personal property in equity is that it may be sold and conveyed by the members of the firm in the usual course of business without the wives of the individual members joining in the conveyance. Were it otherwise, the business of the firm might be stopped, and the partners unable to realize on the assets of the firm by reason of the wife of one of the members refusing to join in a conveyance of the real estate.

When Burgess died, Hildreth survived and became the only member of the firm, and what the partners themselves might have done in the lifetime of Burgess Hildreth might do alone, if necessary to pay the debts of the firm and settle the partnership. In case of a sale by the partners in the lifetime of all, the excess of the purchase money above paying debts becomes assets of the firm, in which the widow and heirs of a partner whose death occurs afterwards would be entitled to their respective shares, and the excess of the purchase money, above paying debts of the firm, of a sale made by a surviving partner, would go the widow and heirs on settlement of the partnership.

The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible that, in case of the death of a partner, the survivor or survivors must pay the debts out of the personal property, if there is sufficient personal property to do so, and the widow and heirs of the deceased partner in that event would have the right to the share of the deceased partner in the real estate owned by the firm; but if the personal property is not sufficient to pay all the debts of the firm, and it is necessary to sell the real estate of the firm to pay the debts of the firm, the surviving partner has the right to sell and convey the same. If he sells and conveys the same in good faith, for a valuable consideration, without an order of court, he passes an equitable title to the same to the purchaser. Applying this rule to this case, at the death of Burgess, after applying the personal property to the payment of the firm debts, there yet remained $1,558.60 of firm debts unpaid, and no assets to pay the same except the real estate,—the two lots in question in this case, which the findings in effect show to have been improved together in a manner suitable and proper for the business in which the partners were engaged, and were partnership real estate, and indivisible; and Hildreth had the right to sell the same, and apply the proceeds to the payment of said firm debts; and, having that right, he did sell and convey the same in good faith to the appellants and one Amos B. Park, who afterwards conveyed his interest to appellant Henry S. Park; and they took possession, and made valuable improvements, and the proceeds named from such sale went to the payment and liquidation of the debts of the firm.

True, the findings show that there had been some other sales by Welch, purporting to act as the trustee of the deceased partner's interest, and the form of the original indebtedness may have changed to some extent; but all of these transactions and sales were made in good faith, and the money which finally liquidated and paid the debts came from the sale to the appellants, in consideration for which Hildreth, the surviving partner, conveyed them the partnership property in question in this case, and Hildreth paid all the firm debts. This, we think, passed the equitable title to all of the real estate, and not merely a sufficient interest to pay the firm debts, and that, too, whether there was afterwards a full and legal settlement and accounting by the surviving partner with the legal representatives or heirs of the deceased partner or not. Taking this view of the case, it is immaterial to consider and determine the legality of the sale made by Welch, as trustee; as, the conveyance made by Welch to the Hopkinses, and by them to Hildreth, being made in good faith, and in no way diverting or squandering the interest of the deceased partner, it could not invalidate the sale finally made by Hildreth, the surviving partner. The right was in Hildreth to sell and convey the real estate and liquidate the firm debts, and he undertook to sell and convey all of the property, and such sale and conveyance passed the equitable title. The facts found show the property was sold for its full value, and that the widow received all of the proceeds of the sale in excess of the amount necessary to pay the firm debts. Clearly, she is estopped by that act from claiming any interest in the real estate as against these appellants, and she is likewise bound by and precluded by the decree entered against her in the Noble Circuit Court, quieting the title, from setting up any claim of title to the real estate.

The conclusions of law in favor of appellee

Albert D. Burgess are erroneous. The conclusions of law on the facts found ought to have been that the appellants, the defendants below, are the equitable owners of the real estate in question, and there should have been a judgment in favor of the defendants against both of the plaintiffs below for costs. We are aware that the authorities are not all in harmony on the question under consideration, but we think the doctrine we have laid down fully supported by authority, and the logical conclusions which follow from established principles. Parsons on Partnership states the rule thus: "The following, then, is the American rule: Real estate, purchased and held as partnership property, is so treated in equity, and subjected to all the incidents of partnership property. If there be death, the surviving partner, whether he hold the whole title, or hold it in part, or hold none of it, if he be a creditor of the partnership, has the same rights against the real estate, and only the same, which any other creditor has. But this real estate goes to pay the debts of the partnership, and only after they are paid does it, or what is left of it, become the property of the partners, or their representatives, free from all claims." Parsons, Partn. 8d ed. top p. 403, *372.

In the case of Shanks v. Klein, 104 U. S. 18 [28 L. ed. 685], Justice Miller delivering the opinion, it is held that real estate purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes, though the title be taken in the individual name of one or both partners, is in equity treated as personal property so far as necessary to pay the debts of the partnership, and to adjust the equities of the copartners; and for this purpose, in case of the death of one of the partners, the survivor can sell the real estate so situated, and, though he cannot convey the legal title which passed to the heirs or devisees of the deceased partner, his sale invests the purchaser with the equitable ownership of the real estate, and the right to compel a conveyance of the title from the kin or devisee in a court of equity. Tillinghast v. Champlin, 4 R. I. 178, 67 Am. Dec. 514, and authorities cited in note, p. 541; Grisson v. Moore, 108 Ind. 296, 3 West. Rep. 657; Haas v. Shaw, 91 Ind. 384-396.

In note to McCormick's Appeal, 57 Pa. 54, 98 Am. Dec. 200, the editor, in speaking of the difference in the rule in England and this country, says: "But in this country, when the objects of the conversion have been accomplished, a reconversion takes place. When the property has fulfilled all its functions as personal property in respect to the partnership, the partners and the creditors, and is no longer wanted for those purposes, it becomes, in the hands of those who hold the legal title, real estate, and subject to all incidents as such." See authorities there cited. This we think the true doctrine; but while it remains personal property it is subject to being sold and conveyed by the partners or the surviving partners, and when it becomes necessary to sell a parcel of real estate which is indivisible, to apply a portion of the proceeds to the payment of firm debts, the sale in good faith, for a valuable consideration, passes the equitable title to the whole tract, and the heirs of the decedent, or his legal representatives, take the surplus of the proceeds, instead of the real estate.

Cross-errors are assigned by appellees. It is contended that the court erred in overruling demurrers to each of the second, third and fourth paragraphs of answer. If errors were committed in such rulings, they were harmless errors. It is held by this court that if a demurrer is overruled to a bad answer, and there is a general finding, it is error. The effect of upholding a bad answer is to adjudge that, if the defense pleaded is proved, the defendant is entitled to a verdict. Oser v. Shannon, 75 Ind. 359.

This is manifestly true when there is a general finding, but when there is a special finding of facts they control the judgment, and, unless the facts found entitle the defendant to a judgment, one cannot be rendered in his favor, no difference what may have been pleaded in the answer. In this case, under the issues joined by the general denial, the same evidence could be introduced, and the same facts found, as under the special answers filed; and there is a special finding of facts which control and govern the verdict to be rendered, so that it removes the presumption that if the defendants prove the defense pleaded they are entitled to judgment, and makes it affirmatively appear that no harm resulted by reason of an erroneous ruling, if there was one on the demurrers to the answers, and brings the case within a well-recognized rule, that a cause will not be reversed on account of a harmless error. Tracewell v. Farnsley, 104 Ind. 497, 2 West. Rep. 270; Nixon v. Campbell, 106 Ind. 47, 2 West. Rep. 681; Krug v. Davis, 101 Ind. 75.

Some other cross-errors are assigned, all of which we have considered, and find no error, and do not deem it proper to extend this opinion by stating the questions at length.

The judgment is reversed as to appellee Albert D. Burgess, at his costs, with instructions to the court below to restate its conclusions of law, by stating as a conclusion of law on the facts found that the defendants are the owners of all the real estate in question and described in the complaint, and entitled to judgment for their costs; and to sustain the motion of the defendants for judgment in their favor against the plaintiff Albert D. Burgess, and to render judgment in favor of defendants against said Albert D. Burgess; and the judgment is affirmed against appellee Zoradia Hantwell.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed and argument had thereon, and on February 26, 1890, Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is urged that the facts stated in the opinion, as to the financial condition of the firm of Burgess & Hildreth at the date of the death of Burgess, are not in harmony with the facts as found by the trial court, and that the debts did not exceed the personal assets of the firm to as great an amount as stated in the opinion. On a re-examination of the findings of fact, in the light of the argument on petition for rehearing, there seems to be some uncertainty as to the indebtedness of the firm, and the value of the real and personal estate owned by the firm at the date of the death of Burgess, the findings of facts being unnecessarily long and uncertain. In view of such uncertainty, justice will be best subserved by modifying the mandate in the original opinion by ordering a new trial, instead of a restatement of the conclusion of law and the sustaining of appellants' motion, and the mandate is hereby modified to that extent.

Judgment is reversed as to appellee Albert D. Burgess, at his costs, with instructions to sustain appellants' motion for new trial, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion, and the judgment is affirmed as to Zoradia Hanvell.

The Connecticut Statute of 1831, providing that no devise of real estate should be revoked except by cancellation or later will or codicil, applied to every will containing both devises of real estate and bequests of personalty, as well as to wills containing devises of real estate only. Goodsell's App. 4 New Eng. Testamentary capacity is as requisite in the revocation of a will as it is in its execution. McIntire v. Worthington, 10 Cent. Rep. 129, 68 Md. 203.

The New Hampshire Statute (Gen. Laws, chap. 193, § 14) provides the only mode by which a will can be revoked, and courts cannot accept even a definite intention to perform the prescribed act for the act itself. Hoitt v. Hoitt, 1 New Eng. Rep. 547, 63 N. H. 475.

A will, under the Act of Assembly in Pennsylvania, can be revoked only by a writing proved by two or more witnesses. Lawson v. Morrison, 2 U. S. 2 Dal. 286 (1 L. ed. 284).

Canceling a second will by the testatrix herself is a revival of the first, if undestroyed. Ibid.

A will or codicil may operate as a revocation of a prior testamentary instrument, either by an express clause of revocation or by an inconsistent disposition of the previously devised property. Webb v. Carpenter, 5 New Eng. Rep. 672, R. I. Index BB, 68.

A codicil "I hereby unqualifiedly revoke" a bequest operates as a revocation, notwithstanding it also contains a bequest which must fail. The revocation and the subsequent bequest are disconnected. Lutheran Congregation's App. 3 Cent. Rep. 209, 113 Pa. 32.

tion of the latter. McCurdy v. Neall, 5 Cent. Rep. 824, 43 N. J. Eq. 333.

As a general rule a second will with clause of revocation revokes the former will. On destruction of second will, the former unanceled will is generally revived. Circumstances may show intent to revive or not to revive. Mere making of a second will revokes the first as to personal estate. Boudinot v. Bradford, 3 U. S. 2 Dal. 286 (1 L. ed. 276).

Evidence of declarations by the testator is admissible to show whether, by canceling a second will, he meant to die intestate, the first one still existing. Ibid.

Proof, even of a single witness, may be satisfactory that a testator, in canceling his last will, intended to revive a former unanceled will, and the former will is thereby revived. Authorities cited. Williams v. Williams, 3 New Eng. Rep. 110, 142 Mass. 515.

Under the Alabama Code an erasing of the name of a legatee by drawing a pen through it, if made with intention to revoke the whole will, as shown by accompanying declarations of the testator, is effectual for that purpose. Law v. Law, 33 Ala. 432.

But a will cannot be revoked pro tanto by expunging the name of a single legatee. Ibid.

The burning of a will by the testator's direction, even if done before death, will not operate as a revocation unless done in his presence. Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 118.

Under the Alabama Code a revocation of a part cannot be made by burning, tearing, canceling or obliterating it. Law v. Law, supra.

The destruction by a testator of the later of two inconsistent wills, with the intention and purpose of making a third one, does not, without more, revive the earlier will, even if no will is made and the earlier will is found among testator's valuable papers. McClure v. McClure, 86 Tenn. 173.

Under the "civil law," or Roman law, the adoption of a child under the power of its natural parent was a revocation of an antecedent will.

1 Jarman, Wills, 5th ed. and notes by Bigelow *124, p. 152; Just. Inst. lib. 2, chap. 17, § 1.

Section 2560, Rev. Stat., reaffirmed what had been for centuries the common law of this country and of England, and what had been long before it was adopted by the common law of England, the civil or Roman law.

Since the Act of August 17, 1855, the legal heirs of A, and his natural heirs, have, in the courts of law, equal "rights and interest" in his estate, and of necessity equal claims to his bounty.

Courts in giving effect to statutes are not to regard the mere letter, but they are to look to its spirit and purpose.

Clift v. Shockley, 77 Ind. 297.

An adopted child may take by the designation of "heir" or "issue," under our laws.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to quiet title to real estate. William C. Davis, who died on the 11th day of April, 1889, was at the time of his death the owner in fee of the real estate described in the complaint. The appellant, Esther S. Davis, was the third and childless wife of the deceased. The deceased had no children by his first wife. The appellee, Mina A. Fogle, was his child by the second wife. In 1888 said William C. Davis adopted Eli C. Davis as his child and heir. After the marriage of said William C. Davis to his third wife, Esther S. Davis, and before the adoption of Eli C. Davis, he made a will devising the real estate in controversy to his wife, Esther S. Davis, in fee. The appellee, Mina A. Fogle, brought this suit, making Esther S. and Eli C. Davis defendants, alleging the facts, and con-

The revocation of a will by intentionally destroying it will not revive a former will which was expressly revoked by the later one. Hawes v. Nicholas, 2 L. R. A. 868, 72 Tex. 481.

One seeking to establish a will presumptively revoked by its destruction must show by facts and circumstances that the will was actually fraudulently destroyed. Collyer v. Collyer, 110 N. Y. 481.

Under the provision of Ky. Gen. Stat., chap. 113, § 11, that no will or codicil, after being revoked shall be revived, otherwise than by re-execution thereof, or by a codicil, the preservation of a holographic will by a married woman for many years after marriage, and her frequent recognition of the paper as her will, will not amount to a republication or re-execution of it, where it has been revoked by her marriage. Stewart v. Mulholland (Ky.) 10 Ky. L. Rep. 824, 10 S. W. Rep. 125.

What will not operate a revocation.

Declaration of intention to make a will at a future time, even though embodied in a formal recital in a deed, cannot operate as a revocation of a will already made. Rife's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 60, 110 Pa. 232; 1 Jarman, Wills, 171, 173.

The verbal declarations of the testator, showing a present revocation, or an intention to revoke in the future, are not admissible as evidence for any purpose, the Statute (Code, § 2296) not authorizing such mode of revocation. Slaughter v. Stephens, 81 Ala. 418.

A mere intimation, by a testator, of his intention by a future act to make a new disposition, does not effect an actual present revocation. Unless a subsequent will differs from, and is inconsistent with, a former, it will not operate as a revocation. Rife's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 60, 110 Pa. 232.

The fact that a will is found with memoranda and unexecuted papers evidencing an inchoate intention to make another will does not effect a revocation, under Gen. Laws, chap. 193, § 14, providing the manner in which wills may be revoked. Holt v. Holt, 1 New Eng. Rep. 558, 63 N. H. 475.

Where a will is not shown to have been expressly revoked, no subsequent changes in circumstances of deceased, —as, his second marriage, death of some of his children and legatees, or alienation of certain property, —will operate as a revocation by implication. Ibid.

Partial revocation only produces an ademption of the subject of the devise, and thus limits the operation of the will to the extent of the revocation. Ibid.

A will containing a provision which renders it invalid cannot operate either as an express or implied revocation of a former will. Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 138.

Where a will, after giving certain bequests, gave the residue of an estate to A and others, to be divided between them, a codicil giving A all of the residue after payment of expenses, without division, does not revoke the bequests. Webb v. Carpenter, 5 New Eng. Rep. 672; R. I. Index BB, 66.

A subsequent deed of trust made for testator's own benefit, conveying the real estate to trustees; and a subsequent codicil giving an additional legacy, in other respects confirming the will, —do not operate as a revocation. Cheesman v. Cummings, 3 New Eng. Rep. 350, 142 Mass. 65.

Where power is exercised to dispose of funds by will, the subsequent investment of the funds in lands will not revoke the provision in the will. Horner v. Clements, 9 Cent. Rep. 510, sub nom. Clements v. Horn, 44 N. J. Eq. 565.

When it is sought to establish a posterior will, to overthrow a prior one made by the testator in health tends that the adoption of Eli C. Davis by her father revoked the will, and that she and Eli C. each inherited a one-half interest in the real estate, subject to a life estate in favor of Esther S. Davis, the third and childless wife of the deceased.

The appellant, Esther S. Davis, demurred to the complaint for want of facts, which demurrer was overruled and she excepted.

The question presented for decision is, Does the adoption of a child under the Statute of this State operate to revoke an antecedent will of the adopting father, he having made no provision in the will or otherwise for such adopted child? This question must be determined mainly by the construction to be given to our statutes.

Counsel for appellee, in their able brief in this case, contend that the "Statute declaring and defining the rights and interests of adopted heirs in the estate of their father contains no limiting or qualifying words, nor are the rights and interests of the adopted heir restricted to the rights and interests of a 'natural heir' in any particular case or class of circumstances, nor to 'natural heirs' born prior to the date of the will of their father, whereby no provision has been made for them.

But the wording is that the adopted child shall be entitled to and receive all the rights and interests in the estate of such adopting father by descent or otherwise of a natural heir; and as the legal status, rights and capacities of an adopted heir are by the Statute made co-equal with those of a natural heir, these co-ordinate legal consequences and results must of necessity flow therefrom; hence, if the natural birth of an heir subsequent to the date of its father's will (no provision having been therein made for such heir) shall be deemed a revocation of the will of its father, so, also, the legal birth of an heir subsequent to the date of its father's will (no provision having been therein made for such heir) shall in like manner be deemed to work a revocation of its father's antecedent will."

So much of the Statute providing for the adoption of children as is material reads as follows: "Such court, when satisfied that it will be for the interest of such child, shall make an order that such child be adopted, and from and after the adoption of such child it shall take the name in which it is adopted, and be entitled to and receive all the rights and interest in the estate of such adopting father or mother, by descent or otherwise, that such child would if the natural heir of such adopting father or mother."

It is further provided that if such child shall die without leaving a wife or husband, issue or their descendants surviving him or her, seised of any real estate or personal property which may have come to such child by gift, devise or descent from such adopting father or mother, such property shall descend to the heirs of such adopting father and mother, the same as if such child had not been adopted.

It is held by this court that when an adopted child dies without issue, owning real estate which came to it by inheritance from its adopting father or mother, that the same shall descend, on the death of the child, to the adopting and under circumstances of deliberation and care, where the subsequent will was made when the testator was in enfeebled health and in hostility to the provisions of the first one, the prior will is to prevail, unless he who sets up the subsequent one can satisfy the conscience of the court of probate that he has established a will. #### Revocation by sale of property.

A devise is broken by sale of the real estate by the testator in his lifetime. Emery v. Union Society, 4 New Eng. Rep. 538, 79 Me. 384.

This was the common-law rule and it prevails by statute in the State of Kentucky. Hazelwood v. Webster, 22 Ky. 409.

But a subsequent sale and conveyance do not operate a revocation when any part of the purchase money remains unpaid, unless the intention appears by some instrument in writing. Slaughter v. Stephens, 81 Ala. 418.

Where testator subsequently deeded a portion of the tract to the devisee, the latter takes under the devise only so much as is not included in the deed. Pickett v. Leonard (N. C.) 10 S. E. Rep. 466.

A deed of gift is not a revocation of a previous will devising the same property to the same person, unless there is an inconsistency between the two instruments, or some other manifestation of an intent to revoke. Aubert's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 105, 109 Pa. 447.

A sale of the land devised, subsequent to the execution of the will, while it might operate a revocation pro tanto of the will, would not invalidate it entirely, or prevent its probate as to the other property embraced in it. Moore v. Spier, 80 Ala. 129.

The burden of proof is upon the party claiming against a will to show that the testator intended a revocation of his will by selling the property. Hazelwood v. Webster, supra.

The mere sale of the land did not create the presumption that the testator so intended. Other evidence must be produced. Ibid.

The courts will presume an intention on the part of a testator to avoid partial intestacy, unless the contrary intention actually appears in the will itself. Delehanty v. St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum Society (Sup. Ct.) 20 N. Y. S. R. 824.

Conveying a part of the estate indicates a change of purpose in the testator as to that part; but suffering the will to remain uncancelled evinces that his intention is unchanged with respect to other property. Holtz v. Holtz, 1 New Eng. Rep. 559, 63 N. H. 475.

Marriage revokes antecedent will.

Under the Statute of 1872, a marriage, whether of a man or a woman, must operate per se as a revocation of a prior will. McAnulty v. McAnulty, 8 West. Rep. 550, 120 Ill. 26.

A will and codicil of a woman are revoked by her subsequent marriage. Blodgett v. Moore, 1 New Eng. Rep. 882, 141 Mass. 75; Nutt v. Norton, 2 New Eng. Rep. 594, 143 Mass. 242; Swan v. Hammond, 138 Mass. 45.

But as to a man marriage alone would not revoke a prior will. McAnulty v. McAnulty, supra.

In the absence of a statute, marriage alone, without the birth of a child, will not revoke a will. Goodsell's App. 4 New Eng. Rep. 831, 55 Conn. 171.

Marriage and birth of a child, occurring after execution of a will, without circumstances to weaken their effect, operate as a revocation. Baldwin v. Spriggs, 8 Cent. Rep. 833, 65 Md. 873.

After a good deal of doubt and hesitation, it was finally settled in England before our Revolution that marriage and issue taken together did amount father or mother surviving, in preference to the natural mother. Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 274; Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 370; Paul v. Davis, 100 Ind. 423.

The court, in the case of Humphries v. Davis, supra, at page 283, says: "Not only is the conclusion which we have stated that to which the cold rules of logic and the benign ones of natural equity lead, but it is also the conclusion to which the general principles both of the American law and the Roman law lead. It is a principle of both systems of jurisprudence that in case of failure of descendants capable of taking, the inheritance shall go back to the kinsmen of the blood from which it came. Our Statute fully recognizes the general principle, for it provides that when the inheritance comes from the paternal line it shall go back to the kinsmen of that blood, but when the inheritance comes from the maternal line it shall go back to the kinsmen of the mother's side."

These decisions go as far, it would seem, in holding the legal status of the adopted child to be the same as a natural child as is warranted under the Statute, but the conclusions are reached on broad equitable principles and differ very materially from the questions presented in this case. These decisions go no further than to hold that the surviving adopting father or mother inherits from the adopted child such property only as it inherited from the deceased adopting father or mother; and the Statute was so amended in 1863, Elliott's Revision, § 20, as to provide that property which may come to such adopted child by descent, devise or gift from its adopting father or mother shall, upon its death without husband, wife or issue surviving, descend to the heirs of such adopting father or mother, which amendment was no doubt deemed necessary to prevent the natural heirs of such adopted child from inheriting to the exclusion of the heirs of its adopting parents that which came from them, and of right ought, on the death of such child without husband or wife, issue or descendants surviving, to descend to the heirs of the adopting parents. There is a material difference in the matter of inheritance by an adopted and natural child, also as to the descent of property owned by them. An adopted child inherits from its natural parents, but not from the relatives of the adopting parents. The natural parent inherits all such property as the child may acquire otherwise than through the adopting parents. In the case of Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 283, it is said by the court: "It does her (the mother) no injustice to leave her with her right to such property as her child may acquire otherwise than through its adoptive parents, but it would do great injustice to permit her to secure the property acquired by her child in virtue of both its natural and adoptive rights."

But we think the Statute relating to the revocation of wills is decisive of the question involved in this case. Sec. 2559, Rev. Stat. 1881, provides: "No will in writing, nor any part thereof, except as in this Act provided, shall be revoked, unless the testator, or some other person in his presence and by his direction, with intent to revoke, shall destroy or mutilate the same, or such testator shall execute a sec-to an implied revocation of a will previously made, and that such implied revocations were not within the Statute of Frauds; but that such implied revocations might be rebutted and controlled by circumstances. The final determination of the matter seems to have been reached by the cases of Christopher v. Christopher, 2 Dick. 445, and Sprague v. Stone, Ambler 721.

The most important of the English cases since the Revolution is Marston v. Roe, 8 Ad. & El. 14, by fourteen out of the fifteen English judges, where the general doctrine was reaffirmed. But the courts there seem to have felt the difficulties that would result from such a view, and Lord Kenyon in Doe v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49, decided in 1792, placed the rule upon another ground, namely: a tacit condition annexed to the will when made, that it should not take effect if there should be a total change in the situation of the testator's family. This view of Lord Kenyon was afterwards adopted by Lord Ellenborough in Kenebel v. Scriffton, 2 East, 530.

Connecticut Laws 1885, chap. 110, § 135, providing for revocation of a will by subsequent marriage or birth, is not retrospective. Goodsell's App. 4 New Eng. Rep. 331, 55 Conn. 171.

A married woman under the statutes of Maine, being able to make or revoke a will as freely as a feme sole, the former rule that the will of a feme sole is revoked by her marriage is no longer in force, as the reason for it no longer exists. Re Hunt's Will, 81 Me. 275.

The rule that remarriage acts as revocation of a will is abrogated by statutory provision entitling a widow and children not provided for by will to the same share in the estate as if the testator had died intestate. Holt v. Holt, 1 New Eng. Rep. 547, 63 N. H. 475.

Where a woman during her second marriage made a will in favor of the children of her former marriage, and subsequently married a third husband, who survived her, there having been no issue by either the second or third marriage, the will was not revoked by the second marriage. Whether the marriage would have revoked a will made in favor of a stranger,—quære. Ward's Will, 70 Wis. 251.

Antenuptial will.

A woman's antenuptial will is not revoked by her marriage. Morey v. Sohler, 3 New Eng. Rep. 274, 63 N. H. 507.

A will containing a provision for the betrothed of testator is not revoked by his subsequent marriage to her, under Pa. Act 1833, § 15 (Pub. Laws, 250); and on his death without children by such marriage, the widow may elect to take under the will under Pa. Act 1843, § 11. Fidelity Ins. T. & S. D. Co's App. 121 Pa. 1.

Power of appointment in a will executed by a woman before her marriage will not be revoked by her marriage, an antenuptial agreement having been made that her property should descend according to her will, without specifying what will, and in fact her husband having had no knowledge of the will in question. Osgood v. Bliss, 2 New Eng. Rep. 146, 141 Mass. 474.

A will made by a woman in contemplation of marriage and in pursuance of an antenuptial contract, although dated two days prior to the contract and the marriage, is not within Ky. Gen. Stat., chap. 112, declaring that "every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked on his or her marriage, except a will made in the exercise of a power of appointment," etc.; and such will is not revoked by the marriage. Stewart v. Mulholland, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 824, 10 S. W. Rep. 125.

oad. A revocation of the second shall not revive the first will, unless it shall appear by the terms of such revocation to have been his intent to revive it, or unless, after such revocation, he shall duly republish the previous will.

Section 2560 provides that, "if, after the making of a will, the testator shall have born to him legitimate issue, who shall survive him, or shall have posthumous issue, then such will shall be deemed revoked, unless provision shall have been made in such will for such issue."

It is held in Runkle v. Gates, 11 Ind. 95, that to revoke a will the requirements of the Statute must be strictly pursued. It is manifestly true, no act, thing or deed will revoke a will once duly executed unless it comes within the provisions of the Statute providing for the revocation of wills. To hold that the adoption of a child revokes the will, it is necessary to interpolate into section 2560, after the words "legitimate issue," the words "or shall adopt a child," or words to the same effect, for the words of the Statute are plain and explicit. They are: "If, after the making of the will, the testator shall have born to him legitimate issue." It would be legislation and enacting a statute to so construe it, and would be putting an unwarranted construction upon the Statute to hold that the words "the testator shall have born to him legitimate issue" mean the same as or include an adopted child, or that by the adoption of a child a parent has born to him or has legitimate issue. The one is made a legal heir by legal proceedings under the Statute, and the other is an heir by reason of being born in lawful wedlock; for one the parent has natural love and affection, for the other the parent may or may not have. The one the parent is bound to by nature and under moral obligation to support, maintain, educate and provide for, and to the other the parent is made under such obligations as the Statute imposes and none other. The Statute gives to the one certain rights and imposes certain obligations on the adopting parents, but it does not make it the legitimate child and issue of the adopting parents or a child born to them. One becomes an heir by birth, the other by the judgment of a court.

By section 1 of an Act approved March 11, 1889, p. 490, it is provided "that, if a man marry a second or subsequent wife, and have by her no children, but has children alive by a former wife, the interest of such second or subsequent childless wife in the lands of the decedent shall only be a life estate, and the fee of the same shall, at the death of such husband, vest in such children, subject only to the life estate of the widow."

It might as well be claimed that if, during the lifetime of such second or subsequent wife the husband and wife adopt a child, it would be the same as if one were born to them, and such wife would inherit the one third in fee of the real estate owned by the husband, since, if a child was born to them as the fruits of the marriage, she would inherit, and the birth of the legitimate child fixes the status of the wife as to her interest in the property of her husband; and if, as contended by counsel for appellee, the status of an adopted child is the same in law as a child born in wedlock, and possesses the same rights as a child born in wedlock, and the adoption revokes an antecedent will the same as the birth of a child, then with equal force can it be said that the status and rights of the parents are fixed by the adoption of a child the same as by the birth of a child. As well it might be said that, if the father die testate and devise his real estate to his daughter for life, and the fee to the heirs of her body in case she shall have issue born to her, but in case she shall have no issue born to her, then the fee to a son, if the daughter adopt a child, that it would take the fee in the real estate the same as if it were a natural child born of her body.

These illustrations legitimately flow from the theory contended for by counsel for appellee in the construction of section 2560, if carried to a reasonable extent, and we think are clearly erroneous and cannot be supported by authority. We have examined the authorities cited by counsel for appellee, and think none of them sustain the doctrine contended for.

The case of Sevall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262, is based upon a statute somewhat different from the Statute of this State, and the decision goes no further than to hold that the adopted child took as the heir of the adopting father, the statute under which the adoption was made providing that the adopted child, for the purpose of inheritance, etc., should be the same as if born to them in lawful wedlock, except in certain cases, and the court held that the case under consideration did not come within any of the exceptions named in the Statute, and is far from being decisive of the questions presented in this case.

It seems clear to us that the adoption of a child does not revoke an antecedent will of the adopting parent; that it cannot be construed to operate the same as the testator having born to him legitimate issue.

The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and the judgment must be reversed.

1. Presentation of a check for payment and notice to the drawer of nonpayment, are un-

NOTE.—Bank check, what constitutes.

The essential characteristic of a check is that it shall be instantly payable on demand; and that demand is effected unconditionally when one of a set of several checks is presented for payment; and payment of one will discharge the whole set. Merchants Nat. Bank v. Ritzinger, 6 West. Rep. 840, 118 Ill. 484.

An order drawn upon a bank for the payment of a sum certain to a named person, and payable on demand, in legal effect purports to be drawn on funds of the maker in the bank, and is a check. It is none the less a check because drawn by one bank necessary when the drawer has or leaves no funds on deposit for its payment at the time when it should be presented, or if he consents or agrees that the same shall not be presented for payment. Under such circumstances the drawer's liability becomes fixed at that time without presentation and notice and whatever takes place afterwards in the state of his account at the bank will not change the rights of the parties.

2. The cause of action in such case to recover from the drawer the amount called for by the check rests upon the check and is not governed by the Statute of Limitations relating to contracts not in writing.
3. Checks dated at a certain place and drawn upon the "First National Bank" will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, to have been drawn upon the First National Bank of such place, where it appears that such bank exists and no other bank or place appears on the check.
4. Evidence supporting one of several counts setting out the same cause of action will sustain a finding for plaintiff in respect to such cause.
5. Checks for the payment of which there is no money on deposit bear interest from the time when presentation should have been made.
6. Willingness on the part of the bank officials to pay a check for the payment of which there are no funds on deposit will not render the presentation of the check for payment necessary in order to charge the drawer.
7. Original entries made in the books of a bank are admissible in evidence to show the state of a depositor's account at a certain past time, where they were made in the usual course of business by authorized bookkeepers in the discharge of their duties, and were correct when made.

upon another. State v. Vincent, 9 West. Rep. 615, 91 Mo. 662; Bull v. First Nat. Bank, 123 U. S. 105 (31 L. ed. 97).

A bank check or bill of exchange, not naming any time for payment, is payable on demand, and must be presented for payment within a reasonable time. Parker v. Reddick, 65 Miss. 242.

A check is not to be treated as overdue merely because it has not been presented as early as it might have been, or as a bill of exchange is required to be, to charge the drawer or indorser or transferor. A check is not due until it is demanded. Bull v. First Nat. Bank, 123 U. S. 105 (31 L. ed. 97).

A bank need not take notice of memoranda on a check, placed there by the depositor for his own convenience. State Nat. Bank v. Dodge, 124 U. S. 333 (31 L. ed. 458).

Parol evidence of custom is not admissible to show that a draft payable in future was equivalent to a check. Woodruff v. Merchants Bank, 25 Wend. 678; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, 38.

Payment of check.

A bank's protection in the payment of checks consists in the fact that it has strictly followed the depositor's directions in disbursing his funds. Lynch v. First Nat. Bank, 9 Cent. Rep. 564, 107 N. Y. 179.

Where a check reads "Pay to myself or order," and was certified by the bank while in the drawer's possession, the bank was justified in refusing to pay it to the third party without the drawer's indorsement. Ibid.

Giving a check authorizes payee to demand payment; on refusal to pay, drawer has right of action; demand for whole balance is not necessary. Viets v. Union Nat. Bank, 2 Cent. Rep. 751, 101 N. Y. 563.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Tippecanoe County allowing a claim filed against her as administratrix to recover the amount of certain checks and notes given by her intestate. Affirmed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Measrs. John R. Coffroth, T. A. Stuart and A. L. Kumler, for appellant:

If a suit be brought against the drawer of a check without presentment and notice, the onus is on the plaintiff to show that no damage has been done to drawer, as injury is prima facie presumed.

Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1588.

A check is only a contract by the drawer that the bank will pay it on demand. Until presentment, it is no evidence in the hands of the payee that the drawer is indebted to him.

Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1646; Flemming v. McClain, 18 Pa. 177.

If at the time of the execution of the checks it was agreed that they should not be presented, and that Culver should pay them, that constituted an agreement partly in writing and partly oral, and six years would bar a recovery.

tion; demand for whole balance is not necessary. Viets v. Union Nat. Bank, 2 Cent. Rep. 751, 101 N. Y. 563.

On payment of a check indorsed by a clerk with out authority, the bank collecting it guarantees the genuineness of the indorsement. Central Nat. Bank v. North River Bank, 44 Hun. 114.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This is an action by Jacob F. Marks, against Malinda Culver, administratrix of the estate of Moses C. Culver, deceased, to recover a claim against the estate of the decedent.

It is contended by the appellee that the appeal was not taken and perfected within the time allowed by statute. The appellant asked and obtained leave of this court to appeal, which disposed of this question, and it is unnecessary to consider it further.

Appellant's decedent died in December, 1884, and the claim was filed in February, 1885. The basis of the claim is three checks, copies of which are filed with the complaint, and marked A, B and C, and are in the following words and figures:

A.

Lafayette, Ind. Nov. 1, 1869.

The First National Bank.

Pay to J. F. Marks one thousand dollars. $1,000.

(Signed) M. C. Culver.

B.

Lafayette, Ind. Nov. 8, 1870.

First National Bank.

Pay to J. F. Marks or bearer, five hundred dollars. $500.

(Signed) M. C. Culver.

C.

Lafayette, Ind. Dec. 29, 1870.

First National Bank.

Pay to J. F. Marks or bearer, one thousand dollars. $1,000.

(Signed) M. C. Culver.

Also three promissory notes, one dated December 17, 1870, for $1,051.84, executed by the decedent to appellee; one dated September 1, 1870, for $550, executed by decedent to appellee; and one dated July 29, 1872, for $2,000, executed by the decedent to one Smith Lee, and assigned by him to appellee.

There are some nineteen paragraphs of complaint, most of them declaring upon the checks, and varying in their allegations. There was no further pleading filed. There was a trial by the court under the Statute, and a finding for the appellee on the checks and notes, aggregating $7,694.81. The court's finding is as follows: "The court, being in all things fully advised, finds that there is due the plaintiff, of and from the administratrix, to be paid out of the estate of the decedent, Moses C. Culver, on account of the note for $2,000, and dated July 29, 1872, the sum of eight hundred and twenty-three dollars and twelve cents ($823.12); on the due bill dated December 17, 1870, the sum of seven hundred and ninety-six dollars and fifty-nine cents ($796.59); on the two $1,000 checks, one dated November 1, 1869, and one December 29, 1870, the sum of three thousand nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and twenty-six cents ($3,936.26); on the $550 note, dated September 1, 1870, the sum of one thousand three hundred and eighty-three dollars and thirty-four cents ($1,383.34), including $125.75 as and for attorney's fees; and on the check for $500, and dated November 8, 1870, the sum of $755,—being the principal and interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1878, and making in the aggregate the sum of seven thousand six hundred and ninety-four dollars and thirty-one cents ($7,694.81)."

The appellant demurred to each paragraph of the complaint, which was overruled and exceptions. The appellant also filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled and exceptions; also moved the court in arrest of judgment, which was overruled and exceptions reserved; and these various rulings of the court are assigned as error. No question is presented as to the sufficiency of the paragraphs on the notes, or the right of the appellee to recover the amount due upon them.

The paragraphs of the complaint are numerous, and we do not deem it necessary to set them out, as we can state the questions presented in much less space.

They all declare upon the checks, and aver facts to excuse the necessity for presentment to the bank for payment, and notice to the drawer of nonpayment, differing in the averments in this particular. Some aver that Culver, the drawer, did not have money or funds sufficient in amount in said bank on the day of the date and delivery of said check, nor did he have enough on the day after the date of drawing and delivering said check in said bank, to pay said check. The ninth paragraph, declaring on the check dated November 1, 1869, alleges that Culver, the drawer, did not have money or means enough in said bank on the day of the date of said check, nor did he have sufficient funds or money in said bank until the 11th day of November, 1869, to pay said check.

Others aver that all the money or means said Moses C. Culver had in said bank on the day of the date of said check, or had at any time thereafter in said bank, were, by said check, paid to said Moses C. Culver, or to other persons on the order, check or request of the said Culver, and not to the plaintiff on account of said check.

Others aver that at the time of the execution and delivery of said check, the said Moses C. Culver requested the plaintiff not to present said check to said bank for payment, and that he, the said Moses C. Culver, should be permitted to pay, and that he, the said Culver, would pay said check without presentment thereof for payment to said bank; and the plaintiff then and there promised not to present for payment said check at said bank, and to permit the said Culver to pay the same without presentment for payment at said bank; that in pursuance of said request of said Culver, and the promise of the plaintiff, the plaintiff did not present said check, nor was the same presented to said bank for payment.

The fourteenth paragraph, on the check dated December 29, 1870, alleges that Culver did not have money or means sufficient in amount in said bank on the day of the date of said check, nor did he have enough means or money in said bank for more than thirty days thereafter, to pay said check.

The foregoing are the averments in the respective paragraphs relating to the checks. The several paragraphs are respectively based on the checks as the foundation of the action, and the checks constitute a cause of action. Henshaw v. Root, 60 Ind. 220; Fletcher v. Piereson, 69 Ind. 281.

The general rule is that a check must be presented to the bank for payment, and that notice of nonpayment must be given to the drawer; but there are exceptions to this rule.

In Bolles on Banks and Their Depositors, p. 325, § 833, it is said: "Another excuse is the lack of funds with the drawee. The drawing of a check under such circumstances, unexplained, is a fraud which deprives the maker of every right to require presentation and demand of payment."

In Franklin v. Vanderpool, 1 Hall (N. Y.), 78, it is held that if a maker of a bank check has no funds in the bank upon which it is drawn at the date of the check, it is not necessary for the holder to present such check at bank for payment, in order to enable him to sustain an action upon it against the maker. Where the maker of a check withdraws his funds from the bank so that the check cannot be paid, no demand and notice are necessary. Bolles on Banks, etc., supra; Sutcliffe v. McDowell, 2 Nott & McC. 251.

In 2 Morse on Banks and Banking, 8d ed. § 425, it is said: "Presentment, however, may be altogether dispensed with, provided that if made it could not at the time be legally and properly met by the bank with a payment;" and numerous authorities are cited in support of this statement. This is in accordance with a well-settled legal principle that the law requires no unnecessary thing to be done. Checks are presumed to be drawn against a fund deposited in the bank out of which they are to be paid, and if there is no such fund so deposited out of which they can be paid, the presumption is that a demand will be of no avail and useless, and it must be further presumed that the drawer knows the state of his account with the bank, and whether or not he has sufficient funds on deposit to pay the check, and if he has not, no demand is necessary, and if no demand be necessary, then certainly no notice is necessary; being no demand, there could be no notice of demand.

It is further stated in Morse on Banks and Banking, supra, that "regular presentation may be waived by conduct or representations; any agreement, express or implied, will excuse want of the usual formalities."

It is further said that "a check given as evidence of a loan to the drawer need not be presented to the drawee."

This doctrine is held in the case of Ourrier v. Davis, 111 Mass. 490.

It is the well-settled rule that in the absence of any agreement or special circumstances, a check shall be presented at least within banking hours on the day following the date of its delivery, if the bank on which it is drawn is in the same place where the payee lives or does business; and that the first presentation fixes the rights of the parties. If, upon such presentation, the bank offers and is willing to pay and the payee refuses to accept it, and afterwards, and before it is again presented, the bank fails, as between the payee and the drawer, the payee suffers the loss. See Morse, Banks and Banking, §§ 421, 426.

And it must necessarily follow from the well-settled law regarding checks that, if the drawer has no funds in the bank at the time the payee is by law required to present the check for payment, no necessity for demand and notice exists, and that the liability of the parties is fixed at this time. That is to say, if demand and notice be necessary, demand must be made on the day following the delivery of the check if the bank is in the same place where the payee lives and does business, and notice must be given, and the liability is thereby then and there fixed, and the payee may immediately bring suit. So, on the other hand, it must logically flow and necessarily follow from this rule, that if the drawer has no money or funds on deposit in the bank at the time the payee is required to present the check, then the liability of the drawer is fixed without presentation and notice, and the payee may at once bring suit on the check, and whatever takes place afterwards in the state of his account at the bank can make no difference, and will not change the rights of the parties.

The authorities cited, we think, are decisive of all the questions presented by the rulings on the demurrers to the several paragraphs of complaint, and that the general rule is that the payee must present the check for payment and give notice to the drawer of its nonpayment; but that no presentation or notice is necessary when the drawer has no funds on deposit for the payment of the check at the time when the check should be presented; or if he have funds on deposit at the time and withdraw the same, leaving none on deposit for the payment of the check, or if, by consent of the drawee or agreement between him and the payee, the check is not to be presented at the bank for payment, then there is no necessity for presentation and notice.

There was no error in overruling the demurrers to the complaint.

It is contended that the right of recovery was barred by limitation. What we have said in passing upon the complaint disposes of this question. The check being in writing and constituting the foundation of the action, it is not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

A question is made as to the check. It is contended that as the complaint alleges that the checks were drawn on the "First National Bank of Lafayette, Indiana," and that there was no proof of such fact except that the checks were read in evidence and that the checks are drawn on the "First National Bank," that the proof made by the introduction of the checks does not correspond with the averments of the complaint. The checks were copied and made a part of the respective paragraphs of the complaint which declared upon them, and showed affirmatively in each paragraph of the complaint the name of the bank upon which they were drawn. They were each dated at "Lafayette, Indiana," and drawn on the "First National Bank," and the name of no other place or bank appeared upon the check, and the evidence showed that there was a First National Bank at Lafayette, and the fair presumption, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, is that it related to and that they were drawn upon that bank. Walker v. Woollen, 54 Ind. 164; Roach v. Hill, 54 Ind. 245; Dutch v. Boyd, 81 Ind. 146.

It is not contended that there is no evidence to support the allegations of the paragraphs of the complaint which allege that it was agreed that appellee should not present the checks at the bank for payment, but that Culver should pay them without presentation. This can make no difference. There were several other paragraphs of the complaint respectively declaring on each of the checks, and if the evidence supported one paragraph declaring on each check, the finding would be sustained. It was not necessary, because appellee declared on each cause of action in several various forms of averments, that he should prove the allegations of each paragraph of his complaint.

It is contended that the assessment of the amount of recovery is too large; that the court allowed interest upon the checks. In this there is no error. Under the law as we have stated, the cause of action accrued upon the checks at the time they should have been presented, if there had been money in the bank for their payment, and as the payee resided at the same place where the bank was doing business this would be the next day after the delivery of the check, and appellee is entitled to interest from that date.

We now come to questions presented by the motion for new trial on the admission and rejection of evidence.

The appellant offered to prove by Mr. M. L. Pierce, president of the bank, that if, at the date of several checks, or at any time during the year 1869 and 1870, checks for like amounts had been presented to the First National Bank drawn by Moses O. Culver, by the holder of such checks, they would have been paid. The offer was properly made. The witness was sworn and asked the proper question and the evidence was excluded. In this ruling of the court there was no error. The evidence offered is to the effect that the bank would have paid the checks without regard to whether Mr. Culver had funds in the bank or not. It is a well-settled rule that the liabilities of the parties are fixed by the fact of the drawer having or not having funds in the bank out of which the check could be lawfully paid, and the fact that he had no funds in the bank against which the check is drawn and out of which he had a legal right to have it paid; or, in other words, if the bank was not at the time indebted to the drawer for money deposited, whereby he had the right to expect the bank to pay the check and charge it to him as against such deposit account, then the payee was relieved from making a demand, and this cannot be changed by a willingness on the part of the bank to pay the check of the drawer, notwithstanding he may have no funds on deposit. The payee took the check with the legal obligation resting upon him to present the check at the bank for payment, and if he failed to do so and the drawer had funds in the bank to pay it, and loss ensued by reason of such failure, the payee suffers the loss; but if the drawer had no funds in the bank for the payment of the check, the payee is excused from presenting the check for payment. If the drawer has no funds in the bank at the time for presentment for payment, there is no legal obligation resting upon the payee to present it for payment. The bank had no legal right to permit the drawer to overdraw and pay his check out of the funds of other depositors or the money of the stockholders.

The next question for consideration is the exception of the appellant to the ruling of the court to the admission in evidence of the entries in the books of the First National Bank, made in the usual course of business, showing the state of the account of said Moses C. Culver at and subsequent to the execution of the checks sued upon. As preliminary to the introduction of the entries in these books in evidence it was shown by the clerks and officers of the bank, produced in court as witnesses, and as to the entries made by such witnesses, that they were at the time the entries were made the proper and authorized bookkeepers to make such entries; that the entries were made by them in the due course of business, in the discharge of their duties, and were correct when made; that the entries made by them were original and entered by them in books kept for that purpose, and that they had no recollection of the facts represented by the entries.

As to the entries made by parties who were not witnesses, it was shown that the enterer was at the time the entry was made the proper bookkeeper and agent of the bank to make the entries in the due course of business; that the entries were original entries in original books made by such bookkeepers in due course of business, and were in the known handwriting of such bookkeepers, and that the enterer was dead or a nonresident of the State of Indiana. After the making of such preliminary proof the entries were admitted in evidence over the objection of the appellant.

It was proper to prove in this case the state of Moses C. Culver's account with the bank upon which he drew the checks, at the time he drew them and subsequent thereto, under the issues in the case. And it is pertinent to the question to consider how such facts could be proven if the evidence introduced was not admissible or competent for that purpose. The bank with whom he did business and upon which he drew the check, kept books and made an entry of all their business; of the money deposited by Culver and checks drawn by him and paid by the bank. The books were kept by disinterested parties. Some of the persons who at the time of the transaction kept the books took the deposit and placed it to Culver's credit, paid the checks drawn by him and entered them on the books or charged them to his account, were dead. Others were beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and others had no personal recollection of the transaction, except to know that the books were kept in due course of the banking business, and were correct and showed a correct statement of the account.

Unless the evidence admitted was competent the appellee is deprived of making proof of the facts.

Price v. Earl of Torrington, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (9th ed.) 566, was an action for beer sold and delivered. It was held that a book containing an account of the beer delivered by the plaintiff's drayman, and which it was the duty of the drayman to sign daily, was competent to prove the delivery on proof that the drayman was dead and of his handwriting.

In a note to this case it is said: "A party's books of account and original entries are now in most, if not all, of the United States, received as evidence of a sale and delivery of goods to, or of work done for, the adverse party." On the same subject it is further said: "The reason for its introduction has never been placed by any court on higher ground than that of necessity, for, in view of the number and frequency of transactions of which entries are daily required to be made, the difficulty and inconvenience of making formal common-law proof of each item would be very great. To insist upon it, therefore, would either render a credit system impossible or leave the creditor remediless."

In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 14th ed. § 115, it is said: "It is upon the same ground that certain entries made by third persons are treated as original evidence. Entries by third persons are divisible into two classes: first, those which are made in the discharge of official duty and in the course of professional employment; and secondly, mere private entries. Of these latter we shall hereafter speak. In regard to the former class, the entry, to be admissible, must be one which it was the person's duty to make, or which belonged to the transaction as a part thereof, or which was its usual and proper concomitant."

In 1 Wharton, on Evidence, 8d ed. § 238, it is said: "An accountant or other business agent may be regarded as a member of a well-adjusted business machine, noting in the proper time and in the proper way what it is his duty to note. If he has no personal motive to swerve him, the inference is that what he does in this way he does accurately, and his evidence, if there be nothing to impeach it, rises in authority precisely to the extent to which he is to be regarded as a mechanical and self-forgetting register of the events which accounts are offered to prove. Hence it is that the memoranda or book entries of an officer, agent or business man when in the course of his duties become evidence after he is deceased, or after he has passed out of the range of process or become incompetent to testify of the truth of such entries,—subject, however to be excluded if it appear that in making the entries he was not registering, but manufacturing current facts."

The rule as stated by Greenleaf and Wharton is well supported by authorities. Sickles v. Mather, 20 Wend. 72.

In Faxon v. Hollis, 18 Mass. 427, the book of a blacksmith, kept in ledger form, the items being first noted down on a slate and then entered in the book, was held to be competent evidence. Reynolds v. Manning, 15 Md. 510; Kelso v. Fletcher, 48 N. H. 282; Coolidge v. Brigham, 5 Met. 68; New Haven & N. Co. v. Goodwin, 42 Conn. 280.

In Alter v. Berghaus, 8 Watts, 77, it is held that the absence of a witness from the State, so far as it affects the admissibility of secondary evidence, has the same effect as his death. This was in relation to the admission in evidence of original entries in books made by such absent person.

We think the evidence is clearly admissible, but we might add that, as regards the books kept by bookkeepers and officers of national banks, by § 5209, U. S. Rev. Stat., it is made a penal offense to make a false entry in any such books; so that these entries were not only made as original entries in the due course of business, but the persons making them were liable to criminal prosecution, and, upon conviction, to suffer imprisonment, if they made a false entry.

A bookkeeper for the bank made out a statement of all the items of Culver's account appearing in the books of the bank, and appeared and was sworn as a witness, and stated that he had prepared such statement and had it with him, and with the books before him was interrogated as to what items appeared in the account. The court permitted such statement so made out and testified to by the witness in evidence, and allowed the same to be read to the jury over the objection and exceptions of the appellant, and this ruling of the court is complained of as error.

This was a long statement of accounts, and the witness who made out the statement was subject to cross-examination. The appellant had an opportunity to test its correctness and cross-examine the witness who made out the statement. The appellant had as full and complete an opportunity to discover any error in the statement made by the witness as if he had appeared as a witness and testified from the books without making any written statements. When the entries in books are numerous and complicated, it is competent to permit an expert bookkeeper, who has examined the books, to give a summary oral statement of their contents and computations made. See The Work of the Advocate, by Elliott, p. 217, and authorities there cited. See also Von Sachs v. Kretz, 72 N. Y. 548; McCormick v. Pennsylvania Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 815; Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 593.

We see no reason why, when such expert witness, who has examined the books and made an abstract of them, testifies as a witness, and opportunity is given for cross-examination in regard to such statement, as in this case, the statement may not be admitted in evidence and read to the jury. We think the abstract of the books was properly admitted; but the original entries made in the books were also in evidence in this case, and no complaint is made that the statement did 7 L. R. A.

not correspond with the books; and whether properly admitted or not, no harm could have resulted to the appellant by reason of the admission of such statement, and therefore no reason exists for the reversal of the case. Citizens State Bank v. Adams, 91 Ind. 288; Hays v. Morgan, 87 Ind. 231, 235, 236.

There is a further question as to the ruling of the court in refusing to allow the appellant to ask one Spencer a cross-examining question. We have considered this and there was no error. There is no error in the record for which the judgment should be reversed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Blackford County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for injuries resulting from the alleged wrongful casting of surface water upon plaintiff's land. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. E. Shipley, B. G. Shinn and Elisha Pierce, for appellants:

If the court has jurisdiction in a cause and makes an erroneous ruling and decision, so it be not void, the decision will stand and be binding upon the parties until set aside in some direct proceeding known to the law.

Young v. Wells, 87 Ind. 410; Gavin v. Graydon, 41 Ind. 559; Smith v. Clifford, 99 Ind. 114.

The plaintiff, by completing the appeal as an appeal in term time or by appealing in vacation, procuring supersedeas and giving appeal bond, might have stayed further proceedings under the petition for drain, and thereby prevented, not only the judgment establishing the ditch, but also its construction.

Chambers v. Kyle, 87 Ind. 206.

The petitioners are not responsible for the error of law committed by the court.

Cox*, 111 Ind. 299.

Messrs. Cantwell & Cantwell and J. A. Bonham for appellee.

Mitchell, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Reasoner instituted this action against Thompson and three others, and charged that the defendants had wrongfully and unlawfully constructed a ditch or drain in such a manner as to drain the surface water off their lands, and cause it to be cast upon and overflow the plaintiff's lands, to his damage.

It appeared upon the face of the pleadings that in November, 1888, the defendants, having given due notice, presented their petition to the Circuit Court of Blackford County, asking for the location and construction of a drain, so as to reclaim and drain certain wet lands of which they were the owners. Such proceedings were thereupon had, in pursuance of the Statute providing for the drainage of wet lands, as that the ditch prayed for was regularly established, and the construction of the work entered upon, and in due time completed.

At the proper time Reasoner and two others, whose lands were not described in the petition, nor in the report of the commissioners of drainage, as liable to be either benefited or damaged, appeared and, after waiving notice, presented a remonstrance against the report of the commissioners, alleging, among other things, as grounds therefor, that they would sustain damage to their lands respectively by the construction of the drain as proposed, and that the proposed drainage could not be accomplished without an expense exceeding the aggregate benefits. Upon motion, the court rejected the remonstrance upon the ground that the remonstrants were not within the terms of the Statute which prescribed the class of persons entitled to remonstrate.

The remonstrants thereupon appealed to this court, and upon the hearing it was held that the court below had committed error in rejecting the remonstrance. The judgment was reversed accordingly. Reasoner v. Creek, 101 Ind. 482.

No stay of proceedings having been had or applied for, the drainage commissioner to whom the construction of the work was referred, collected the assessments made, completed the drain under the direction and to the approval of the court, and was finally discharged pending the appeal of the remonstrants in this court. After the judgment was reversed, the proceeding was reinstated in the court below, and at the next term the court ascertained the amount of damage which each of the several remonstrants would sustain, and found that the expense of constructing the work and the damages exceeded the aggregate benefits. Thereupon the proceeding was dismissed, leaving the drain as it had theretofore been constructed on the lands of the defendants, in full and complete operation.

The plaintiff charges that the drain thus constructed discharges the surface water off the defendant's lands into a creek which flows through the plaintiff's land, which lies some distance below the point of discharge, and causes the creek to overflow its banks and inundate his lands, to his damage. He had a verdict and judgment in the court below.

The question now is whether or not the appellants, upon whose petition the drainage proceedings were instituted and carried forward, are liable in a civil action for damages for the injuries resulting to the lands of the plaintiff on account of the construction of the ditch, or whether they may avail themselves of the judgment under which the drain was constructed, as a defense against any claim for damages to the plaintiff's land.

The general principle is well settled that a subsisting judgment of a court which had jurisdiction of the persons and subject matter is binding at least upon all who were parties, and constitutes a sufficient justification for all acts done in its enforcement, until it is reversed or set aside by competent authority. Gray v. Brignardello, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 627 (17 L. ed. 693); Freeman, Judgments, § 482; Wait, Fraud, Conv. 2d ed. §§ 443, 444.

A judgment regularly given, although it may be erroneous, is nevertheless the act of the court, and anyone who proceeds to enforce it may avail himself of its protection until it is reversed. Whatever contrariety there may be in the adjudged cases in other respects, all the authorities agree that where a judgment is merely erroneous, it will afford complete protection to all persons who proceed to enforce it, and who act in reliance upon the adjudication.

Upon the reversal of an erroneous judgment, the law raises an obligation against one who has received the benefit of the judgment, to make restitution to the other party of any money or property that may have been received, or for its value or equivalent in money in case the plaintiff asserts title to the thing received, or has converted it to his own use. United States Bank v. Bank of Washington, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 8 (8 L. ed. 299); South Fork Canal Co. v. Gordon, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 479; Reynolds v. Hoemer, 45 Cal. 616.

In case money has been received, it may be recovered back in an action for money had and received. Metzner v. Bauer, 98 Ind. 425; Martin v. Woodruff, 2 Ind. 287; Clark v. Finney, 6 Cow. 297.

Thus, it is said in McNilton v. Love, 18 Ill. 486: "If the plaintiff has derived any benefit from the judgment, he must make as full restitution to the defendant as the circumstances of the case will permit. If he has received payment in money from the defendant, the latter can recover it back in an action of indebitatus assumpsit. If he has obtained money by the sale of the property of the defendant, the latter may recover it as so much money had and received to his use. If he has purchased in property under the judgment and still retains the ownership, the defendant may recover the special property in the appropriate action. If he has aliened the property, he is responsible to the defendant for its value."

"The restitution," says the Supreme Court of Missouri, "to which the party is entitled upon the reversal of an erroneous judgment, is of everything which is still in the possession of his adversary. Gott v. Powell, 41 Mo. 416.

While a judgment defendant is entitled to compel the fullest restitution of all benefits which the plaintiff received on account of the enforcement of an erroneous judgment, it is not strictly accurate to say that the latter is liable to an action for damages for enforcing a judgment pending an appeal where there has been no stay of proceedings. There would be no inducement for an appellant, in any case, to secure a supersedeas to stay proceedings if it were held that the plaintiff assumed the liability of all damages which might result from the enforcement of the judgment; nor would anyone venture to enforce a judgment while the right of appeal existed or while an appeal was pending. Where payment of a subsisting judgment is enforced by taking out regular process, the plaintiff is acting under authority of law, and cannot be held responsible for damages as a wrong-doer, because it turns out in the end that the court committed an error in rendering the judgment. The plaintiff takes the chance of losing the title to any property he may have purchased at an execution sale, and of being compelled to restore to the last farthing any benefit he may have received under the judgment, but he cannot be compelled to make good all the damage which the defendant, who neglected to stay proceedings pending the appeal, may have sustained by the erroneous action of the court. Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350-374 (21 L. ed. 959-965); Gay v. Smith, 38 N. H. 171; Bryant v. Fairfield, 51 Me. 149; Freeman, Executions, §§ 846, 847; Herman, Executions, p. 608.

As has been said, "Case for the malicious motive and want of probable cause for the proceeding is the only sustainable form of action to recover damages." 1 Chitty, Pl. 186; Day v. Bach, 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. [14 Jones & S.] 460.

The action, in the absence of malice or want of probable cause, against a plaintiff who has enforced payment of an erroneous judgment, is not founded upon any supposed wrong that he has committed, but lies to compel a restitution of any benefits which accrued to him, on the ground that, in equity and good conscience, he ought, after the reversal, to restore to the defendant everything of value which he received on account of the erroneous judgment.

Thus, in Simpson v. Hornbeck, 8 Lans. 53, one of the parties recovered a judgment against the other in an action for the conversion of personal property, from which there was an appeal without stay of proceedings. After the appeal the party who had judgment in his favor obtained an execution against the body of the other, upon which the latter was arrested and imprisoned. Afterwards the judgment was reversed, and it was held that an action to recover damages for false imprisonment was not maintainable. This, upon the principle that it would be unjust to hold that a judgment duly rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject matter should fail to protect a party acting under it, before reversal, on account of error committed by the court. Miller v. Adams, 7 Lans. 131, 52 N. Y. 409; Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106; Dusenbury v. Kelsey, 85 N. Y. 383; Hayden v. Shed, 11 Mass. 500.

"The party causing process to be issued is not responsible for anything that may be done under it when the process is afterwards set aside, not for irregularity, but for error. There is a manifest distinction between setting aside process for irregularity and reversing a proceeding for error, on appeal. In the one case a man acts irregularly and independently, without the sanction of any court. He therefore takes the consequences of his own unauthorized act. But when he relies on the judgment of a competent court, however erroneous that may be, the party acting upon the faith of it ought to be protected." Williams v. Smith, 14 C. B. N. S. 596; Prentice v. Harrison, 4 Ad. & El. N. S. 852; Marks v. Townsend, 97 N. Y. 590.

In Day v. Bach, 87 N. Y. 56, an attachment had been granted against the property of the defendants. Afterwards the defendants moved to vacate the writ of attachment. This motion was denied below, but upon appeal the judgment denying the motion was reversed. Pending the appeal most of the attached property was sold by the order of the court as perishable property, and it was held that, the process having issued regularly in a case where the court had jurisdiction, the plaintiff was entitled to justify what was done under it, although it was afterwards set aside for error in the judgment. In that case the court said: "It does not appear that the defendants purchased any of the property on the sale, or had or retained any part of it. The sale by the sheriff having been made under the order of the court, the money derived therefrom stood as a substitute for the property. This the plaintiff has received, and the defendants, having had neither the property nor its value, are not responsible to the plaintiff."

After an exhaustive examination of the authorities, the learned judge who delivered the opinion in Day v. Bach, supra, deduced from them the following propositions: (1) That a void writ or process furnishes no protection to a party, and he is liable to an action for what has been done under it, and it is not necessary that it should be set aside before bringing the action. (2) If the writ is irregular only, and not absolutely void, no action lies until it has been set aside, but when set aside it ceases to be a protection for acts done under it while in force. (3) If the process was regularly issued in a case where the court had jurisdiction, the party may justify what has been done under it after it has been set aside for error, and an action for false imprisonment, in case of arrest, or of trespass for property taken under it will not lie.

Upon principle and upon the irrefutable reasoning of all the authorities, the conclusion follows that the appellants in the present case are not liable in an action sounding in tort for damage resulting to the plaintiff's property from the construction of the drain. The appellants invoked the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of securing the construction of a work in which public as well as private interests were concerned. The work was constructed and completed by an officer of the court, in pursuance of a judgment regularly given. The power and jurisdiction of the court were regularly invoked, and although it may now be conceded that they were erroneously exercised, the judgment and proceedings were efficacious for the protection of those who invoked the jurisdiction of the court, and acted under the solemn sanction of its authority.

It may be well to remark that the principles enunciated by Mr. Justice Field in South Fork Canal Co. v. Gordon, supra, which seem to have, to some extent at least, controverted the decision in Smith v. Zent, 83 Ind. 86, were subsequently modified by the same eminent judge in Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350 [21 L. ed. 959]. Freeman, Executions, § 847.

It should be noted that this action does not proceed upon the ground or assumption that the appellants, either jointly or severally, have, by means of the erroneous judgment under which the drain was constructed, received benefits in excess of the amount paid by them, equal to the amount of damage sustained by the plaintiff; nor does it appear that the damage which resulted to the plaintiff below inured to the special benefit of the appellants' property. The statute provides that a party affected may remonstrate, and assign as one of the causes that the work cannot be accomplished without an expense exceeding the aggregate benefits; and it also provides that if the ground of remonstrance is established the proceeding shall be dismissed. The plaintiff availed himself of his right and procured the proceedings to be dismissed after the drain had been constructed. He might have waived the above ground of remonstrance and had his damages assessed, but he elected to take the other course. Whether he may yet have his damages assessed upon the lands benefited, or whether, in an equitable action, he might have the benefits received by each of the appellants, or which inure to their lands respectively, apportioned, are questions we do not decide now. It is enough to decide that his action to recover damages cannot be maintained.

1. A will is not invalid because made on Sunday without any unusual circumstances or special necessity for its execution upon that day. The drafting and execution of the will does not constitute "common labor" or work in one's "usual avocation" within the meaning of Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2000.

2. A complaint in an action to contest a will, alleging that testator's intention was different from that expressed by the will, is demurrable.

(February 28, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Allen County in favor of defendants in an action brought to contest a will. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. R. Alden for appellant.

Messrs. Colerick & Oppenheim for appellees.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action by the appellant against the appellees, to contest the will of Christian Gottlieb Rapp, deceased. The errors assigned are the rulings of the court in sustaining demurrers to the second and third paragraphs of appellant's complaint. The first paragraph of complaint having been withdrawn, there was a judgment on the demurrer for the appellees.

The second paragraph alleges that the will was executed on Sunday, and alleges facts showing that the will might have been executed upon some other day of the week, and that there was no necessity for the execution of the will upon Sunday; that the testator was, and had been for a period of time prior and subsequent to the execution of said will, in a condition, both physically and mentally, to have executed a will, and that, as a matter of convenience, he arranged with his attorney, who drafted the will, and a friend, to come to his (the testator's) house on Sunday, and draft the will, and the will was drafted and written by the attorney, and executed by the testator, on Sunday. This paragraph presents the question as to the validity of a will executed on Sunday without any unusual circumstances or special necessity having existed for its execution upon that particular day. It is contended by counsel for appellant that a will executed upon Sunday is void unless it be shown that some unusual circumstances existed making a necessity for its execution upon that day; that the drafting and execution of a will come within the definition of "common labor," and are prohibited by § 2000, Rev. Stat. 1881, which provides that "whoever, being over fourteen years of age, is found on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, rioting, hunting, fishing, quarreling, at common labor or engaged in his usual avocation (works of charity and necessity only excepted), shall be fined in any sum not more than ten nor less than one dollar; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect such as conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, travelers, families removing, keepers of toll-bridges and toll-gates and ferrymen, acting as such."

It is contended that a broad construction should be given to the words "common labor" and "usual avocation," so as to include the drafting and execution of a will, and that such has been the construction placed upon the Statute by this court, by holding that contracts and bonds, and even church subscriptions, come within the term "common labor," and their execution is prohibited on Sunday, and are therefore invalid unless afterwards ratified.

We are unable to agree with the theory of counsel. There is a wide distinction between the execution of contracts, notes and bonds on Sunday, and the execution of a will. The for-

NOTE.—Contract made on Sunday.

Contracts made upon Sunday, when not made in the course of a business prohibited upon that day by statute, are valid. Beham v. Ohio, 75 Tex. 87.

The mere signing of a contract on Sunday, which is not delivered on that day, does not avoid the contract under a statute forbidding the doing any business on that day. Gibbs & Sterrett Mfg. Co. v. Brucker, 111 U. S. 597 (28 L. ed. 834).

Where defendant, without the concurrence or knowledge of the plaintiff, signed on Sunday a paper writing which bore date on a week day, and which, to become a contract between the parties, required the assent and signature of the plaintiff, which was given on a week day, this does not avoid the contract. Id. See note to Anderson v. Bellinger (Ala.) 4 L. R. A. 680.

mer are instruments executed in the common, every-day affairs of life, in the usual course of business. They create a liability from one person to another. They are the foundation of, or a necessity for their execution arises out of, business transactions. It is not so in regard to a will. Its execution is the voluntary act of the testator. It may be revoked or changed, in a proper manner, at his decretion. It provides for the disposition of the testator's estate after his death. It might be said to have some elements of sacredness about it. It is executed in anticipation of the death of the testator, and is to take effect at his death, and be operative thereafter. One of its prime objects is to enable the testator to provide in a proper manner for those who are the objects of his bounty, giving to those who need and who ought to receive, his bounty, but who would not, were it not for the right of testamentary disposition of property. By the execution of a will the testator is also enabled to aid in continuing and building up institutions of charity and learning, which would not be done by other methods, requiring a surrender of the full control of one's property during life; and these objects, accomplished by means of testamentary disposition of property, are entitled to be treated with some degree of sacredness and respect. But, if the drafting and execution of a will could be said to fall within the term "common labor," yet there would at all times exist a necessity for the immediate execution of a will. The law recognizes the right of persons to make a testamentary disposition of their property by will, and to make such disposition while in life, and possessed of sufficient mental capacity to make a will; and the only certainty of being able to make such disposition of one's property is to do so instantly, when one is possessed of his faculties. Death is certain, and life is uncertain. One has no lease of life or his mental faculties. Either may be extinguished instantly, and the only security one has of being able to execute a will, and dispose of his property in that manner as he may desire, is to do so when in the possession of his faculties; and the uncertainty of life creates a constant necessity, and presents to one's mind the uncertainty of being able to provide for those who are near to him, and are the objects of his bounty, or making provision for, and aiding in, the perpetuation of those institutions in which he is interested, and which are sacred to him, and beneficial to the public interests, if the making of the will be delayed. The drafting and execution of a will is akin to the execution of a marriage contract, and solemnizing the marriage. It may as well be said that the minister, while engaged in solemnizing a marriage, is engaged in common labor, or at his usual avocation, as that the lawyer who drafts a will is so engaged, as the minister, evidently, is engaged in solemnizing of marriages more frequently than the lawyer is engaged in the writing of wills.

The Statute makes it a penal offense to be found engaged in common labor, or engaged in one's usual avocation. It certainly would not be contended that a minister of the gospel, engaged in solemnizing a marriage on Sunday, or a lawyer engaged in writing a will to be executed on Sunday, would be subject to indictment and prosecution for a violation of the Statute; and yet, if either come within the prohibition of the Statute, they would be liable to a criminal prosecution, and the one is evidently as much a violation of the Statute as the other. The one act is the solemnizing of a contract whereby two persons are joined together, and become members of one family, by the bond of holy wedlock, whereby they both become members of one household,—a contract and union in which society are interested. The other is engaged in the execution of a will providing for the members of his household. The law, it is true, provides for a distribution of property; but oftentimes the relationship or the circumstances are such as that the law does not make a proper or equitable provision; and in such cases the purpose of a will is a sacred one, making proper provision for the members of the testator's household, or the persons who are the objects of his bounty, and dependent upon him for support, and not so related as that, the law would cast his estate upon them. Possibly unjust wills may be made, but that does not affect the right to make a will.

It seems clear to us that the drafting and execution of a will do not come either within the letter or spirit of the Statute hereinbefore referred to. It is not an act commonly done, but rather an uncommon act, to execute a will. It is rare that a person who dies possessed of property disposes of it by will, and those who do seldom make but one during a lifetime. Occasionally one revokes a will, and makes a new one, or adds a codicil, but testamentary disposition of property is an exception to the usual mode in which the title to property passes from one to another, and certainly no desecration of the Sabbath existed on account of the day being occupied for that purpose. No evil tendencies were growing out of such work on the Sabbath day which required legislation to correct; but we are not required to pass upon the question without authority, as the courts of other States have passed upon the same question, and held that a will executed on Sunday is valid. Bennett v. Brooks, 9 Allen, 118; Beitenman's App. 55 Pa. 183; George v. George, 47 N. H. 27.

The third paragraph of the complaint, as we construe it, alleges a mistake in the will; that, by a mistake of the scrivener or translator of the will it was not written as the testator intended; that he did not intend or wish or will to give the one half of his estate to the persons named, to whom it was devised and bequeathed in the will, but intended to give it to other persons. These averments seek to contradict the terms of the will, or to show that the testator's intention was different from that expressed by the will. This cannot be done. Bunnell v. Bunnell, 73 Ind. 163; McAlister v. Butterfield, 31 Ind. 25; Grimes v. Harmon, 35 Ind. 193.

There is no error in the record.
Judgment affirmed, with costs.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Alice M. HUNN, Admx., etc., of George Hunn, Deceased,
v.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL R. CO., Appt.

(....Mich.....)

1. It is the duty of the master to supervise, direct and control the operation and management of his business so that no injury shall ensue to his employes through his own carelessness or negligence in carrying it on, or else to furnish some person who will do so, for whom he must stand sponsor.
2. A person vested with full control in a particular branch of business, subject to no supervision except the master's, over the action of employes whose duty it is to obey him, stands in the place of the master and is not a fellow servant with them.
3. A train dispatcher having full control in the telegraph management of trains is not a fellow servant with trainmen.
4. The contributory negligence of a fellow servant will not prevent the recovery for injury to a servant which was due in part to the negligence of the master.
5. What was usually and habitually done in the running of trains may be proved to rebut a claim that an employe was negligent in running a train in violation of rules.
6. Mortuary tables contained in How. Stat.,

§ 4245, are admissible in evidence as tending to show a person's expectancy of life at a certain age.

7. If no improper testimony affecting the subject of damages has been admitted, and the court has given to the jury proper instructions, the amount of damages awarded is beyond the reach of a writ of error.
8. Evidence as to the extent of the property of the family, and of an incumbrance thereon, is inadmissible in an action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband.

(December 28, 1899.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Mr. Ashley Pond, with Messrs. Gibson & Parkinson and H. M. Campbell, for defendant, appellant:

When the company uses due diligence in the selection of competent, skillful and trusty servants it is not answerable in damages to one of them for any injury received by him in consequence of the carelessness of another, while both are engaged in the same service of the common master.

NOTE.—Fellow servants, who are.

A fellow servant is one who serves and is controlled by the same master; and common employment is service of such kind that, in the exercise of ordinary sagacity, all who engage in it may be able to foresee, when accepting it, that through the negligence of fellow servants they may be exposed to injury. McAndrews v. Burns, 30 N. J. L. 117; Ewan v. Lippincott, 47 N. J. L. 192.

In order to constitute persons fellow servants, it is necessary that they shall be, at the time, directly co-operating with each other in the business in hand, or that their usual duties shall bring them into habitual consociation, so that they may exercise an influence upon each other promotive of proper caution. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kelly, 127 Ill. 637.

The following have been held to be fellow servants:

A brakeman working a switch for his train on one track in a railroad yard and the engine-man of another train of the same corporation upon an adjacent track. Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478 (27 L. ed. 1008); Wolcott v. Studebaker, 34 Fed. Rep. 11.

A conductor and a brakeman. Pease v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 61 Wis. 163; Wolcott v. Studebaker, 34 Fed. Rep. 13.

An inspector of cars and a brakeman (Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258), and a station agent and a brakeman. Dealey v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 3 Cent. Rep. 112.

A fireman on a passenger train, and an engineer in charge of an engine not connected with such train, but belonging to the same railroad company, are fellow servants. Howard v. Denver & N. G. R. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 837; Wolcott v. Studebaker, 34 Fed. Rep. 12.

So a track repairer and an engineer are fellow servants. Van Wickie v. Manhattan R. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 273.

But a track-walker over a section of a railroad is not a fellow servant with those in charge of a train by which he is struck and killed. Sullivan v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 97 Mo. 113.

An engineer in charge of the train of a railroad company is the superior—not the fellow servant—of a brakeman on the same train acting under his orders. East Tennessee & W. N. C. R. Co. v. Collins, 35 Tenn. 227; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Moore, 33 Ky. 675.

So the conductor and engineer of a "wild train" are not fellow servants of a laborer on a gravel train, who is injured by a collision due to their negligence. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. O'Brien (W. T.) 31 Pac. Rep. 32.

and Samuel Maitland as engineer, and George Hunn as fireman, left Bay City, going south, with orders to run wild to Rives Junction, over the Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw Railroad, leased and operated by the defendant Company. On the same morning engine No. 177, without any train, was proceeding north over the same road, under the charge of Nilson Napier as conductor, Robert Mills, engineer, and Thomas Looney, fireman. Both engines were run under orders by telegraph from one Kilmer, a train dispatcher of Bay City. It was the duty of Kilmer, as train dispatcher, to establish a meeting point for these two engines, under a rule adopted by the defendant Company which reads as follows: "Rule 138. When an order is given by telegraph for two or more trains to meet at a station, the train dispatcher must first order the green signal displayed at such meeting point by the operator, and receive assurance from him that the signal has been displayed before giving orders to either train. In ordering one train to be held for another, the dispatcher will order each train held for the other." Kilmer established such a meeting point at Saginaw City, and notified engine 120 of that fact, but neglected to notify engine No. 177, and gave no order to hold this engine at that point. Napier, the conductor of No. 177, reached Saginaw City, and saw the green signal, and found the order there to hold W. D. Loomis, conductor of No. 120, but no order

Where plaintiff, while in the exercise of care in performing his duties in removing a wrecked car, was injured through negligence of a direct representative of the railroad company which employed him, he may recover compensation. Sheldon, J., dissents. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Hawk, 10 West. Rep. 187, 121 Ill. 259.

Whenever a master delegates to another the performance of a duty to a servant which rests upon himself absolutely, he is liable for the manner in for himself. He received his clearance, and proceeded north three or four miles, and met engine No. 120 upon a curve at about 8 degrees and 20 minutes. The respective engines were running at from ten to twelve miles an hour. The collision resulted fatally to Hunn. At the time a thick fog was prevailing, the night was dark, and the view at the curve was obstructed by houses and other objects, which prevented the approaching engines from being seen from each other a distance of from three to four car-lengths. The accident occurred within the limits of the Saginaw yards. The time-card rule, which was well known to all employees of the Company, required "that trains will run carefully, and under full control, through all yards, and irregular trains must keep sharp lookout for switching engines."

The plaintiff recovered a judgment in the court below, and the defendant asks its reversal upon several grounds, the principal of which are the following: "(1) The declaration was insufficient, in not setting forth with more particularity the duty of the defendant, the breach of duty which caused the accident, and the cause of the accident. (2) The only negligence proved upon the trial was that of the train dispatcher, and no recovery can be had, for the reason that his negligence was that of a fellow servant. (3) The testimony relative to damages, and the charge of the court in reference thereto, were erroneous."

The declaration was not demurred to. It states a cause of action, and is sufficient after verdict.

The second ground above stated, if sustained, prevents a recovery in the action, and raises the most important point in the case. The court long ago announced and has steadily adhered to the doctrine that a master is not liable to a servant for injuries received through the negligence of a fellow servant while engaged in a common employment. Mich. Cent. R. Co. v. Leahy, 10 Mich. 193; Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 20 Mich. 105; Mich. Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510; Mich. Cent. R. Co. v. Austin, 40 Mich. 247; *Quincy Mining Co. v. low servants where the master has exercised due care in the selection of competent employes, and has become pretty generally recognized by the courts of last resort in this country. But the question of who are fellow servants still perplexes the judicial mind, and gives rise to a great diversity of opinion. Some courts go so far as to hold that, if the master exercises due care in selecting employes, his full duty towards his servants is discharged, even though he selects one or more agents to represent him in overseeing, he controlling and carrying on the business, however large and extended it may be, if he retains the right of employing and discharging his servants. Others hold that so long as they are employed and paid by the same master, and are engaged in a common enterprise, they are fellow servants. But this is the extreme, and denies substantially all liability of the master in a vast majority of cases where enterprises of any considerable magnitude are carried on. Perhaps no satisfactory rule has yet been formulated by which it may in all cases be determined who are fellow servants, in such sense as to shield the master from the negligence of his servant. We may start, however, where the rule is clear that a master is liable to his servant for an injury caused by his own negligence. The master may not choose to give his personal attention to his business, and may desire to put another in his place, to manage and control it for him as fully as he might do if personally present. Such person is his alter ego, and the master is as responsible for his acts of omission and commission, while engaged in the business intrusted to him, as if he did such acts himself. It is the duty of the master to supervise, direct and control the operations and management of his business, so that no injury shall ensue to his employes through his own carelessness or negligence in carrying it on, or else to furnish some person who will do so, and for whom he must stand sponsor. This is true of natural persons, and it is especially true of corporations, who can only act through natural persons. Whenever the business conducted by the person selected by the master is such that the person selected is invested with full control (subject to no one's supervision except the master's) over the action of the employes engaged in carrying on a particular branch of the master's business, and, acting upon his own discretion, according to general instructions laid down for his guidance, it is his province to direct, and the duty of the employes to obey, then he stands in the place of the master, and is not a fellow servant with those whom he controls.

In Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 39, this court said: "This duty of due care in the employment and retention of competent servants is one the master cannot relieve himself of by any delegation, and, if it becomes necessary to intrust its performance to a general manager, foreman or superintendent, such officer, whatever he may be called, must stand in the place of his principal, and the latter must assume the risks of his negligence. The same is true of the general supervision of his business. If there is negligence in this, the master is responsible for it, whether the supervision be by the master in person, or by some manager, superintendent or foreman to whom he delegates it. In other words, while the servant assumes the risk of the negligence of fellow servants, he does not assume the risk of negligence in the master himself, or in anyone to whom the master may see fit to intrust his superintending authority."

It was upon this principle that in Ryan v. Bagaley, 50 Mich. 179, this court held the owner of a mine liable for the negligence of the mining captain. The question was made to turn upon whether the mining captain was intrusted with the management of the mine without interference. If he was, in respect to legal responsibility his negligence was the negligence of the defendant.

It now becomes pertinent to inquire what the duties of Kilmer, the train dispatcher, whose negligence caused the death of the fireman, Hunn, were. The division superintendent's name was W. A. Vaughn. In receiving dispatches from the train dispatcher, the conductors and engineers never act upon them unless signed with the initials "W. A. V." Dispatches delivered by the operator so authenticated were considered authoritative, and were acted upon. Mr. Hair was the chief train dispatcher at Bay City, and he had six train dispatchers under his supervision in the Bay City office, only one of whom, however, was on duty at a time. He testified that the train dispatchers signed the initials "W. A. V." to their dispatches, and were authorized to do so, and that the division superintendent, Mr. Vaughn, never sees them at all, and knows nothing about them, and does not even know the instructions in regard to train dispatchers. He was asked:

Q. Who has the control of trains on the Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw division, or who did have at the time of this accident?

A. Mr. Kilmer, in regard to moving them backwards and forwards; the entire charge at that time; nobody else has any right to interfere.

He further testified that no more than one person has control of the trains at any one time, and no other train dispatchers would have the right to interfere, not even the division superintendent, or the superintendent, or the president of the Company, unless they wanted to relieve the train dispatchers themselves. If they wanted to take his program, and sign it, by these orders they could do so; they have the authority. They would have to receipt for it, and take upon themselves the duties.

Rule 124 of the Company reads as follows: "The general and assistant superintendent, the division superintendent and the train dispatchers on duty are the only persons authorized to move trains by special order, and but one person on the same circuit shall be permitted to move trains by special order at the same time."

Rule 127 is as follows: "The train dispatcher on duty will have full power to run any train or engine by telegram that he may think proper. No irregular train or engine will be allowed to run upon the road, either upon a single or double track, without his knowledge and instructions, unless they can follow a regular train under a red flag, and then only to a station where they can obtain an order," etc.

Mr. Vaughn, the division superintendent over the division of defendant's road, testified as follows:

Q. Do you do the dispatching or giving of orders for the running of trains upon the road?

A. I don't.

Q. In the system of doing business upon your road, what persons—I do not refer to their names—but what persons have charge in telegraph management of trains—had at that time?

A. The train dispatcher.

Q. When a train dispatcher is engaged in the duty of dispatching trains upon the line, what other persons have rights or powers there, so far as interfering?

A. No other.

It is thus seen that the train dispatcher has absolute control over the division of the road from Rives Junction to Mackinaw, so far as the running and operating trains thereon is concerned. It is his province to direct, and it is the duty of all employees operating trains to obey. This is the most important branch of the railroad service, and is the highest exercise of the franchise conferred upon railroad corporations. It is the corporation who does it, through the train dispatcher. This officer, by Rule 124 above quoted, is ranked with the general, the assistant and the division superintendents, and by Rule 127 he is given supreme control. To say that such an official, exercising such control, is a fellow servant with those whom he directs, ignores all distinctions between master and servant. If his act is not the act of the master, then no railroad corporation ever ran and operated a railroad.

In Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 53 Conn. 285, there were two irregular trains, going in opposite directions, on the western division of defendant's road, which were run as directed by the telegram from the train dispatcher in the division superintendent's office at Hartford. He ordered the east-bound train to run to Waterbury until 6 o'clock. Soon after he was relieved, in the regular course of business, by an assistant, who, a little before 5 o'clock, sent an order to the west-bound train at Waterbury to run to Brewster's. In obeying this order the trains collided, and the plaintiff was injured. The negligence of the train dispatcher was admitted, but it was claimed by the defendant that such negligence was the negligence of a fellow servant. In deciding this question, the court said: "It is immaterial that these men are hired and paid by a common employer, and that their employment is designed to accomplish one common result. That argument, if pressed to its logical conclusion, would obliterate all distinctions among those engaged in railroad business, from the president down to the humblest servant, and would practically exempt the company from all duty and all liability to those in its service." And the court further said: "Cases are constantly arising, especially in the operation of railroads, which no general rule can provide for, in which the master must be regarded as constructively present, and in which someone must be invested with a discretion and a right to speak and command in his name and by his authority. Such a right carries with it the corresponding duty of obedience—someone must hear and obey. . . . It must also devise some suitable and safe method by which to run special and irregular trains, and regular trains when off their regular time. . . . Emergencies will arise which no system of rules can anticipate and provide for, in which the company must act, and act promptly and efficiently. In this case the scheme devised was to have these trains controlled by one who knew the position and movement of every train on the road liable to be affected by them—a train dispatcher acting in the name and by the authority of the superintendent. Is there not a wide and manifest difference between the duty of such an agent and the duty of a locomotive engineer? The duty of the former pertains to management and direction; that of the latter to obedience."

The case of Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co., 92 Mo. 359, 8 West. Rep. 729, was very similar to the one under consideration, and the Supreme Court of Missouri held, after a consideration of authorities, that this railroad company was liable for the negligence of its train dispatcher which resulted in the death of one of the servants of the company.

The following cases are to the same effect: Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 382; Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 38; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Henderson, 87 Ohio St. 552; Washburn v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 3 Head, 638; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McLallen, 84 Ill. 109; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Dwyer, 36 Kan. 58; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 113 U. S. 377 [28 L. ed. 787]; Phillips v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Wis. 475; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Kanaley, 89 Kan. 1; McKune v. California Southern R. Co. 66 Cal. 302, 21 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 539; Gravelle v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 711; Gilmore v. Northern P. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 866; State v. Malster, 57 Md. 287; Murphy v. Smith, 19 C. B. N. S. 361; Malone v. Hathaway, 64 N. Y. 5; Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. State, 44 Md. 283; Fluke v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 549; Dobbin v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 81 N. C. 446; Covles v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 84 N. C. 309; Douling v. Allen, 74 Mo. 13; Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61.

In holding that the train dispatcher is not a fellow servant with the fireman, I do not consider that I run counter to the doctrine, so often recognized by this and other courts, in relation to fellow servants, in which, broadly stated, it is said: "It is sufficient if they are in the employment of the same master, engaged in the same common work, and performing duties and services for the same general purposes. The rule is the same, though the one injured may be inferior in grade, and is subject to the control and direction of the superior whose act caused the injury, provided they are both co-operating to effect the same common object." This cannot be applied when the superior causing the injury represents the master, and it is always a subject of inquiry to ascertain the nature and extent of the authority of the superior whose negligence caused the injury. If his authority and duties are such as the master must necessarily, either personally or by another, exercise and discharge, then the above rule does not apply.

There are some authorities which hold that a train dispatcher, and those operating trains under his control, are fellow servants. It seems to me, however, that those authorities do not give sufficient prominence to the position which the train dispatcher occupies in operating a railroad. He is the corporation for the time being, and exercises powers which neither the superintendent, nor the president, nor any other officer or agent of the corporation, can interfere with.

The defendant requested a charge to the effect that, although the jury might find the defendant guilty of negligence, yet if the fellow servant of deceased contributed to produce his death the plaintiff could not recover. This request was rightly refused. The correct rule, and the reason for it, is stated in Paulmier v. Erie R. Co., 84 N. J. L. 151, as follows: "The servant does not agree to take the chance of any negligence on the part of his employer, and no case has gone so far as to hold that where such negligence contributes to the injury the servant may not recover. It would be both unjust and impolitic to suffer the master to evade the penalty for his misconduct in neglecting to provide properly for the security of his servant. Contributory negligence, to defeat a right of action, must be that of the party injured." Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Oummings, 106 U. S. 700 [27 L. ed. 266]; Keegan v. Western R. Corp. 8 N. Y. 175; Chicago & N.W. R. Co. v. Sweet, 45 Ill. 197; 2 Thomp. Neg. 981; Perry v. Lansing, 17 Hun, 84; Busch v. Buffalo Creek R. Co. 29 Hun, 112; Gray v. Philadelphia R. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 168.

The second count of the declaration was based upon the negligence of defendant in employing an incompetent train despatcher, and quite an amount of testimony was introduced in the case in the effort to prove that fact. But this count, upon an intimation of the court, was practically abandoned. The defendant insists that the testimony introduced under that count remained in the case, and was prejudicial to it. We do not see anything in the testimony upon this branch of the case that could have possibly prejudiced the jury. The testimony introduced tended to show the capability of Kilmer, and the care and caution exercised by defendant in selecting him for the position. Its tendency was favorable to the defendant.

Under defendant's claim of contributory negligence of a fellow servant's running the trains, in violation of the rules of the Company as to speed, testimony was admitted by the court tending to show that a strict compliance with the rules was impracticable, and that they were lived up to as nearly as they could be, and the trains run on the time allowed by the schedule prepared by the Company. We think it was competent to show what was usually and habitually done in the running of trains, because, if the Company permitted or had so framed the rules as to require the employes to exercise some discretion in the matter of strict obedience, it ought not to be permitted to hold its employes to the very letter of the rule in order to shield the Company from liability for what it had tacitly permitted. But the admission of such testimony could not harm defendant, if it was the Company's negligence that was the proximate cause of the injury, although a con-curring cause was the negligence of a fellow servant in running at a greater rate of speed than the rules allowed. The court gave full effect to the rules in his charge to the jury, so far as they were material, by instructing the jury that "if you find, as a matter of fact, that the collision resulted entirely from the negligence of one or both of the engineers of engines No. 120 and 177, the defendant is not chargeable with the consequence of that negligence."

There was testimony introduced tending to show that the deceased was earning $900 a year at the time of his death, and was twenty-seven years of age. A witness was then introduced, and he was permitted to testify that he had made a computation of the present value of an annuity based upon the expectancy of life of a man of the age of twenty-seven years on an income of $900, and that its present value was $10,725.80. The court also, against defendant's objections, permitted the mortality tables found in § 4245, How. Stat., to be admitted in evidence, and the Northampton tables for showing the present value of a dower interest or of an annuity, found upon page 142 of Cheever's Probate Law. Mrs. Hunn also testified that her husband's earnings were her only means of support; that he owned a place at the time worth about $2,000. She was also permitted to testify, against defendant's objections, that there was an incumbrance upon the place of $1,100 or $1,200. There was also considerable testimony introduced as to his physical health, and as to his being afflicted with varicose veins, and varicose tumors, and how such disease would impair his health, or affect the probable duration of his life. Upon the question of damages the court, among other things, instructed the jury as follows: "Now, in estimating her pecuniary loss, you should consider the personal character of her deceased husband, as shown by the evidence; his mental and physical capacity; his habits as to industry, economy or otherwise; his health,—whether at the time of his death he was afflicted with any disease, or physical infirmity, as varicose veins, which would be likely to reduce his earning power in the future, or shorten his life; consider his capacity, disposition to earn money, as shown by the evidence; the salary he was then earning, and the amount, whether greater or less, which, under the testimony, you think he would, with reasonable probability, be likely to earn in the future; the probable length of time he would continue to live and earn money, and furnish his wife with support, or other pecuniary advantages; and for this purpose you may consider the evidence of the mortuary tables, or expectancy of life, given you from the Statute by Mr. Birney, considering, in the same connection, how much that natural expectancy for the life of a man might be reduced by the circumstances of his physical infirmity of varicose veins, as shown by the evidence. But you must not consider Mr. Birney's computation, based upon the annuity tables, of how much money it would take to purchase an annuity, as testified to by him. That evidence I understand to have been withdrawn from your consideration. At all events, gentlemen, you will give it no weight in determining your verdict. These, and all other facts, conditions and circumstances appear in the evidence, which tend to throw light upon or aid you in reaching a fair and just conclusion as to the amount of her pecuniary loss, you may and should consider in making up your verdict. Now, the pecuniary benefits which Alice M. Hunn would, with reasonable probability, have realized by being his wife during the length of time that relation would have continued if he had lived she has lost by his death; and these benefits, fairly and justly estimated by you with reference to their pecuniary value, under all the evidence in the case and the instructions I have given you, will furnish the measure of her pecuniary injury in this case. The question is not what he might have earned or saved if he had lived, but it is what she, as his wife, would have realized if his death had not occurred from the collision."

The mortuary tables contained in Howell's Statutes were properly admitted in evidence, as some testimony tending to show Hunn's expectancy of life at the age of twenty-seven. Balch v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 67 Mich. 394, 11 West. Rep. 476.

Such tables are not conclusive. They show the probable age which a healthy person may expect to reach, whose age is given. But when that is before the jury, and the physical condition of the person at the time of his death, and all testimony which may reasonably affect his duration of life, the jury must determine from the testimony before them the probable duration of the decedent's life had he not died as a result of his injury. The testimony of Birney was properly excluded, and the jury told not to regard it. His figures showed the value of Hunn's life to be $10,725.80. The jury found the plaintiff's damages to be $7,500, and this sum the defendant's counsel insists is excessive.

Whether damages found by a jury are excessive or not does not present a question of law. If no improper testimony affecting the subject of damages has been admitted, and the court has given to the jury proper instructions to guide them in reaching a conclusion, the amount of the damages awarded is beyond the reach of a writ of error.

The court erred in admitting testimony showing the extent of their means, and the incumbence upon the land. When the question was objected to, the court said he would admit it as showing the extent of their means.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 214, Mr. Justice Cooley said: "What the family would lose by the death would be what it was accustomed to receive, or had reasonable expectation of receiving, in his lifetime; and to show that the family was poor has no tendency towards showing whether this was or was likely to be large or small. One man contributes liberally in aid of his poor relations, another delights in contributing luxuries where comforts are already abundant, but when the contribution is cut off in either case the extent of the loss is not measured by the wealth or poverty of the recipient, but by the contribution itself. A dollar lost, whether by a poor man or rich man, is neither more nor less than a dollar, and a reasonable expectation of benefit to a certain amount must, when lost, be compensated to the same extent, whether the loser be rich or poor."

We cannot say that this testimony did not influence the jury. It was admitted as having some bearing upon the measure of damages, and it must be presumed that it formed an element in the estimation of damages by the jury. The instruction to allow merely nominal damages, so far as the brother and sisters were concerned, was correct. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shannon, 48 Ill. 338; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Swett, 45 Ill. 205.

1. A mere suspicion that a woman walking on the street in the night is plying the vocation of a prostitute will not justify her arrest without a warrant, in the absence of any act on her part indicating that such is her purpose.
2. Being saucy to an officer, or daring him to arrest after he has threatened to arrest without warrant or any right to do so, will not justify him in making the arrest.
3. An officer is liable for assault and illegal arrest for arresting a woman without warrant on mere suspicion that she is plying the vocation of a prostitute.
4. Evidence of specific acts of lewdness is inadmissible in an action for false arrest as a prostitute.

(December 23, 1889.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for an alleged assault and illegal arrest. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Hampden Kelsey, for plaintiff, appellant:

The general reputation of plaintiff should not be established by witnesses from police headquarters, but should come from the vicinage.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 461.

Evidence of general conduct cannot be given.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 55; Patterson v. Garlock, 39 Mich. 447; Wilson v. Bowen, 7 West. Rep. 338, 64 Mich. 184.

Specific acts of misconduct on plaintiff's part at previous times would not make the defendant's act lawful.

Best, Ev. § 257.

Walking the streets in a lawful manner is no offense; therefore the plaintiff had done nothing which would justify the officer in arresting her without a warrant.

Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169; Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 576; Re Way, 41 Mich. 299; Ross v. Leggett, 61 Mich. 445.

If the plaintiff was conducting herself lawfully, then the defendant had no right to arrest her, and his act would be malicious and exemplary damages could be recovered.

Newman v. Stein, 75 Mich. 402.

Even if defendant had arrested plaintiff on belief that she had or was about to commit a felony, his belief could not be arbitrary, but must be founded on circumstances which would give probable cause for such belief.

People v. Burt, 51 Mich. 199.

Mr. James H. Kinnane for appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This action is brought by plaintiff to recover damages for assault and illegal arrest. Defendant, at the time of the arrest, was a policeman of the City of Kalamazoo, and claims to have arrested defendant because she was a street walker. It appears that plaintiff lived on Kalamazoo Avenue East, and some time in the fore part of August, 1883, went from her own home to a sister's, living on the corner of Church and Eleanor Streets, in the city. There she met a younger sister, and the two went down into the city upon the main street, called into the Watkins House closets, and after plaintiff had shown the younger sister, who had no acquaintances in the city, around the city for a time, the two went together back to the home of the sister, when plaintiff started to return to her own home, and in doing so she again passed the Watkins House, but on the opposite side of the street. After having gone some little distance from there towards her own home, she heard someone following her on the walk. She hastened her speed, but, when near the railroad crossing, Mr. Verberg, the defendant, walked up to her side, and asked where she was going. She told him she was not going very far, and then he wanted to know where she lived. To this plaintiff responded that she did not know as that made any difference to him. Defendant then asked what her name was. She told him that did not make any difference to him, and that she was attending to her own business. Defendant continued to walk with her until she got to her own door, and she then told him that she lived there. Plaintiff then told him he was not much of a gentleman to be following her home, when he said not to give him any more sauce, or he would take her and run her in.

Plaintiff then says: "I told him I had not done anything to be run in for; that I did not know what he could run me in for; I guessed I had not done anything out of the way; and so he took hold of me, and took me up town. When he got up to the corner of Water Street, I told him I was not going any further with him, and he got hold of me, and tore my dress pretty nearly all off of me, and tried to make me walk, and blew a whistle, and Mr. Warren, who was across the street, came over, and asked him what he arrested me for, and he said he had made up his mind that he would not take any more of my sauce, and when they got upon the corner they stopped there, and Mr. Warren told him he knew me; that I was a married lady. They went out to one side, and had a talk, and Mr. Warren said: 'You can do as you have a mind to; but I don't think you had better lock her up.' Mr. Warren walked down Main Street, and Mr. Verberg said I could go home if I wanted to; but, if he ever caught me out again as late as that, he would take me and lock me up. It was then about half past ten o'clock, and I went home."

Witness further stated that defendant took hold of her arm at and in front of her own house, and pulled her along as far as the railroad, and as far as Water Street, when he tore her clothes because she would go no further. Defendant gave his version of the affair, on his direct examination by his own counsel, as follows: "I saw her on this particular night by the Watkins House with three other women, and they all went into the house. I slipped into the office of the Watkins House. They stayed in there a few minutes, and came out, and went up as far as Rose Street. They crossed over, and she came down the street alone. She went west on Kalamazoo Avenue. I walked down that way to see what was going to be done. I believed she was plying her vocation as a prostitute. She walked quite fast. I walked down to the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad, caught up to her, and asked where she lived, and what her name was. She said it was none of my business. I said: 'I have asked you a civil question, and I would like to have you answer it.' She said: 'I don't have to answer any question from you.' I said: 'Well, I have had orders to that effect, to make these street walkers get off the street or lock them up.' By this time she had got in front of her own house. I didn't know at that time that she lived there. She said: 'I dare you to arrest me.' She said I had no business down there. I had no business to follow her. She was attending to her own business, and I had to attend to mine. She dared me to lock her up; to arrest her. At first I started away. She halloed after me: 'Will dare you to arrest.' I came back and said: 'Come on, if you want to go to jail. I can take you there.' So we walked up as far as Dickinson's hardware store, and she stopped, and I says: 'Come on; don't stop here.' She walked along then; and right in front of the restaurant, between the alley and back of McDonald's drug store, she threw herself right down on the sidewalk, and I asked her to get up two or three times. She refused to do it. I thought by the way she acted she had been drinking. I didn't see anyone around close by. I didn't want to have no regular wrestle there, so I blew my whistle, and Mr. Warren came up, and assisted me in getting her up. When we got her up to the corner of Main and Rose Streets, she said, if we would not lock her up, she would go home, and she awfully hated to be locked up,—begged in that way. I spoke to Mr. Warren a few minutes, and finally told her, if she would go home, I would let her go to-night, and, if I caught her out again, I would lock her up, as late as that."

Witness further testified that he did not know that he tore any of her clothing.

It will be noticed that there is but little difference in the version given by the parties to the controversy as to what took place on that occasion.

The court, in its charge to the jury, stated: "The defendant claims that he had a right to arrest the plaintiff because he was at the time of making the arrest a policeman of the City of Kalamazoo, and that at the time of the arrest the plaintiff was engaged in the commission of an offense against the law. The charter and ordinance of the City of Kalamazoo provide that policemen shall have authority to arrest, without warrant, all persons who shall, in their presence, be guilty of any offense, misdemeanor or breach of the peace, or who shall, in their presence, be guilty of any disorderly conduct, for punishment of which a warrant could lawfully issue. Disorderly conduct for which an arrest might be made without a warrant, if committed in the presence of the officer, would include what is commonly termed 'street walking.' That is the offense of a common prostitute offering herself for sale upon the streets at unusual or unreasonable hours, endeavoring to induce men to follow her for the purpose of prostitution; and, in case such an offense is committed in the presence of an officer, a policeman has not only the authority, but it is also made his duty, to arrest the person so offending. So, in order to determine whether the defendant had the right to make the arrest complained of in this case it will be necessary for you to inquire and determine whether the plaintiff was at the time of the arrest engaged in the commission of any offense, or whether the defendant had any reasonable ground for believing she was. If you should find that at the time she was arrested by defendant she was conducting herself in an orderly manner, not committing any breach of the peace, or disorderly conduct or offense against the law, and that the defendant had no reason to believe she was, then the defendant had no right or authority to arrest her, and the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict; and in such case it makes no difference what her past history may have been, nor what her character was, so far as any justification of the defendant was concerned. But if you find, from the evidence in the case, that at the time of the arrest the plaintiff was a woman of unchaste character, and was upon the street engaged in street walking,—that is, if she was upon the street for the purpose of attracting attention and inducing men to follow her for purposes of prostitution,—then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, unless you find that defendant used unnecessary force and violence in making the arrest. Or if you find, from the evidence, that the plaintiff was at the time of her arrest by the defendant an unchaste woman, and known by the defendant to be so; and if you also find that she had at that time the reputation of being a common prostitute, whether that reputation was deserved or undeserved, and that this reputation was known to defendant; and if you further find that she was at that time upon the public street, at such an hour and under such circumstances; if her conduct was such that the defendant had reason to believe that she was engaged in street walking,—then, whether she was so engaged in street walking or not, the defendant would be justified in making the arrest, and, unless you find that he used unnecessary force and violence in making the arrest, your verdict should be for the defendant. The question, as I have already indicated to you, is not altogether whether the plaintiff was already engaged in street walking, but whether the defendant had reasonable ground to believe she was, and made the arrest upon such ground. If he had reasonable ground to believe that she was engaged in street walking, and made the arrest on such ground, then defendant would not be liable, although, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff was in the streets for a legal purpose."

In order to better understand the force and effect of this charge, it will be necessary to consider the evidence to some extent that the court permitted the defendant to introduce. While the plaintiff was on the stand as a witness in her direct case, the counsel for the defendant was permitted, under objection of plaintiff's counsel, to ask her: "Your husband had you arrested the other day for assault and battery?" It appears that this arrest was made after the time the assault was claimed to have been made in the present case, and the witness testified that she had never been arrested in her life, until the time when the defendant arrested her. In answer to the question propounded, she stated that her husband did cause her arrest for assault and battery. Witness was further asked if, upon one occasion, Officers Warren and Verberg did not call upon her one night, and find her in bed with one Charles Vose. Plaintiff denied this, and claimed that she had a room there, and worked for Charles Vose, and his father and mother, in their restaurant.

It appears that, several years before this arrest, plaintiff's husband had been arrested, and convicted and sent to state prison for some offense, but had recently returned. The plaintiff and he were then living together. The defendant, while on the stand as a witness, was permitted to testify that about a year previous he and another policeman visited the Gale Block, in which was the Vose restaurant, and there knocked on the door; that Mr. Vose came to the door, and, being asked who was in there with him, answered that it was his wife; that he had also seen the plaintiff a great many times on the street at from 10 to 12 o'clock, and that she did not seem to be doing any business, but just walking the street.

Plaintiff was recalled by the defense, and testified that she was never put out of the Gale Block in consequence of living with Mr. Vose; that he did not live there with her; that he had a room there, and she had a room, and a good many others had rooms there; that Mr. Miller, the janitor of the building, never told her to move out in consequence of the manner in which she conducted herself.

Mr. Miller was then called by the defendant, and testified that plaintiff had rooms there; that he served papers to get Vose out, but was not acquainted with the reputation of the plaintiff at that time; that he saw a man in there one night, but could not see if there was anything wrong; that it might have been Mr. Vose, as he told him they were going to be married in about a week. Witness testified that he saw men go into the big hall door, but could not say whether the room where they went was occupied by her.

Mr. Warren was also called, and testified to seeing plaintiff in bed with Vose. Other testimony of like character was also given by defendant, under objection of counsel for the plaintiff. Defendant also gave evidence of the general reputation of the plaintiff as a common prostitute. Plaintiff denied all the specific acts of lewdness to prove which such witnesses were called.

At the close of the testimony the counsel for plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury: "(1) If the jury shall find that the plaintiff, at the time she was arrested by the defendant, was conducting herself in an orderly manner, and not committing any breach of the peace, then the defendant had no right or authority to arrest her. (2) No officer is justified in making an arrest without a warrant, when the person whom he arrests is peaceable, and not engaged in open violence; as, for example, by fighting, engaging in a riot, or about to escape after committing a felony. (3) The law does not look with favor on arrests made without a warrant, and an arrest without a warrant cannot be justified if the person arrested was not engaged in a breach of the peace; as, for an example, in fighting, or in a riot, or about to escape after having committed a felony. (4) If the jury shall find that the plaintiff was, at the time she was arrested, walking on the street, without molesting anyone, then she was not committing any act that would justify the defendant in arresting her without a warrant, and his act in arresting her was unjustifiable, and the burden is on him to justify the act. (5) If the jury shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff, at the time of her arrest, was walking on the street in a lawful manner, then the jury would be warranted in going beyond actual damages, and giving the plaintiff a further sum as exemplary damages."

These instructions the court refused.

It is insisted here that the arrest was legal, and within the authority of the officer, under the provisions of section 8 of chapter 14 of the charter of the City of Kalamazoo. This section is as follows:

"Sec. 8. The marshal and police shall have and exercise, within said city, all the power given by law to constables for the preservation of the peace, and to apprehend and arrest offenders against the laws of the State. They shall have the power to enter any disorderly or gaming house, or dwelling-house, or any other building where a felon is known to be secreted or harbored, or where any person is who has committed any breach of the peace, or where any felony or breach of the peace has been committed. It shall be the duty of the said marshal and police, and they are hereby fully authorized, to suppress all riots, disturbances and breaches of the peace; to arrest, upon view, all persons fleeing from justice; to apprehend, upon view, any person found in the act of committing any offense against the laws of the State; and to take such persons before the proper officer or magistrate, to be dealt with according to law; to make complaints before the proper officer or magistrate of any person known, or believed by them, to be guilty of crime, or having violated any ordinance or regulation of said city; and to serve all process, writs and warrants that may be delivered to them for that purpose, or that may be required in any prosecution for the violation of any ordinance or regulation of said city. In prosecutions under any city ordinance or regulation of said city, the marshal and regular police thereof shall have the same powers, and shall perform the same duties, as are given to and performed by constables under the laws of the State; and, generally, they shall perform all such duties pertaining to their respective offices as may be required by the city council."

It is claimed further, by counsel for defendant, that the question whether the plaintiff was at the time of the arrest engaged in street walking or not, or whether the defendant had reasonable grounds to suppose that she was, was a question for the jury, and, as such, was properly submitted to them. That it appears from the record the officer well knew the reputation of the appellant, and that she was a common prostitute; and judging from her actions, the unseasonable time of the night and the suspicious quarter of the city, it cannot be said the officer acted arbitrarily or without good and reasonable grounds for assuming and believing that the appellant was then and there on the public streets plying her vocation as a common prostitute.

Counsel state, as a further proposition, "that, assuming it to have been true that the defendant acted upon an uncertainty, but had good and reasonable cause to believe that the plaintiff was conducting herself unlawfully and in a disorderly manner, and did so believe, he would still be justified in making the arrest in the manner that he did."

It is not claimed that the defendant had a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff at the time he took her into custody, and started to convey her to the jail; and it appears that no warrant had ever been issued for the plaintiff's arrest for that or any other offense. From the whole record, it appears that the only excuse offered by the defendant for the arrest on that night was that he had heard her reputation as a common prostitute discussed by the police officers of the city, and some others; had made up his mind that she was such, and had seen her frequently on the streets, sometimes at unseasonable hours, and at one time found her in bed with a Mr. Vose. This is about the substance of the reasons given by him which led him on that night to believe she was on the street playing her vocation as a common prostitute. All he had seen that night was that the plaintiff was down on Main Street, went into the Watkins House with three other women, and from there up the street for a distance, and, turning, walked towards her own home. He does not testify nor claim that he saw her talking with any man, or that she accosted any man, or did anything more than walk along a public street towards her own home, as any decent or well-behaved lady might have done. She was even hurrying forward faster when she heard the defendant's footsteps rapidly approaching her as if to overtake her. When he had overtaken her, he asked her name and where she lived, and kept pace with her until she had arrived opposite her own door. He was not successful in finding out her name, and claims the plaintiff told him it was none of his business. He started and walked away from her for a little distance, according to his own testimony, when she told him, or halloed at him, as he says, and dared him to arrest her, when he turned, and said, "If you want to go to jail, I can take you there." He then made the arrest. Can anything be more certain even from the defendant's own testimony, than that the arrest was made because, as plaintiff says, she gave him some sauce, or as defendant says, she dared him to arrest her? He knew as well when he started to leave her, whether she was on the street plying her vocation as a common prostitute, as he did when he made the arrest; and yet he turned away to leave, and only made the arrest when she dared him to make it.

If persons can be restrained of their liberty, and assaulted and imprisoned, under such circumstances, without complaint or warrant, then there is no limit to the power of a police officer. Personal liberty, which is guaranteed to every citizen under our Constitution and laws, consists of the right of locomotion,—to go where one pleases, and when, and to do that which may lead to one's business or pleasure, only so far restrained as the rights of others may make it necessary for the welfare of all other citizens. One may travel along the public highways or in public places; and while conducting themselves in a decent and orderly manner, disturbing no other, and interfering with the rights of no other citizens there they will be protected under the law, not only in their persons, but in their safe conduct. The Constitution and the laws are framed for the public good, and the protection of all citizens, from the highest to the lowest; and no one may be restrained of his liberty, unless he has transgressed some law. Any law which would place the keeping and safe conduct of another in the hands of even the conservator of the peace, unless for some breach of the peace committed in his presence, or upon suspicion of felony, would be most oppressive and unjust, and destroy all the rights which our Constitution guarantees. These are rights which existed long before our Constitution, and we have taken just pride in their maintenance, making them a part of the fundamental law of the land. Whatever the charter and ordinances of the City of Kalamazoo may provide, no police officer or other conservator of the peace can constitutionally be clothed with such power as was attempted to be exercised here. No disorderly conduct; no breach of the peace, committed in presence of the officer; no suspicion of felony,—and yet under the charge of the court which counsel seek to maintain here, a woman may, simply upon suspicion that she may commit an act which at most would only amount to a misdemeanor, be assaulted and imprisoned, if the officer has good reason to believe, and does believe, that she is plying her vocation in such a manner that it will result in an offense. No more dangerous doctrine could be laid down. It is a doctrine which, if upheld, would place even the most respectable lady in the land under the surveillance of policemen, and give them authority to arrest and imprison upon mere suspicion of an offense, however insignificant; and, if carried to the extent contained in the charge of the circuit judge, it would not matter how undeserved the bad character or reputation of such person might be. If idle gossip is once set afloat, reflecting upon the character and reputation of the most virtuous woman, and that gossip once comes to the ears of the police officer, he may act upon it, and be led to believe that the woman is upon the street intending to ply her vocation as a street walker or common prostitute, and at once, without the formality of complaint or warrant, place her under arrest and convey her to jail. The law has more regard for the liberty of the citizen, and there is a more decent and orderly manner of enforcing the law for the public good. The officer had no right to arrest the plaintiff without warrant upon mere suspicion that she was upon the street for the purpose of plying her vocation as a common prostitute, even under the provisions of the city ordinance above cited. Our Statute gives no such right, and at the common law no such right existed. Suspicion that a party has on a former occasion committed a misdemeanor is no justification for giving him in charge of a constable without a justice's warrant; and there is no distinction in this respect, between one kind of misdemeanor and another. 1 Archb. Crim. Pr. and Pl. p. 103, note 1; 2 Hale, P. C. 89.

An arrest for misdemeanor, without a warrant, by one who does not see the offense committed, is illegal.

In People v. Pratt, 22 Hun, 300, it was held that an officer had no authority to arrest, without warrant, a common prostitute, unless disorderly conduct is committed in his presence. It is true that an officer, as a conservator of the peace, may arrest street walkers or common prostitutes who are on the street plying their vocation; but a mere suspicion that they are doing so, where there is no act indicating that the party is there for that purpose, will not justify the arrest without warrant.

In Re Wuy, 41 Mich. 304, Mr. Justice Campbell, speaking upon the subject of arrest without warrant, says: "It must not be forgotten that there can be no arrest without due process of law. An arrest without warrant has never been lawful, except in those cases where the public security requires it, and this has only been recognized in felony, and in breaches of the peace committed in presence of the officer. Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 576, and Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169."

The court was in error in that portion of its charge relative to the defendant's acting upon his information and belief that the plaintiff was a common prostitute, as a justification for the arrest without warrant. The court was also in error in refusing to give the plaintiff's requests to charge. Each request stated the law correctly as applied to this case, and should have been given. The court was also in error in permitting defendant to introduce evidence of specific acts of lewdness on the part of plaintiff. On such a trial, it could not be expected that a party so attacked could be prepared to meet every issue so made.

The judgment must be set aside, with costs, and a new trial ordered.

v.

George GARTNER, Circuit Judge, Resp't.

(.....Mich. ....)

1. An action on contract is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the State in which was the place of performance, although the parties are residents of other States.
2. Consent of the parties is sufficient to give jurisdiction over them to a court which has jurisdiction of the subject matter.

3. Filing a declaration on the part of the plaintiff, and appearance and pleading on the part of defendants, is a sufficient waiver of process, although the parties are nonresidents.
4. The right of citizens of other States to bring suit in a state court where a citizen of that State may, is guaranteed and protected by U. S. Const., art. 4, § 2.
5. A court has no discretion to refuse to hear a case between nonresidents of which it has jurisdiction, merely because the suit is brought there only for convenience of parties and attorneys, and will entail expense upon the county.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent, as Circuit Judge for Wayne County, to entertain a suit growing out of a contract to be performed in another part of the State, between parties all of whom are nonresidents of the State, defendants having appeared by attorney without service of process. Writ granted.

The facts are fully stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Ashley Pond, W. L. Carpenter and John Atkinson, for relators:

The Circuit Court for the County of Wayne has jurisdiction of the subject matter of actions of assumpsit upon agreements which must be performed, if performed at all, within the State, but elsewhere than in the County of Wayne.

Thompson v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. 52 Mich. 522; Atkins v. Borstler, 46 Mich. 552.

Its jurisdiction in that regard does not depend upon whether or not any of the parties to the agreement in question, or to the action, are residents of the State.

It is not essential to give jurisdiction of the subject matter of a particular action, of the kind in question, that the defendant should be actually found and served with process within said State and county; the voluntary appearance of such defendants will suffice to give such jurisdiction.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 7th day of December, 1889, the relators commenced suit in the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne by filing a declaration against Walston H. Brown, Columbus R. Cummings, Samuel Thomas and William B. Howard. On December 16, 1889, defendants appeared in said cause by their attorneys, and demanded a bill of particulars, which was furnished on the same day. The defendants also pleaded the general issue, with notice of recoupment, of which they furnished a bill of particulars. After the cause was at issue it was regularly noticed for trial by the plaintiffs' attorneys, and placed upon the docket for trial by jury at the January Term of said court. On December 23, 1889, the defendants filed an affidavit in support of a motion for a struck jury, which came on to be heard on the 7th day of January, 1890, before Hon. George Gardner, Circuit Judge for the County of Wayne. The plaintiff opposed the motion, and filed an affidavit in opposition thereto. The motion was submitted to the court, and without deciding it the said circuit judge on the 13th day of January, 1890, of his own motion made an order striking the case from the docket on the ground that all the parties to the suit were nonresidents; a copy of which order is as follows: "[Title of court and cause.] The application for a struck jury heretofore made in this cause having been duly considered, it satisfactorily appearing to the court that the parties to this action are nonresidents, and that the cause of action and the subject matter thereof arose in the upper peninsula of this State, it is ordered that said cause be, and it hereby is, stricken from the docket."

The plaintiffs are both residents of the State of Pennsylvania. Three of the defendants are residents of New York; one, of Illinois.

The controversy respecting which suit is brought arises under a contract for building a railroad in this State in the upper peninsula. Early in the year 1888 the plaintiffs commenced suit by attachment in the County of Marquette, but, for reasons stated in the petition for a mandamus, that suit was discontinued, and this commenced by mutual understanding, on the agreement of the parties. The relators pray that a writ of mandamus issue to said circuit judge, directing him to vacate the above order striking the case from the docket. In showing cause why the mandamus should not be granted, Judge Gartner sets out the opinion rendered by him at the time he ordered the case struck from the docket, as follows: "Upon the application made for a struck jury, it was made to appear that the plaintiffs were residents of and do business in the City of Philadelphia, and the defendants in the City of New York. The subject matter of the controversy arose and is located in the upper peninsula of this State. This is shown in the affidavit of counsel, wherein it is stated: 'Affiant further says that all the parties to this suit are nonresidents of this State; . . . that the transaction involved in this suit arose in the upper peninsula of Michigan. It appears that the declaration was filed December 7, 1889, and the plea December 16 following. No process ever issued out of this court in said matter, nor was service had, and it is apparent that this forum wherein to litigate and determine this controversy is by consent of counsel, and selected for convenience.' This suit involves a large amount of money, the claim in the declaration being $1,000,000; and several weeks will have to be consumed in the trial thereof, involving the county in expense of thousands of dollars, and in a matter wherein the county has no interest, either in the parties or the subject matter. It certainly does not seem right that the people of this county should be made to bear the burden of expense of determining controversies between foreign litigants. The docket of this court is crowded, and we have more than we can do in determining matters wherein the jurisdiction of the court is undoubted. This case has no business here, and an order will be entered striking it from the docket."

He further states as follows: "That on information and belief this respondent states the fact to be that the relators were not obliged to come into this State to prosecute their right of action against said defendants. Neither did they casually find them, or any of them, in this State, . . . nor was the appearance or plea entered by the said defendants, or any of them, in obedience to any process issued out of said circuit court, nor in obedience to any notice of rule to plead indorsed upon a copy of the declaration filed in said circuit court at commencement of suit, . . . but said declaration and plea were filed, and said appearance was entered, in accordance with the previous stipulation of the parties."

He further alleges that there are 922 cases upon the docket, of which 713 are for trial by jury at the present term, exclusive of criminal cases; that the circuit court is overcrowded with business, and that the disposition of causes in said circuit court is delayed because of the crowded state of its docket; that the trial of the alleged cause would consume at least a month of the time of the judges and jury, and in that way would seriously interfere with the disposition of the legitimate business of the court, besides entailing upon the County of Wayne an expense of many thousands of dollars; and that he made the order complained of because he deemed the same in the interest of the administration of public justice, and of the public welfare. He summarizes his reasons for striking the cause from the docket as follows: "(1) That the said circuit court has no jurisdiction of the said alleged cause. (2) That the consent of parties and their attorneys does not and cannot confer jurisdiction upon said court, inasmuch as all parties, both the alleged plaintiffs and the alleged defendants are nonresidents of this State. (3) That, if jurisdiction can be conferred by consent of parties and attorneys, it does not become obligatory upon the court to entertain jurisdiction, but whether the same shall be entertained or not by the court is a matter which rests in the sound discretion of the court; and that public convenience and interest are paramount to the private convenience of the parties. (4) That it is apparent from the facts set out that the said alleged suit is brought into the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne for the convenience of the parties and their attorneys only."

I shall consider these reasons in the order named by the circuit judge.

First, as to the jurisdiction of the circuit court. The several circuit courts in this State are courts of general jurisdiction. The cause of action stated in the declaration is transitory. It is action of assumpsit, arising out of a contract claimed to have been performed in this State; and the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne has cognizance of suits upon contracts like the one sued upon irrespective of the locality of their origin, provided the parties, by service of process or otherwise, are before the court. Thompson v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. 52 Mich. 522.

Were the parties properly before the court? The suit was not commenced by either of the two methods authorized by § 7291, How. Stat. The petition asserts that the suit was commenced by the filing of the declaration (and a copy is attached to the petition). In so doing the plaintiffs submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court, as a party to the record (People v. McCaffrey, 75 Mich. 115), and the defendants, by appearing and pleading to the declaration, voluntarily submitted themselves likewise to the jurisdiction of the court. While it is true that no consent of parties can give a court jurisdiction of the subject matter of a suit which the court did not possess without such consent, it is equally true that a court can obtain jurisdiction over the person by the consent of such person; and service of process is always treated as waived by a general appearance in the cause, and pleading to the merits. And this is so although the defendant is a non-resident, and suable only in a particular place. Thompson v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Asso. supra.

There is no claim or pretense that this is a fictitious suit, or that it is not brought in good faith, to determine a genuine controversy of vital interest to the parties concerned. Section 7547 of Howell's Statutes enacts that issues of fact in actions upon contracts shall be tried in the county where one of the parties shall reside at the commencement of suit, unless, for the convenience of parties and their witnesses, or for the purposes of a fair and impartial trial, the court shall deem it necessary to order such issues to be tried in some other designated county. This provision, however, applies only to residents.

We held in Atkins v. Bortler, 46 Mich. 553, that the Statute does not apply to nonresident defendants, nor to a resident plaintiff suing a nonresident defendant, from the necessity of the case; that, if a nonresident could not be sued in any county where he could be found, he could not be sued at all. In that case the plaintiff was a nonresident of the county where the suit was brought, and the defendant was a nonresident of the State. The action was transitory, and we held the court had complete jurisdiction.

Whether courts ought to take jurisdiction in suits between aliens, when the cause of action arose in a foreign country, is not the question in dispute here. If it were, I should be willing to follow the views expressed by Chief Justice Marshall in Mason v. The Blaireau, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 240 (2 L. ed. 286). In that case the want of jurisdiction was urged, and in delivering his opinion he said: "These doubts seem rather founded on the idea that, upon principles of general policy, this court ought not to take cognizance of a case entirely between foreigners, than from any positive incapacity to do so. On weighing the considerations drawn from public convenience, those in favor of the jurisdiction appear much to overbalance those against it, and it is the opinion of this court that, whatever doubts may exist in a case where the jurisdiction may be objected to, there ought to be none where the parties assent to it."

In suits between foreigners, brought in our courts, the courts are not obliged to entertain jurisdiction. They may and usually do so upon principles of comity, and seldom decline, except through a fear that they may not be capable of doing full and exact justice through a want of knowledge of the laws of the place where the cause of action arose, which enter into and make a part of the contract, or affect the rights and remedy of the parties.

In Great Western R. Co. v. Miller, 19 Mich. 305, the plaintiff was a resident of Canada, and brought suit against the railroad company in Wayne Circuit Court, in Michigan, for a trespass to his person committed in Canada. The defendant appeared voluntarily. It was objected that the court erred in taking and exercising jurisdiction. This court said: "The voluntary appearance of the defendant below renders any discussion of the subject of the venue unnecessary. There can be no doubt that the locality of the trespass does not of itself oust the jurisdiction, where the court has lawfully obtained control over the parties. But where the parties are not residents of the United States, and the trespass was committed abroad, the right of action in our courts can only be claimed as a matter of comity, and they are not compellable to proceed in such cases."

In Roberts v. Dunsmuir, 75 Cal. 208, suit was brought by one subject of Great Britain against others of that Kingdom, upon a cause of action in tort arising in British Columbia. At the time of bringing the action the plaintiff and one of the defendants resided in the State. Two of the defendants were nonresidents, and were not served, but they filed a petition to have the cause remanded to the United States Court, and had procured an extension of time to answer after such appearance. The court below dismissed the suit, on the ground of want of jurisdiction. The supreme court reversed this ruling, holding that the court had jurisdiction. See also, as to jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant, Peabody v. Hamilton, 106 Mass. 217; Molyneux v. Seymour, 80 Ga. 440, 76 Am. Dec. 667, note; Wharton, Conf. L. §§ 788, 789; Smith v. Gibson, 83 Ala. 284; Roberts v. Knights, 7 Allen, 449; Barrell v. Benjamin, 15 Mass. 354; Miller v. Black, 2 Jones, L. (N. C.) 841; Stramburg v. Heckman, Busb. L. 250; McCormick v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 49 N. Y. 308; Campbell v. Wilson, 6 Tex. 379.

The case of McCormick v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra, was a case where a nonresident of the State of New York sued a foreign corporation upon a cause of action which was transitory in its nature, and arose in another State. The defendant had appeared voluntarily by attorney. Mr. Justice Folger said: "We hold that, where the court has the jurisdiction of the subject matter or cause of action, that consent may confer jurisdiction of the person, and that such consent may be expressed by a foreign corporation by appearing by attorney and answering generally in the action."

The next reason given by the circuit judge is that if jurisdiction is conferred by consent it does not become obligatory upon the court to entertain jurisdiction. The correctness of this position must depend upon the right of the plaintiff to seek redress in the courts of the State. If a party has a right to plant his suit in a circuit court of this State, the circuit judge has no discretion to exercise in the matter. He cannot say to one suitor, "I will retain your suit," and to another, "I will dismiss it." It is among the fundamental rights of a people under one government that they may be secured in the acquirement, possession and enjoyment of property, and for this purpose courts are instituted as part of the Organic Law, in which every person shall have his remedy by due process of law. It is secured as a privilege to which every citizen of the United States is entitled. The redress of wrongs and the means of enforcing contracts are of the greatest consequence to the citizens of every State.

Article 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." In commenting upon this clause of the Constitution, the Supreme Court of the United States in Conner v. Elliott, 59 U. S. 18 How. 598 [15 L. ed. 498], said: "We do not deem it needful to attempt to define the meaning of the word 'privileges' in this clause of the Constitution. It is safer and more in accordance with the duty of a judicial tribunal to leave its meaning to be determined, in each case, upon a view of the particular rights asserted and denied therein. . . . It is sufficient for this case to say that, according to the express words and clear meaning of this clause, no privileges are secured by it, except those which belong to citizenship." The right to bring suit in the several courts of this State having jurisdiction is a privilege of every citizen of this State. Especially is this true with reference to the enforcement of contracts. A citizen of another State may come into this, and acquire and enjoy property. He may inherit and transmit property. He may enter into contracts, to the same extent that a citizen of this State can do so, and in this his rights are guaranteed by the above provision of the Constitution; and I think that his right to bring suit in this State, in any case where a citizen of the State may, is also guaranteed and protected by this provision of the Constitution. This right does not depend upon the fact of the defendant's having property in this State which can be reached by execution. There are many cases where, in a suit between citizens of this State, there can be no property found out of which to satisfy an execution; nevertheless the plaintiff has a right to plant his suit, litigate his claims and obtain judgment. Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire-Alarm Co. 149 Mass. 24.

The fourth reason set out by the circuit judge affords no excuse for his declining to hear the case. None of the reasons alleged appear to me to be valid reasons for refusing to hear the case, or for striking it from the docket. No court or judge has a lawful right to deny to suitors the privilege of bringing and prosecuting their suits, upon the ground that to entertain them will entail expense upon the county. The parties were rightfully before the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne. The court had full jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter, and the circuit judge was in error in holding that the court had no jurisdiction, or that it had a discretion whether to entertain the suit or not.

A mandamus must issue as prayed for, directing Hon. George Gartner, Circuit Judge for the County of Wayne, to reinstate said cause upon the calendar of said court.

Morse and Grant, JJ., concurred.

Campbell, J., dissenting:

Relators are assignees of a firm consisting of Oliver W. Barnes, of New York City, Joseph W. Crawford, of Philadelphia, and Francis C. O'Reilly, of Orange, N. J. Relators both live in Pennsylvania. Their assignors had a contract for building a railroad in three of the upper peninsula counties, with Walston H. Brown and Samuel Thomas, of New York City, and Columbus R. Cummings and William B. Howard, of Chicago. None of these defendants have been in Michigan during the transactions to be referred to. Relators appear to have brought a suit of foreign attachment against the defendants in the upper peninsula, at Marquette, on which issue was joined. Subsequently, for reasons of convenience, this suit was discontinued, and by mutual understanding they attempted to bring a suit in the Circuit Court for Wayne County, filing a declaration on December 7, 1889. Defendants, by attorney, put in a plea to the merits on December 16, 1889. No service, or attempt at service, was made on any one of the defendants. Relators early in January, 1890, the case being on the term calendar for trial as a jury cause, applied to the respondent for a struck jury, setting up the circumstances of the controversy, and the wide range of inquiry necessary, and the residence of the parties, and the locality of the work done and in litigation, and claiming that all of the facts made it unsafe and undesirable for trial by an ordinary jury. Defendants opposed this motion, and insisted there was no reason for having a special jury. On these facts appearing, the respondent refused to have the case kept in court at all, as one which the Wayne Circuit Court was not bound to try, and dismissed it. Relators seek a mandamus to restore the cause to the court and calendar.

Several reasons were discussed on the hearing before us, depending on very grave questions. In the view I take of the motion, it is not necessary to consider them all. The jurisdiction, in my view, depends entirely on the policy of the statutes of Michigan. Without passing on the point directly, I am inclined to think that, if the suit had been begun in the statutory way, the controversy might be litigated in our courts somewhere against the parties reached. But the controversy is fairly presented, not whether our courts can entertain proceedings between nonresidents, but whether this suit is brought at such a place and in such a way that the Wayne Circuit Court is legally bound to hear it, and has no option on the subject. If not legally bound to do so, we have no right to review its discretion in declining to hear it. While we have statutes which to some extent, at least, raise distinctions arising out of residence, I do not propose to consider them all particularly. There are some incidents of territorial jurisdiction which are universally recognized. Among these is the constitutional and elementary doctrine that, while every State may reach property actually within its borders, no personal judgment has the least validity unless made against a person actually served with process, or else appearing voluntarily to respond to a suit. It is equally well settled that no one, whether partner or in any other relation of joint interest, can subject any of his associates to such personal jurisdiction, either by suit or by arbitration. No one can be brought into court personally, without personal service or personal waiver of service. In order, therefore, to get a personal judgment against all these defendants, they must all be served or appear; and a judgment which does not bind them all personally is not entitled to faith and credit, under the Constitution of the United States. D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 52 U. S. 11 How. 165 [18 L. ed. 648].

It is plain that so long as these defendants are outside of Michigan, no court in Michigan can reach them. Service of Michigan process beyond the State is not due process of law, and is void for any jurisdictional purpose. Bischoff v. Wethered, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 813 [19 L. ed. 829]; McEwan v. Zimmer, 38 Mich. 765.

Under our statutes, no service of process is valid outside of the county, upon any defendant, until jurisdiction has been obtained by service on some defendant within it. Turrill v. Walker, 4 Mich. 177; Denison v. Smith, 33 Mich. 155.

When a suit has been so far instituted as to fix the jurisdiction against any defendant, although the authorities are not entirely clear, there is usually no obstacle to a waiver of strict procedure by voluntary action under appearance. But I have found no support anywhere for the doctrine that jurisdiction itself can be given in any way or in any case not provided for by law; and there is no provision in statute or common law which allows jurisdiction to depend on the mere will of parties. The only provision in our laws which allows litigation to be commenced without process applies only to courts of justices of the peace, and its express authorization is not without significance, as creating a new method for the first time. By section 6823 of Howell's Statutes it is provided that suit may be instituted before a justice either by the voluntary appearance of "parties or by process." It may be remarked that there is no statutory or common-law rule which allows the original jurisdiction of any court to be called into exercise except by or through the party in person. It is not within the power of an attorney to represent his client in litigation not already pending. By section 6825, a voluntary suit is to be commenced "at the time when the parties shall appear before the justice and join issue." The statute also allows a debtor, with the consent of a creditor, to appear in person before a justice, and confess judgment without process. Section 6816. But this can only be done by a strict compliance with the Statute, and a judgment by confession in any way varying from the statutory method is void. Spear v. Carter, 1 Mich. 19; Wilson v. Davis, 1 Mich. 156; Beach v. Boleford, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 199; Clark v. Holmes, Id. 390.

The same rule applies to stay of execution of justice's judgment. If given for any more than the statutory amount, it is absolutely void. Shadbolt v. Bronson, 1 Mich. 85. It is also held in Soper v. Fry, 37 Mich. 236, in accordance with many other cases, that a partner has no authority to confess judgment.

There has been some doubt at common law whether an appearance can be entered at all before the time expires under the process served, and it seems then to be confined to cases where it is necessary for some purposes for the defendant; as, for example, to discharge appearance bail. But there is nowhere any recognition of the validity of a proceeding not commenced by legal process. It is not profitable to attempt to surmise all the reasons for legal rules, but courts have no right to disregard them. The government is interested in controlling litigation, and in preventing it, except under its own regulations. It involves many considerations which none but the Legislature can pass upon. Due process of law, under which property may be seized and sold, or whereby the public machinery is used at public expense, cannot depend on mere private will. Our laws have removed most of the merely formal impediments to suing, but they have not allowed parties to get into court, except through the ways indicated. There is but one method left to the parties for litigating disputed facts in any but the regular way, and that is by arbitration. That is allowed to be done, not in court, but out of court; but it may be submitted by acknowledgment before some public officer, and, if regularly executed, may be by the submission entitled to be entered as a judgment in a court designated. How. Stat. § 6474.

But, if not executed in strict accordance with law, such award cannot be received by any court as the foundation of a judgment (Gibson v. Burrows, 41 Mich. 713); and the arbitrator cannot cover questions of landed title. § 6475.

Provision is also made for confession of judgment by virtue of power executed out of court, but the attorney's power to file a cognovit must be found in a special and separate appointment in writing, outside of the evidence of debt, and is strictly limited by its terms. § 7662.

Parties are also allowed to agree upon a case stating only facts, and submit it to the circuit court for judgment on the law, without suit brought, if the controversy might be made the ground of an action; but it must be shown by affidavit that the controversy is real and in good faith. How. Stat. § 6469.

But it was held in Goodrich v. Detroit, 12 Mich. 279, that such a case must leave no inference of fact to be drawn by the court, and that no further facts or evidence can be permitted to be introduced. No other cases of voluntary jurisdiction have been provided for, and none of these include any litigation of issues of fact.

When we look at the judiciary laws, we shall find them as precise in their directions as the common-law practice, but simplified in details. They provide both where and how suits shall be begun, and of what the courts shall have cognizance. It is declared that the circuit courts shall have power, and it shall be their duty, to hear and determine all such matters "as may be lawfully brought into said courts." It is further declared that the rules regulating their practice "shall govern the practice and proceedings in the circuit courts, until altered by the supreme court, or by their authority." § 6467.

The venue may be changed on good cause shown, which is a matter of judicial discretion, and which is in no case allowed to be done by act of parties. § 6468; Greeley v. Stilson, 27 Mich. 154.

The only specified case in which it is done, except by the local judge, is where that judge is disqualified; and then it must be done by regular proceedings before another public officer, which must conform to the Statute to be valid. § 6495; Shannon v. Smith, 31 Mich. 452.

Section 7291 provides two ways for beginning suits for debt or damages, which are (1) by original writ, and (2) by filing and service of declaration. It has been settled by our decisions that the suit is not begun till the declaration is served. Detroit Free Press Co. v. Bagg (Mich.) 44 N. W. Rep. 149 (Jan. Term, 1890).

And, as already suggested, service cannot be made on any defendant out of the county until it has been served and proof of service filed in the county where the suit is pending. Denton v. Smith, 33 Mich. 155; Clark v. Lichtenberg, 33 Mich. 307; Turrill v. Walker, 4 Mich. 177.

And it has been settled that service cannot be made within the original county on anyone who is there as a witness, or on any other legal errand, which exempts him from process while away from his residence. Jacobson v. Hoerner, 76 Mich. 234.

By section 7547 it is provided that all transitory actions shall be tried in the residence of one or the other of the parties.

It was held in Haywood v. Johnson, 41 Mich.

598, that this is jurisdictional, and requires suits to be commenced there. It is only when a defendant is not a resident of the State that he may be served where he can be found. This is a rule of necessity, and results from the doctrine that all persons temporarily in any county become subject to its jurisdiction, and, if they have no fixed residence, must be treated as commorant wherever they are found. Under our statutes it is impossible to hold that any circuit court has jurisdiction without either process or service of declaration. Those are the only methods recognized. Until a suit is pending, no attorney has official authority to appear for a client, and when a suit is actually pending no party can answer for any other party. No court can be compelled to assume the burden or authority of jurisdiction, unless in cases authorized by law. It is not in the power of private persons, whether citizens or not, to impose duties on courts, except by following the legal rules. The public officers, judicial or otherwise, cannot have duties laid on them by private action. The return before us indicates the great public inconvenience which would follow the assumption of jurisdiction in this case. That would be no answer to the application before us, if the legal duty exists. But it indicates, perhaps, some of the reasons which have induced the law-makers to so apportion the jurisdiction of courts as to make the burdens fall where they ought to fall, and to prevent parties from choosing their own forum at their own pleasure. I do not think the suit is legally before the Wayne Circuit Court, and I think the mandamus should be denied.

A devise to testator's wife for her sole use, control and enjoyment during her life, to use and dispose of it as she may desire, and to give the residue by will to such persons as she may desire, but giving what is left to certain other parties in case she leaves no will, is a gift of the fee to the wife, and the remainder over is void.

NOTE.—Estate in fee conveyed by will.

In wills, the rule that words of inheritance are necessary to convey a fee is entirely subordinate to the testator's intention. Lambert v. Paine, 7 U. S. 3 Cranoh, 97 (2 L. ed. 377); Meliok v. Pidcock, 13 Cent. Rep. 300, 44 N. J. Eq. 525.

A devise of land to a wife, "to have and to hold for her benefit and support," is not a condition or limitation on her estate therein, but merely a statement of testator's reason for the gift; and the wife takes the fee, under the New York statute providing that words of inheritance are not necessary, unless there is an intent, expressed or to be necessarily implied, to grant a less estate. Crain v. Wright, 114 N. Y. 307.

Under the Kentucky statute providing that an estate shall be deemed a fee simple, although no words of inheritance are used, unless a different purpose is imposed or necessarily implied, a will directing the sale of certain realty for the interest of testator's wife, the proceeds to be invested in her name and for her use, prohibiting her from loaning them, but allowing her the interest as she may require, and the rents as she should desire, if the land was not sold, and making no provision as to remainder in the property,—gives her a fee simple. Robbins v. Robbins (Ky.) 9 S. W. Rep. 254.

When a testator devises land without legal words of limitation, but adds that the devisee "may sell or do therewith as he pleases," he is presumed to have intended to give a fee. King v. Ackerman, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 408 (17 L. ed. 292).

Because the testator used the phrase "to do and dispose of as he may think proper," as regards the farm, and, in devise of the homestead, has omitted it, such omission as to the latter is not equivalent to an express limitation of it to the life of the devisee. Ibid.

A devise providing that the devisees shall not sell or mortgage the land, but that the same shall go to 7 L. R. A.

their heirs after them, vests the fee in the devisees. Hagemann v. Hagemann (Ill.) 21 N. E. Rep. 814.

Conditions against alienation are strictly construed. Warfield v. English, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 263.

Not cut down by subsequent terms.

Where an estate is given in one part of the will in clear and decisive terms, such estate cannot be taken away or cut down by subsequent words that are not as clear and decisive as the words of the clause giving the estate. Re Surrogate of Cayuga Co. 46 Hun, 687; Hockstetler v. Hockstetler, 7 West. Rep. 75, 108 Ind. 506; Gouldie v. Johnston, 7 West. Rep. 589, 109 Ind. 427; Bailey v. Sanger, 6 West. Rep. 556, 108 Ind. 264; Allen v. Craft, 7 West. Rep. 518, 109 Ind. 476; Byrnes v. Stillwell, 5 Cent. Rep. 406, 108 N. Y. 453.

Such words, being repugnant to the gift originally made, are treated as of no effect. Authorities cited. Sherburne v. Sischo, 3 New Eng. Rep. 432, 143 Mass. 439.

Superadded words which merely describe or specify the incidents of the estate created by such a word of limitation as the word "heirs" do not cut down the interest of devisee. Authorities cited. Allen v. Craft, 7 West. Rep. 518, 109 Ind. 474.

A limitation to a designated class of heirs does not cut down the estate of the first taker to less than a fee. Ibid.

Where quantity of estate of taker is expressly defined to be for life, and words adapted to creation of a power of disposal, without restriction as to mode of execution, are added, the superadded words will be construed to be the mere gift of a power of disposition. Lienau v. Summerfield, 3 Cent. Rep. 308, 41 N. J. Eq. 381.

The common-law rule that a provision in the will disposing of real property to A in such terms as to convey a fee and with power to dispose of it in his lifetime, was inconsistent with a further provision lege students, and the next clause provided that the rest of the estate should be held as a fund to aid students "in the same manner and with the same restrictions as prescribed" in the preceding article, "and at any time after five years" the executors might, in their discretion, appropriate "whatever may remain" to certain towns, the interest to be used for school purposes in the education of all classes, the fund referred to in the latter article is not to be kept for accumulation during the five years but used for the purposes specified.

4. Taxable costs of all parties in a suit for the construction of a will may be ordered to be paid out of the funds of the estate before distribution.

(November 14, 1889.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree in chancery of the Caledonia County Court dismissing a bill to obtain construction of certain portions of the will of Alden E. Jeudevine, deceased. Reversed.

The bill was filed by Jeudevine's executors, and his widow, Malvina M. Jeudevine, the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College and the Town of Concord were made defendants.

The portions of the will necessary to an understanding of the case are as follows:

"Article Fifth. I grant and devise to my beloved wife, Malvina M. Jeudevine, one half of the residue of my estate, both real and personal, and it is my will that the proceeds of any policy of insurance on my life which my wife may receive shall be computed as part of the share given her by this will and subject to the conditions specified in article number 8 of this will, relating to my home premises. The foregoing grant and devise to my wife is for her sole use, control and enjoyment during her life; trusting and expecting that she will use and dispose of the whole thereof as she may desire, and that she will give the residue, if any remains at her death, by her will to such persons and for such purposes as she may desire. But inasmuch as I desire that such residue at her decease shall in no event pass to her legal heirs if undisposed of by her, I give, grant and devise one half of the same to the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College in the same manner as named in article number six of this will, and the other half to be held and expended by said executors for the purposes named in article number seven in this will, meaning what is unappropriated by my wife before her decease.

"Article Sixth. To perpetuate the memory of my late beloved son, Cornelius Alden Jeudevine, who died without receiving that liberal education which I intended he should have, I desire to create a fund to be known as the Cornelius A. Jeudevine memorial fund, for the purpose of aiding poor and deserving young men in Vermont in obtaining the advantages of a liberal education. To this end I give, grant and devise one half of the remaining half of the residue of my estate, both real and personal, meaning one half of the residue left after discharging the gifts specified in articles 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6, and subject to the conditions respecting my home place, named in article 8 of this will, to the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College, located in Burlington, Vermont, upon the trusts and in the manner that in case A did not dispose of it during his lifetime, then, and in that case, the estate should go to B, and that the limitation over was for that reason void, was altered by the adoption of the Revised Statutes. The possibility of enjoying the estate, on the failure of the precedent owner to dispose of it, is "an expectant estate" within the meaning of that term, as used in § 83, 1 Rev. Stat. 725, 3 Rev. Stat. 7th ed. 2178. Greyston v. Clark, 41 Hun, 125.

A fee will not be out down by ambiguous words. Sherburne v. Sischo, supra.

By the following clause, "The interest of one fourth aforesaid of my daughter H., I will shall be so secured to her that she shall enjoy it during her natural life, and after her decease, then to her right heirs forever; and in like manner do I wish the one-fourth interest secured to my grandchildren J. and E.;" and clothing his executors with power to secure his daughter and grandchildren in their respective interests, with power to manage his estate for the best interest of all concerned, until a division is made, and that they may sell and reinvest what they deem proper,—It is not clear that the intention of the testator was to limit or cut down the fee, which he had already given by a preceding clause, to a mere life estate; and in the absence of such clear intention, the clause should not be given that effect. Wicker v. Ray, 8 West. Rep. 495, 118 Ill. 472.

Instances; late decisions.

A devise to a daughter of certain land, with the further clause that "she will not have power to sell, but may leave the same to her children," gives her an estate in fee, the attempted restraint upon alienation in the first part of the clause quoted being void, and the remaining clause being merely an expression of permission to leave the land to her children, but without a prohibition of any other disposition thereof. McIntyre v. McIntyre, 123 Pa. 329.

If one seized in fee grants a life estate with remainder to his heirs, the limitation to his heirs is simply void, and he will have a perfect legal reversion. Miller v. Fleming (D. C.) 17 Wash. L. Rep. 102.

A direction to a trustee to convey to grantor's heirs to whom he has given a remainder will not change the rule which makes such a remainder operate merely as a reversion to himself. Ibid.

Adding the words, "as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants," to a clause in which a grantor directs that the remainder in fee shall be given to his heirs, does not prevent the operation of the rule which makes such a gift operate as a reversion to himself. Ibid.

Where testator by his will gave and devised all his estate, real and personal, to his wife, "the same to be held and enjoyed by her fully and absolutely and without restriction of any kind, with full power to alienate, convert or dispose of the same in such manner as she may deem best;" and provided subsequently, in the same instrument, that upon the death of his wife all his estate, "or so much of it as remains the property of my wife on her death," should go to his children,—the devise to the wife is of a fee simple, and the devise over to the children is void. Also, without regard to the wife's estate, the will, expressly and by implication, gives her a power to sell testator's lands. McClellan v. Laroar, 45 N. J. Eq. 17.

A devise to one person, and, in case of his death, to another, gives the first named an absolute estate if he survives the testator. Johnes v. Beers, 87 Conn. 285.

A gift to a daughter and her issue of a sum of money, the interest to be added to the principal while her present husband lives, but to be paid to her annually in case she becomes a widow, and if following: I direct my executors, as soon as it can be done to the best advantage, to convert said real and personal estate into money or safe moneyed securities and pay over one half of my estate, after articles numbers 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 have been complied with, to the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College, and that the trustees of said institution shall apply the income thereof, and such part of the principal as shall become necessary, to be expended from time to time in paying the expenses, in whole or in part, of poor and deserving young men pursuing their studies in the academical department of said institution, or in loaning to such young men such sums, and in such manner and on such security as said trustees may determine. The bequest or legacy I here make not to be expended in the education of young men who themselves or parents are pecuniarily able to pay for their education, unless on a loan well secured to be refunded to said trustees, and held as a fund as far as practicable for the education of poor young men, as this bequest is intended; herein giving preference to applicants residing in the Towns of Hardwick in Caledonia County and Concord in Essex County, Vermont, and after these to applicants residing in any town in Vermont. No discrimination to be made against applicants on the ground of sect, religion or society. Though intemperate young men are to be excluded from the benefit of this my bequest. All loans when paid shall be held by the trustees for the same purpose. It is my desire that said trustees establish proper regulations and conditions for the expenditure of the fund hereby created, and for the investment of so much thereof as may at any time be unused or unexpended, so that the fund may be preserved and increased so far as practicable, and that said trustees, each and every year as long as said fund exists, shall give public notice in at least three weekly newspapers printed in the State of Vermont, one of which shall be in Caledonia County and one in Essex County, at least three weeks each year, stating the existence of the fund and briefly stating to what class of young men the fund is made available by the terms of this will. Same to be paid to said university and college in sums not to exceed $1,000 each for the first five years. The trustees of said institution are to report semi-annually to each of my executors the amount of the funds expended and to whom, and should the said trustees fail at any time to carry out the provisions of this will on the part of said university and college, in all particulars, my said executors are directed to withdraw the payment of further funds to said Vermont University and Agricultural College, and said executors are directed to (invest?) the remainder of said funds in some other institution of learning in Vermont that my executors in their discretion shall select, under the same provisions and restrictions the grant or bequest is made by this will to the Vermont University and State Agricultural College.

"Article Seventh. It is my will that my executors shall hold the other fourth-part of my estate, both real and personal, not heretofore appropriated, as a fund to be known as the Cornelius A. Jeudevine memorial fund, for the she leaves issue or descendants, the principal sum, with accumulated interest, to be paid to them,—gives an absolute title to the daughter. Brubaker's App. (Pa.) 15 Atl. Rep. 708.

A devise, in 1847, of certain land to a daughter and her children, free from the disposition of any future husband, the daughter then having no children, gave her an absolute fee under the statute, enlarging an estate tail to a fee simple, and the children born to her after testator's death take no estate by way of remainder or otherwise. Lofton v. Murchison, 80 Ga. 891.

A will giving to the three daughters of testatrix certain land to be jointly used while they remained unmarried, any one of them marrying to forfeit the use, the survivor having the right to dispose of the property by will or otherwise, the share of any one of them dying unmarried to descend to the survivors, the daughters to sell the property and divide the proceeds, if they all marry, and giving them all the residue of her property, if any,—gives the three daughters an estate in fee simple in the property, so that two of them, on the death of the other unmarried, may convey their entire interest by deed. Myers v. Bentz, 127 Pa. 222.

The fee simple given by a devise to a son, his heirs and assigns forever, is not cut down by a subsequent clause, after a devise to a daughter, providing that the lands before devised to the son, if he should die without a descendant, should be disposed of in various ways, dependent on certain contingencies, leaving a possible intestacy as to such lands, where the will shows a clear determination to make a final disposition of the whole estate. In such case the rule applies that an estate given in clear and decisive terms in one clause cannot be taken away or cut down by subsequent words that are not equally clear and decisive. O'Boyle v. Thomas, 116 Ind. 242.

Testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his nephews and nieces, share and share alike, except one nephew; and in a subsequent clause provided: "At the decease of either said nephews or nieces I give and bequeath such one's half portion and interest on the trust fund to his or her legal heirs; and at the decease of all my nephews and nieces I give and bequeath the principal of said trust fund to their legal heirs, including W's heirs," the nephew above excluded. It was held the subsequent clause did not cut down the estates given by the prior clause, and the word "all" should be construed "each" or "every one," and the word "on" should be construed "in." Sherburne v. Slacho, 3 New Eng. Rep. 431, 143 Mass. 439.

So an estate given in clear words cannot be cut down by subsequent words, unless they are equally clear and decisive. An estate created by clear words cannot be enlarged by words less clear and decisive. Gouldie v. Johnston, 7 West. Rep. 589, 109 Ind. 427.

Thus a devise of real estate to a wife, "to remain hers so long as she shall remain unmarried after my decease," confers life estate only; a subsequent provision authorizing her to sell so much as she may find necessary does not enlarge the estate to a fee. Nash v. Simpson, 1 New Eng. Rep. 699, 78 Me. 142.

Precatory words not to affect estate granted.

After an unqualified devise by a testator of his property, no precatory words addressed to his devisee can defeat the estate previously granted. Hopkins v. Glunt, 3 Cent. Rep. 63, 111 Pa. 287.

A will giving testator's wife all his property, both real and personal, with the further provision that, in case of her death "before the settlement of" his estate, his property should be equally divided between two nephews; and adding: "I have full con-education of poor deserving young men in the same manner and with the same restrictions as prescribed in article 6th, that the Vermont University and State Agricultural College are to perform as named in said article 6th, and at any time after five years from my decease, should my executors in their discretion judge best, whatever may remain of the one-fourth part of my estate they have the right to appropriate one half of said fourth part remaining unexpended to my native Town of Concord, in Essex County, Vermont, and the other half to the Town of Hardwick in Caledonia County, both bequests to be known as the Cornelius A. Jeudevine memorial fund, the interest of which to be used in each of said towns for school purposes in the education of all classes in the several school districts in each town without discrimination, though in the latter town some parents are not deserving any assistance from me to educate their children or aiding them in paying their school-district taxes.

"Article Eighth. It is my will that my home place in said Hardwick where I now reside, or any other place where I may reside at my decease, including the new house and out buildings and so much of the land connected as my wife may desire to occupy, to be kept for the use of my wife and occupancy during her lifetime, unless my wife desires it sold, and while she thus occupies it it is to be kept in good repair by said executors, taxes and insurance also to be paid out of my estate before a division of said estate and to be no charge to my said wife for its occupancy by her, and when sold the avails of which to be divided and to go as other parts of my estate as willed in articles 5, 6 and 7, half to my wife, one fourth to the Vermont University and State Agricultural College, and the other fourth to be appropriated and expended by my executors as named in article number seven. . . ."

Codicil. "I, Alden E. Jeudevine, make the following additions and explanations of my wishes in addition to my last will and testament, dated Nov. 16, 1883, to which this is attached. It is my wish and will that my real estate in particular shall not be sacrificed by an immediate sale, and that my timbered lands in Hardwick shall be held by my said executors until my other real estate in Hardwick is disposed of, and to carry out my wishes and ideas would suggest that my executors shall advertise my whole real estate in Hardwick and

Woodbury for sale, in view that some capitalist would purchase the whole for the sake of operating the timbered lands, and would further suggest an additional executor to be appointed, who resides in Hardwick, to particularly have charge of my real estate and, with the advice of the other executors named, to dispose of all my real estate, and would suggest as such additional executor either Loren C. Foss or L. H. Warren (as my other executors may think advisable) for one of them with the other executors named in my will to see to said real estate and personal property and also to see that each provision of my will is carried out, and that the probate court, at the decease of the executors named, continue to appoint an executor and sufficient funds retained to pay for his services and expenses, to see that the Burlington University and Agricultural College and the Towns, viz., Hardwick and Concord, shall use the funds as specified here and in my said will and bonds duly executed and filed in the Probate Court in Caledonia County for the faithful performance of each.

"Each of said Towns to receive what is paid each Town as a memorial fund in the name of my deceased son, Cornelius Alden Jeudevine, the interest of which, at 6 per cent annually, to be expended for school purposes as named in said will. The sum paid to each Town may be used to pay the indebtedness of each Town, and should either Town, or both, neglect to carry out the provisions set forth by me, the funds delivered and paid to such Town by my executors, to be collected from said Town and placed in some other town or towns that will receive it and carry out my desires, wishes and will as set forth by me.

"I would suggest as appraisers and commissioners to my estate, P. K. Gleed of Morrisville, Abel Gile of Walden and Isaac P. Titus of Hardwick, if living at my decease.

"And to further explain my wishes say I prefer that what is necessary to pay my executors for their services to see that the provisions of my wishes and will are carried out rather than have that amount paid to the University and Towns and they not carry out the provisions of my will.

"If anything in this conflicts with my will dated November 16, 1883, it is my will that this explanation of my wishes and will shall take precedence to that will wherein it conflicts. . . ."

fidence in my beloved wife, Mary, that she will do what is best and proper with my effects, and that she would do with my property the same as I would wish to have done, that she will take care of the proceeds. She is by this gift free from all restraint to do as may seem to her best and proper;" and also appointing her executrix,—gives to her, after her final settlement and discharge as executrix, all the property absolutely, without any trust in favor of the nephews. Giles v. Analow, 128 Ill. 187.

The rule is well settled that words in a will merely expressive of desire, recommendation and confidence, are not sufficient to convert a devise or bequest into a trust. Re Pennoek's Estate, 20 Pa. 288; Jaureche v. Proctor, 48 Pa. 466; Second Ref. Presb. Church v. Disbrow, 62 Pa. 219; Bowlby v. Thunder, 105 Pa. 173.

Expressions of a desire or a wish of the testator as to a specific disposition of his property, standing by themselves alone, may constitute a valid devise or bequest thereof, but not when such expressions are used after an absolute disposition of the property has been made. After an unqualified devise by the testator of his property, no precatory words to his devisee can defeat the estate previously granted. Burt v. Herron, 66 Pa. 400; Bowlby v. Thunder, supra.

The precatory form of a testamentary writing is immaterial, where it has the essential element of being a disposition of property to take effect after death, although it is in form merely a request, instead of a command, addressed to no specified person by name, but plainly to those who should have possession or control of the property. Knox's App. (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 353.

The estate conveyed by article 5 of the will is a fee; and if a fee is thus conveyed, the gift over is void for repugnancy. Nothing but a clear intention to cut down the estate thereby conveyed will be allowed to do so.

The absolute power of disposal, at all times, and for all purposes, as distinguished from a power to use in a particular way, or dispose of to a particular person, constitutes a fee.

The intention of the testator, gathered from the will itself when "taken by its four corners," must govern its construction, unless well-established rules of law would thereby be violated.

Finlay v. King, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 377 (7 L. ed. 712).

The language used shows that the testator did not use the words "during her life" in a technical sense; their technical meaning will therefore be over-ridden by such intention.

Mr. Harry Blodgett, for the Town of Concord, appellee:

The court will carry into effect the declared intent of the testator if it is clearly expressed and is consistent with the general rules of law.

"The intention must be gathered from the words of the testator, and the words construed according to the letter and legal effect of them." "The intent is to be collected from the will itself, giving effect to every word and part."

See notes, with cases cited, in Pray v. Bell, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 670 (7 L. ed. 309).

The express bequest to Mrs. Jeudevine is for "her sole use, control and enjoyment during her life," which are apt words and limit the grant to a life estate only. The gift of the "remainder" shows that the intention of the testator was that if Mrs. Jeudevine left any part of the one-half interest undisposed of at her decease, such "remainder," instead of descending to her heirs, would become a part of the "Cornelius A. Jeudevine Memorial Fund" and inure to the benefit of the "University of Vermont" and "Town of Concord."

The fact that Mrs. Jeudevine is given the absolute power of disposal does not render the gift over "inconsistent with this power," and therefore void.

Veasey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Treating the 5th article of the will, for convenience or reference, as divided into three parts,—the first ending with the first punctuation period, the second with the next period, and the third with the last,—it is quite plain, and not disputed, that the first part standing alone would carry a fee. In the second part, there is clearly granted an unlimited, absolute power of disposal. That is not disputed; but it is claimed in behalf of the College and Town that this part indicates an intention to limit the title in Mrs. Jeudevine to a life estate, and that this import is strengthened by the third part. The contention on the part of Mrs. Jeudevine is that, as the first part makes the grant a fee, the third part must be rejected as repugnant. It is claimed for the College and Town that the intention of the testator, fairly deducible from the language of the article as a whole, was to give a life estate only to the wife, with power of disposal at her pleasure. Taking the several parts up in their order, the first one concededly imports a devise of an estate in fee, without a word indicating a different intention. The second part begins by saying the foregoing grant and devise to his wife is for her sole use, control and enjoyment during her life. This points to a life estate; but it is followed by the expression, "trusting and expecting that she will use and dispose of the whole thereof as she may desire, and that she will give the residue, if any remains at her death, by her will, to such persons, and for such purposes, as she may desire." Therefore the second part, as a whole, seems to us to negate an intention to limit the grant to a life estate. The portion quoted makes it clear that the intention was to give an absolute power of disposal, not of a life estate, but "of the whole thereof," either by deed or will.

To deduce an intention of limitation upon a previous grant in terms constituting a fee, from a clause providing for an absolute and unrestricted power of disposition, would indeed be a violent and unreasonable inference. The clause "during her life" is to be interpreted in the light of the following clauses, which unmistakably point to unrestricted power of disposition of the fee.

Therefore, until we come to the third part, we find no indication of an intention to limit the grant to a life estate. But it is upon this part that counsel mainly rely to show an intention to thus limit the grant. It is plain that the central idea in the mind of the testator in drawing the third part of this article was not to make a provision for the Town of Concord and the College, but to guard against any of the property granted to his wife from passing to her heirs unless she should give it to them. They had no living children. He provided for the Town and College elsewhere in the will. Herein is a distinction between this will and the wills in Smith v. Bell, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 68 [8 L. ed. 322], and other cases cited. The language of the granting clause in Smith v. Bell, as in the case at bar, was adequate to carry a fee, but that was followed by a provision for a remainder, which was interpreted by the court to manifest the intention of the testator to make a future provision for his son. Therefore the court, in order to carry out such intention, and give effect to all parts of the will, regarded the remainder clause as indicating an intention in the granting clause to limit the grant to a life estate.

In the opinion of Redfield, J., in Richardson v. Paige, 54 Vt. 373, the learned judge, after quoting this rule, "The exclusion of the devise over depends upon whether the first taker has the absolute right to dispose of the property," says that Chief Justice Marshall disregarded it in order to construe the will according to the intention of the testator.

We think a careful reading of the opinion of the chief justice does not warrant such conclusion, but that he put the decision upon the ground above stated. That has been regarded as an extreme case, and has provoked some adverse comment; but it has been cited with approval by this court, and so far as it involves legal rules of construction it seems to be within the general line of authority, especially as adopted in this State, and lately expressed in Chaplin v. Doty, 60 Vt. 712, viz.: "It is an elementary rule of construction that an absolute gift in a will will not be defeated by a subsequent repugnant clause. If the subsequent clause is plainly a qualification or condition, which evidently was intended by the testator to be read as part of the preceding clause, the rule is different. It makes little difference in the construction whether the granting clause itself is in form conditional, or the condition is annexed to a clause in form absolute."

And again, in Storrell v. Hastings, 59 Vt. 494, viz.: "In determining what estate is given the first taker, the whole will should be considered, and all the clauses construed together. Even in those cases where an absolute estate is in terms given, if subsequent passages unequivocally show that the testator meant the legatee to take a life interest only, the prior gift is restricted accordingly. 1 Jarman, Wills, chap. 15. Such are the cases in this State of Richardson v. Paige, 54 Vt. 373; McCloskey v. Gleason, 56 Vt. 264."

If the remainder clause, the third part of the 5th article, not being for the purpose of a gift to the Town and College, but, as before stated, to keep an assumed remainder undisposed of by deed or will by Mrs. Jeudevine from going to her heirs, she having no children, shows that in the opinion of the testator the previous words had given only an estate for life, then, upon the authority of Smith v. Bell, supra, we may hold that the grant was only of a life estate.

But, this remainder clause being only for the purpose just stated, we do not think it indicates an understanding of the testator that he had not already made a grant in fee to his wife. In this respect this case differs from that of Smith v. Bell, supra, and others of that class; and it differs, also, from Richardson v. Paige, supra, in this: that there the bequest to Paige was in express terms made subject to the provision for the contingent benefit of his wife. Neither does it fall into the category of those cases, several of which are cited in the briefs, where the testator gives to the first taker an estate for life only, by certain and express words, and annexes to it a power of disposal, in which case the devise for life will not take an estate in fee, notwithstanding the distinct and naked gift of a power of disposition of the reversion; that is, an absolute and unqualified power of disposal annexed to an express life estate does not enlarge the quantum of the estate. See Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 588, and cases there cited.

We think it was the intention of the testator to make a grant and devise to his wife of an estate in fee, and that the case falls directly within the decision in Storrell v. Hastings, supra, where the will, after disposing of a part of the estate, gave to the testator's wife the residue, "for her benefit and support, to use and dispose of as she may think proper," and then provided that, if any of the estate should be left in her possession at her death, it should be equally divided between the brothers and sisters of the testator; and it was held that the wife took an absolute estate, and that the remainder over was void for repugnancy. The proposition of law upon which the court rested the decision, as enunciated by Taft, J., in the opinion, was this: "If an estate be given to a person generally or indefinitely, with an absolute power of disposition, it carries a fee, and a remainder over is void for repugnancy;" and he then cited numerous authorities in support.

Under the 7th article, we consider that the executors are to hold and appropriate the portion of the estate therein specified for five years, for the purposes, and under the same restrictions, and in the same manner, in all respects, as prescribed and provided in the 6th article of the will, as to the portion of the estate therein granted and devised to the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College. We think the clause, "whatever may remain," etc., plainly indicates that this fund is not to be kept for accumulation during the five years, but is to be used as above stated.

All parties agree that the provision of the first codicil as to sale of timbered lands does not operate as a restraint of the sale thereof until all the other real estate in Hardwick is disposed of, but was intended to be only advisory, and that the executors may, in their discretion, effect a sale notwithstanding such other real estate is undisposed of. A majority of the court are inclined to adopt this view, all parties agreeing thereto, and being satisfied that it would be carrying out the real intention of the testator; that is, an administration of the estate in a way that would promote its best interests, and that of all parties interested therein, and that the beneficial purposes of the testator would thereby be better attained.

We also concur in the suggestion of the orators in the bill that the taxable costs of all parties, with reasonable counsel fees, should be paid out of the funds of the estate before distribution, the same to be fixed and allowed by the court of chancery.

The pro forma decree dismissing the bill is reversed, and the cause remanded, to be disposed of pursuant to the mandate filed.

Ross, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the construction given to the devise of the testator to his wife. All rules of construction are devised, originating in the peculiar language and circumstance of some case or cases, to aid in ascertaining the intention of the testator. Their proper use is to ascertain, and not to defeat, the intention of the testator. How far they may be helpful in determining such intention in a given case depends upon whether the language used, and circumstances to which it is applicable in the given case, are substantially identical with the language used, and circumstances of the case or cases in which the rule or rules originated. It rarely happens that the language and circumstances of two cases substantially coincide. Hence such rules should never be given undue force, or followed without reason, and should never be allowed to defeat the express intention of the testator. When such intention is clearly and unmistakably expressed on a given point, it, of itself, furnishes a safe guide to the construction which should be given to his language used in other portions of the same devise, which, if read by itself, might be of doubtful import. I think it should be the invariable endeavor of the court to harmonize all parts of a will relating to the same subject matter, so as to give meaning and effect, and consistent ones if possible, to every clause relating to the same devise. It should never create a repugnancy, if it can reasonably be avoided.

I do not think that there is necessarily any repugnancy between the different clauses of article five of the will. This article reads: "I grant and devise to my beloved wife, Malvina M. Jeudvine, one half of the residue of my estate, both real and personal; and it is my will that the proceeds of any policy of insurance on my life which my wife may receive shall be computed as a part of the share given her by this will, and subject to the conditions specified in article numbered eight in this will, relating to my home premises. The foregoing grant and devise to my wife is for her sole use, control and enjoyment during her life, trusting and expecting that she will use and dispose of the whole thereof as she may desire, and that she will give the residue, if any remains at her death, by her will to such persons, and for such purposes as she may desire. But inasmuch as I desire that such residue at her decease shall in no event pass to her legal heirs, if undisposed of by her, I give, grant and devise one half of the same to the University of Vermont and State Agricultural College, in the same manner as named in article number six of this will, and the other half to be held and expended by said executors for the purpose named in article number seven in this will, meaning what is unappropriated by my wife before her decease."

In the first part of the first sentence of this article the testator used language, if that were all, appropriate to convey an absolute estate to the wife. He then made the proceeds of his life insurance a part of the half of the residue, and closes the sentence with, "and subject to the conditions specified in article numbered eight in this will, relating to my home premises." Turning to article 8, we find that the wife is given only a life estate in the home premises. Hence by the express terms of the will, at least in that part of the half of the residue received from his life insurance, the wife takes only a life estate. But I think it is no departure from the ordinary use of language, nor from the usual rules of construction, to make the last clause of the sentence apply to the whole devise rather than to limit its application to the proceeds received from his life insurance. By this construction only a life estate is given by the first sentence of this article.

The second sentence, in terms, is made to apply to the devise made by the first sentence, and must be read as a part of it. It reads: "The foregoing grant and devise to my wife is for her sole use, control and enjoyment during her natural life." Thus far this sentence discloses only a life estate, and is consistent with the first sentence as I have construed it. It then proceeds: "Trusting and expecting that she will use and dispose of the whole thereof as she may desire, and that she will give the residue, if any remains at her death, by her will to such persons, and for such purposes, as she may desire." By this clause the testator clearly confers upon the wife the power to dispose of what she receives, a life use under this devise, by gift inter vivos or by will. What need had he to make this explicit provision if he had given to her the property covered by this devise in fee absolute? The two parts of this sentence, taken together, relate, in terms, to the property devised by the first sentence, and, if need be, limit the estate granted to a life estate, coupled with the power of disposal by gift inter vivos or by will. On this construction no inconsistency nor repugnancy arises, thus far, in the terms creating the devise.

Then comes the third and last sentence of the article, which only emphasizes the construction already given. It is: "But inasmuch as I desire that such residue shall in no event pass to her legal heirs, if undisposed of by her, I give" etc., making a devise over of whatever she may leave undisposed of under the power conferred. Here is a clearly expressed intention that his wife shall not take absolute title to the property granted by this devise, inasmuch as it must not descend to her heirs. My brethren wholly disregard the clearly expressed intention of the testator by giving such a construction to the preceding sentences that the wife takes an absolute title to the property covered by this devise. Thus they create a war between the different provisions of the devise. It seems to me an endeavor to create by construction, rather than to avoid a repugnancy. I do not concur in that portion of the opinion of my associates.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

v.

SIOUX VALLEY STATE BANK, Appt.

(....Iowa....)

The grantee in a quitclaim deed takes it with notice of prior equities, and is not protected against an unrecorded bond for a deed for value by Code, § 1941, which provides that "no instrument affecting real estate is of any validity against subsequent purchasers . . . without notice."

(February 5, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant, the Sioux Valley State Bank, from a judgment of the District Court for Woodbury County in favor of plaintiffs in an action to foreclose a bond for a deed to certain premises. Affirmed.

Statement by Granger, J.:

The issues involve a question of the priority of the liens of the respective parties, the necessary facts as to the liens of each being as follows: One B. F. Lauber, being the owner of 240 acres of land, was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $4,700, and, for the purpose of securing the debt, Lauber made to the plaintiffs a bond for a deed of the premises in question on the 8th day of June, 1887. This bond was not recorded. Lauber, being also indebted to the defendant in the sum of $5,000, made to it a quitclaim deed of the same premises, June 14, 1887, to secure the debt. The defendant, when it received the deed, had no actual knowledge of the bond held by the plaintiffs. The bond of Lauber to the plaintiffs was placed on record June 25, 1887, prior to which time Lauber had absconded, and was insolvent.

These facts are sufficient to present the main question in the case.

The district court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, from which the defendant appeals.

Messrs. Hubbard, Spalding & Taylor, for appellant:

The case here presented is one exactly parallel to the case of Pettingill v. Devin, 35 Iowa, 353. That case is the law of this State. It has never been overruled, and upon this point, has been criticised but once, and then to reaffirm and justify it.

The law of the State as to the effect of quitclaim deeds is founded upon—

Watson v. Phelps, 40 Iowa, 482; Smith v. Dunton, 42 Iowa, 50; Besore v. Dosh, 43 Iowa, 212. See Springer v. Bartle, 46 Iowa, 688.

The quitclaim deed and warranty deed differ only in this: in the quitclaim the grantor is silent as to his title, and in the warranty he assures the purchaser that he has title. Each is equally efficient in conveying all the grantor can convey. The quitclaim is not a negation of title; it is mere silence. Under such circumstances what further burden ought to be imposed upon the purchaser than inquiry; and such seems to be the doctrine of many cases. This doctrine reconciles many of their apparent inconsistencies and seems to be the ground of the decisions as to purchasers with warranty from holders of quitclaims.

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It will be observed that the question is fairly presented as to the effect of a quitclaim deed given for a consideration, without actual notice of, and after the execution and delivery of, an unrecorded bond for a deed for value. Counsel for appellant commence their argument with this statement: "The case here is one exactly parallel to the case of Pettingill v. Devin, 35 Iowa, 353;" and we think the statement true. Appellees do not, as we understand, controvert it, but urge that the Pettingill Case has been repeatedly overruled, and is no longer the law of the State. The arguments in the case are mainly devoted to the question of how the case of Pettingill v. Devin is affected by subsequent rulings. It may be said that the case is nowhere in terms overruled. As to the necessary or legal effect of other decisions upon it, we must inquire.

A reference to the Pettingill Case will show how nearly the facts of the two cases are alike as to the particular question involved. Coffin held an unrecorded bond, of which the defendant Devin had no actual notice. Devin afterwards obtained a quitclaim deed, for which he paid a consideration. It was held that the quitclaim deed took precedence of the unrecorded bond. The holding was based largely on section 2220 of the Revision of 1880, as follows: "No instrument affecting real estate is of any validity against subsequent purchasers, for a valuable consideration, without notice, unless recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county in which the land lies, as hereinafter provided." Section 1941 of the Code is identical in its language.

This court has repeatedly held that the holder of a quitclaim deed takes it charged with knowledge of prior equities; that he is not an innocent holder. To a proper disposition of the question before us, it is important that we consider, to some extent, at least, the particular facts under which these holdings were announced; and we think it may be done in a general way, without referring to each particular case. Appellant, recognizing the fact that, including the Pettingill Case, two rules have been announced as to the effect of a quitclaim deed, makes this statement: "The cases decided by this court, in which the broad doctrine is announced that a purchaser taking a quitclaim takes subject to equities, are all of them based upon one of two thoughts,—either all the right, title and interest of the person executing the quitclaim have been previously conveyed, so that he has no right, title and interest to convey, or some equity not at all dependent upon a written instrument, or the record thereof, has arisen against the land." We do not see how the fact that the grantor in the quitclaim deed had, before its execution, disposed of all his interest in the land could make or justify a different rule; and we find no intimation in any of the cases that that fact is made the basis for a distinction. Under such a rule, if A, being the owner of land, should dispose of it to B, and, without actual or constructive notice, should quitclaim to C, the latter would, by operation of law, be charged with notice of B's interest. Now, if instead of conveying the entire estate to B, A should convey an undivided one-half, and a quitclaim should be made to C, with the facts as before stated as to notice, C could take the land discharged of B's equities. Before such a distinction is maintained, it should have the support of authority or strong reason, and we discover neither. The latter part of appellant's statement, that the cases are based on "some equity not at all dependent upon a written instrument, or the record thereof," has support in some of the cases; and we think, if the distinction is to be maintained, it must be on that theory.

In the case of Springer v. Bartle, 46 Iowa, 690, the court, having under consideration the protection afforded by a quitclaim deed as against the fraudulent title of the grantor, used this language: "Ide quitclaimed to the defendant all his right, title and interest in and to the land in controversy. It was held in Watson v. Phelps, 40 Iowa, 483, that 'one holding under such a deed is not to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice of equities held by others.' In an argument evidencing much ability, we are asked to overrule this decision; and counsel in their zeal claim that this court has held otherwise in Pettingill v. Devin, 85 Iowa, 858. This is a grave mistake. No such point was presented in that case. The point decided was that, under the Recording Act, a person holding under a quitclaim deed acquired a prior right to one claiming under a bond for a deed, of which he did not have notice. In that case the party executing the quitclaim deed owned the legal title; but in the case at bar, Ide's title was tainted with fraud, against which the quitclaim deed did not protect the plaintiff. Besides which, the Statute expressly provides that such a purchaser as Devin is protected against a prior unrecorded conveyance. Code, § 1941. The doctrine announced in Watson v. Phelps was approved in Smith v. Dunton, 42 Iowa, 48; Light v. West, Id. 138, and Besore v. Dosh, 48 Iowa, 211. These decisions meet our approbation, and we are unwilling to take, at this late day, the time and space requisite to vindicate their correctness."

In that case it will be seen that the equity as to which the quitclaim deed was held subject was not one that would have been manifest if all instruments of conveyance had been recorded.

The cases of Watson v. Phelps, Smith v. Dunton and Besore v. Dosh are all ruled on facts of like legal import. The record of conveyances would not have given notice of the equities involved. The following cases sustain the same legal proposition: Winkler v. Miller, 54 Iowa, 476; Ballou v. Lucas, 59 Iowa, 24; Kaiser v. Waggoner, 59 Iowa, 41; Laraway v. Larue, 63 Iowa, 412; Butler v. Barkley, 67 Iowa, 491; Bradley v. Cole, 87 Iowa, 653.

There are, however, some cases where the facts are different, and where the equities urged as against a quitclaim deed would have been apparent from the recording of the instruments under which claims were made, but where they were not recorded.

In the case of Wightman v. Spofford, 56 Iowa, 145, it must be taken for granted that the contracts and instruments there referred to were not recorded, as, if they were of record, the questions discussed could not have well arisen. The only equities in the case, as it was ruled, arose out of contracts and deeds of conveyance which might have been of record. There, Casaday, who owned the land and had given a contract of sale under which plaintiff indirectly claimed the title, afterwards gave to Robertson a quitclaim deed, by virtue of which Robertson claimed the title. The court, in disposing of Robertson's interest, used these words: "As he bases his title upon a quitclaim deed, he cannot be regarded as a purchaser without notice of plaintiff's equities." The facts of the case, so far as pertains to their legal significance, are not different from those of Pettingill v. Devin.

In Raymond v. Morrison, 59 Iowa, 371, Wellington had conveyed the land by deed to Downey, whose deed was not recorded. Wellington afterwards quitclaimed to Varnum, and on the trial it was sought to be established that Varnum had knowledge to put him on inquiry as to the deed to Downey; but this court practically dismissed the inquiry as immaterial, holding that, as he held under a quitclaim deed, he could not be regarded as a good-faith purchaser.

The same rule is expressed in the case of Fogg v. Holcomb, 64 Iowa, 621, where the controversy is based on muniments of title. It is said that one who holds by a quitclaim deed cannot be regarded as an innocent purchaser of the land for value.

A very pointed case, upon a similar state of facts, is that of Postel v. Palmer, 71 Iowa, 157. Norton owned the land, and executed a conveyance to Brown in October, 1873, which conveyance was not recorded. On the 31st day of March, 1884, he conveyed the land to the plaintiff by quitclaim deed. There is no pretense of actual notice. The opinion says: "That conveyance, as we have stated, was a mere quitclaim; and by it plaintiff could acquire no right against outstanding equities which were valid as against Norton."

It thus appears that in four different cases, from 1881 to 1887, this court has held to a rule at variance with that of Pettingill v. Devin, and under facts which render the holdings inconsistent; and in effect they must overrule the former case, if they are to stand as the law of the State. Is there any reason why the former should remain the rule in preference to the latter? As has been said, the former case depends largely for its support on the Recording Act of the State. Of course, the Statute, in the true spirit, should prevail; and, if that spirit is reflected in the Pettingill Case, the holding therein announced should be sustained, even to the overruling of the other cases. As to any support the Pettingill Case may have independent of the Statute, we must look to other States, as the decisions of this court in all the other cases cited in this opinion are against it. It may be conceded that the courts of other States are not in harmony as to the effect of a quitclaim deed. Its effect generally has been discussed in this State, and the holding of the court is by no means doubtful.

In discussing generally the effect of a quitclaim deed, Mr. Chief Justice Adams used these words in Winkler v. Miller, supra: "Woodward, who derived title by quitclaim deed, could not be deemed a bona fide purchaser without notice. . . . Where a person purchases of another, who is willing to give only a quitclaim deed, he may properly enough be regarded as bound to inquire and ascertain at his peril what outstanding equities exist, if any. His grantor virtually declares to him that he will not warrant the title, even as against himself; and it may be presumed that the purchase price was fixed accordingly."

In the case of Woodward v. Jewell, 25 Fed. Rep. 691, speaking of the effect of a quitclaim deed, the court says: "This question has been adjudicated by the courts of the several States so as to leave a distressing conflict of authorities; but the Supreme Court of the United States has settled the rule for our guidance here. They hold that a grantee in a quitclaim deed cannot defend as a bona fide purchaser without notice."

A few brief extracts will indicate the views and holding of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the effect of a quitclaim deed.

In Oliver v. Piatt, 44 U. S. 8 How. 410 [11 L. ed. 657], the court said: "Another significant circumstance is that this very agreement contained a stipulation that Oliver should give a quitclaim deed only for the tracts; and the subsequent deeds given by Oliver to him were accordingly drawn up without any covenants of warranty, except against persons claiming under Oliver, or his heirs and assigns. In legal effect, therefore, they did convey no more than Oliver's right, title and interest in the property; and under such circumstances it is difficult to conceive how he can claim protection as a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice, against any title paramount to that of Oliver, which attached itself as an unextinguished trust to the tracts."

Also, in May v. LeClair, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 217 [20 L. ed. 50], it is said: "On the 27th of July, 1859, Dessaint conveyed, by a deed of quitclaim, to Ebenezer Cook. The evidence satisfies us that Cook had full notice of the frauds of Powers, and of the infirmities of Dessaint's title. Whether this were so or not, having acquired his title by a quitclaim deed, he cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice. In such cases the conveyance passes the title as the grantor held it, and the grantee takes only what the grantor could lawfully convey."

In Gest v. Packwood, 34 Fed. Rep. 372, it is said, speaking of a quitclaim deed: "Notice sufficient to prevent the purchaser from being bona fide is said to adhere in the very form of this kind of a conveyance. . . . In such a case the purchaser only takes whatever the grantor could lawfully convey,—what there is left in him." The holding is supported by a reference to Oliver v. Piatt.

It would be fruitless to cite largely from state decisions on this question. The rulings of the majority of the state courts are in harmony with those of federal courts on this question.

In Johnson v. Williams, 37 Kan. 179, it is said: "In nearly all cases between individuals, where land is sold or conveyed, and where there is no doubt about the title, a general warranty deed is given; and it is only in cases where there is a doubt concerning the title that only a quitclaim deed is given or received. Hence, when a party takes a quitclaim deed he knows he is taking a doubtful title, and is put upon inquiry as to the title. The very form of the deed indicates to him that the grantor has doubts concerning the title; and the deed itself is notice to him that he is getting only a doubtful title."

Barring the case of Pettingill v. Devin, the authorities in this State are in accord with those of the federal courts; and, to our minds, the reasoning of the cases cited, independent of statutory considerations, is unanswerable. Let us look to the Statute to see if it is controlling in importance. Code, § 1970, gives a form for quitclaim deeds as follows: "The following, or other equivalent forms, varied to suit circumstances, are sufficient, for the purposes therein contemplated, for a quitclaim deed: 'For the consideration of — dollars, I hereby quitclaim to A. B. all my interest in the following,' etc." It is apparent that no more is contemplated by such a conveyance than to convey the interest of the grantor, whatever it may be. It should be noticed that in this form of deed the grantor does not covenant or say that he has the title or any interest. In this respect it is in marked contrast with the ordinary deed of conveyance, which expresses exactly what the title owner can and should express, and what the purchaser desires. It in no sense purports to convey a title, not even by inference. If it was there by legal inference, then the grantor would be liable for its failure; and such is not the effect of a quitclaim deed.

It is practically said in Gest v. Packwood, supra, that the deed is itself a notice of a want of or a defect in the title. These deeds are generally taken upon a venture. The idea is: "I may get something, or I may not." This court, in the cases cited, has many times said that the holder of the quitclaim deed takes it with notice of prior equities. Looking to Code, § 1941, its language makes it inapplicable to such a state of facts. Its language is that "no instrument affecting real estate is of any validity against subsequent purchasers . . . without notice," etc. If the representation of such a deed is notice of a defect in or a want of title, then the holder cannot take without notice, and stands unprotected by the Statute. We think the case of Pettingill v. Devin must be regarded as overruled by subsequent decisions.

2. A question is made in the case as to the dower interest of Mrs. Lauber, it appearing that when she signed the bond to plaintiffs she had no information that it was intended as security, instead of an actual sale. We do not see how, under the state of this record, this fact would change the result. The actual consideration, $4,700, was paid, and if the property is taken for that consideration, even by the process of foreclosure, how can she complain? She has merely parted with what she intended to, for the consideration intended. No prejudice has resulted to her from a variance as to facts, nor does she complain. Neither can the variance as to facts prejudice the defendant.

3. It is urged that the defendant was in fact a good-faith purchaser, or parted with its money in good faith, relying upon the record as to the condition of the title. Of this we have no doubt; but, with our holding as to the legal status of the holder of such a deed, the legal presumption must prevail as against the facts as claimed.

We think the judgment of the District Court right, and it is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Joel B. ERHARDT, Receiver of the New York City & Northern R. Co., Resp.

(....N.Y....)

1. Independently of any statutory requirement a railroad company is chargeable with the duty to fence its track if required by reasonable prudence and care to keep the track free from obstructions, animate and inanimate.
2. Injury to a brakeman from collision of the train with an animal which has come upon the railroad track through a defective fence, makes the company liable for the damages under the General Railroad Act of 1850, § 44, which imposes upon railroad companies the absolute duty to fence their tracks.

(February 26, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, reversing a judgment of the Trial Term entered upon a verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's neglect to obey the provisions of the Statute requiring it to fence its track. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. Hector M. Hitchings, for appellant:

The Statute compelling railroad companies to erect and maintain fences and cattle-guards was passed for the benefit of the traveling public as well as farmers contiguous thereto, and is not limited in its scope and effect by the penalty set out therein.

NOTE.—Duty of railroad companies to fence their tracks. See note to Gallagher v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 5 L. R. A. 737.

The statute imposes upon railroad companies the duty not only to erect proper fences of the height and strength of division fences, but also to maintain and keep the same in perfect repair.

Staats v. Hudson River R. Co. supra; Spinner v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Hun, 600; Boone, Corp. § 253.

Entirely irrespective of any statute the railroad company was bound to build and maintain fences and cattle-guards for the safety of its passengers and employees.

Mr. Sherman Evarts, for respondent:

At common law there was no duty imposed upon a railroad company to fence the sides of its tracks or use any means for keeping cattle from its property, and the plaintiff would have no right against the company for such failure.

Corwin v. New York & E. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 42; Spinner v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 153; Munger v. Tonawanda R. Co. 4 N. Y. 849; Langlois v. Buffalo & R. R. Co. 19 Barb. 864.

The Statute does not impose a general liability for failure to fence.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While the plaintiff, in 1887, was in the employ of the defendant, as a brakeman upon a train of cars, in the night-time, the train came in collision with a horse upon the railroad track, and was thereby wrecked, and he was seriously injured. He brought this action to recover damages for his injuries, claiming that the horse got upon the railroad track because the defendant had carelessly and negligently permitted the fence along the railroad to become ruinous, broken down and out of repair, and that it had therefore violated the duty imposed upon it by section 44 of the General Railroad Act of 1850, which requires railroad companies to build and maintain fences on the sides of their roads of the height and strength of division fences, and that so long as such fences and cattle-guards shall not be made, and when not in good repair, such railroad corporation and its agents shall be liable for damages which shall be done by the agents or engines of any such corporation to any cattle, horses, sheep or hogs thereon. The claim of the defendant was that at common law, independently of the Statute, the railroad company would not have been liable for the accident which happened to the plaintiff, and that the Statute specified the extent of the liability imposed upon a railroad corporation for its omission to build or maintain fences, and that thus it was liable only for damages done to animals coming upon the railroad track through a defective fence. The trial judge, however, submitted the case to the jury, and instructed them that if this horse came upon the railroad through a fence which the defendant was bound to maintain and keep in repair, and which was negligently permitted to be out of repair, the plaintiff could recover; and the jury rendered a verdict in his favor. From the judgment entered upon the verdict the defendant appealed to the general term, and there the judgment was reversed upon the 7 L. R. A.

ground that the only responsibility of a railroad company for defective fences is that mentioned in the Statute, and that at common law, independently of the Statute, a railroad company would not have been liable to the plaintiff for the injuries sustained by him.

We think the learned general term fell into error. A railroad company, for the safety of its passengers, as well as its employes upon its engines and cars, is bound to use suitable care and skill in furnishing not only adequate engines and cars, but also a safe and proper track and road-bed. The track must be properly laid, and the road-bed properly constructed, and reasonable prudence and care must be exercised in keeping the track free from obstructions, animate and inanimate; and if, from want of proper care, such obstructions are permitted to be or come upon the track, and a train is thereby wrecked, and any person thereon is injured, the railroad company, upon plain common-law principles, must be held responsible. Experience shows that animals may stray upon a railroad track, and that, if they do, there is danger that a train may come in collision with them, and be wrecked; and adequate measures, reasonable in their nature, must be taken to guard against such danger. Independently of any statutory requirement, a jury might find, upon the facts of a case, that it was the duty of a railroad company to fence its track, to guard against such danger. But, whatever the rule would be, independently of the Statute, there is no reasonable doubt that it imposes the absolute duty upon a railroad company to fence its tracks. That duty, it is reasonable to suppose, was imposed not only to protect the lives of animals, but also to protect human beings upon railroad trains. It is made an unqualified duty; and for a violation thereof, causing injury, the railroad company incurs responsibility. The sole consequence of an omission of the statutory duty is not specified, and was not intended to be specified in the Statute. Responsibility for injuries to animals was specially imposed, because in most cases there would, independently of the Statute, have been no such responsibility, as at common law the owner of animals was bound to restrain them; and, if they trespassed upon a railroad there was no liability for their destruction, unless it was willfully or intentionally caused. We are therefore of the opinion that the Railroad Company was responsible to the plaintiff for the injuries which he received, without any fault on his part; and for this conclusion there is much authority in judicial utterances to be found in the books. Corwin v. New York & E. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 42; Jetter v. New York & H. R. Co. 2 Keyes, 162; Staats v. Hudson River R. Co. 3 Keyes, 196; Brown v. New York Cent. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 404; Shepard v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 641; Purdy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 61 N. Y. 353; Jones v. Seligman, 81 N. Y. 190; Graham v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 48 Hun, 386. The case of Langlois v. Buffalo & R. R. Co., 19 Barb. 864, so far as it holds a different doctrine, does not meet with our approval.

The order of the General Term should therefore be reversed, and the judgment entered upon the verdict affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

4. He may remove, and dispose of as his own, such excess.
5. If he sell as his own any grain beyond such excess without express consent of the depositors, his sale passes no title, and the owners, the depositors, may follow the grain into the hands of the purchaser, and recover of him for a conversion.

(February 18, 1890.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action to recover the value of certain grain which had been purchased by defendants from a warehouseman with whom plaintiff had deposited it for safe keeping. Affirmed.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ralph Whelan, for appellants:

All that the law requires is that upon presentation of the receipt the warehouseman will have forthcoming a like quantity of grain of

NOTE.—Warehousemen as bailees.

A warehouseman cannot have possession of another man's property, with its accompanying duties and responsibilities, forced upon him against his will. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Central Stockyard & Transit Co. 45 N. J. Eq. 60.

A warehouseman is responsible for the safety and security of goods after delivery in the warehouse on Sunday, although all labor on Sunday, except that of necessity or charity, is prohibited by statute in Virginia, the safe keeping of the goods being a work of necessity. Powhatan Steamboat Co. v. Appomattox R. Co. 65 U. S. 24 How. 247 (16 L. ed. 632).

The implied undertaking of a warehouseman is not that he will at all events keep the goods safely, but that he will use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in keeping them. Willett v. Rich, 2 New Eng. Rep. 672, 142 Mass. 366.

In an action of replevin for the possession of goods receipted for by an elevator proprietor, parol evidence is competent to show whether the contract was intended as a sale or a bailment. Lyon v. Lenon, 4 West. Rep. 481, 108 Ind. 467.

A receipt by a warehouseman for wheat delivered to him, providing that it is stored at the owner's risk, where nothing is charged for storage, and no time fixed during which it was to be left, except until the owner was ready to sell it, and no agreement that it should be mixed, or that the warehouseman might sell, ship or consume it,—constitutes a bailment, and not a sale. O'Dell v. Leyda, 46 Ohio St. 244.

Legislative control over business of warehousing.

The Legislature has power to declare what service warehousemen shall render to the public, and to fix the compensation that may be demanded for such service; but until such power is exercised, warehousemen are at liberty to use their warehouses as they please. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Central Stockyard & Transit Co. 45 N. J. Eq. 60.

A state statute fixing the maximum of charges for the storage of grain is not unconstitutional as a regulation of commerce, although the warehouses affected are used by those engaged in interstate commerce, as well as in commerce within the State. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113 (24 L. ed. 77).

The remedies provided by Minn. Gen. Laws 1876, chap. 86, §§ 3, 4, regulating the storage of grain (Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, pp. 1012, 1013), are not exclusive, but are in addition to such as previously existed at common law or by statute in case of the conversion of personal property by a bailee. Daniels v. Palmer (Minn.) 42 N. W. Rep. 855.

The Revised Statutes of Indiana, defining the rights and liabilities of warehousemen, do not affect the rights of innocent purchasers. Preston v. Witherspoon, 7 West. Rep. 71, 108 Ind. 467.

The duty of the warehouseman is performed when he gets the property into his own possession before he issues the receipt and transfers the possession, when demanded, to the lawful holder of the receipt. He does not guarantee the title of the holder of the receipt. Mechanics & T. Ins. Co. v. Kiger, 103 U. S. 352 (26 L. ed. 433).

The Factors' Act (N. Y. Laws 1830, chap. 179) has no application to a case where protection would secure to a wrong-doer the fruits of a fraud. Dorance v. Dean, 7 Cent. Rep. 695, 106 N. Y. 203.

Warehouse receipts.

Under Act 1875, a warehouse receipt is negotiable, unless it is marked "non-negotiable" across its face; and the indorsement thereof by the party to whose order it is issued passes the absolute title to the property mentioned therein to the indorsee. Blahop v. Fulkerth, 68 Cal. 607.

An indorsement of a warehouse receipt which is payable to bearer is necessary to convey the legal title. But delivery of the receipt without indorsement is sufficient to create a valid pledge as to persons not having acquired intervening rights. Alabama State Bank v. Barnes, 82 Ala. 607.

A warehouseman may issue receipts for his own property stored in his warehouse, and by their delivery pledge it for his own debts. Ibid.

A warehouseman may pledge wheat by delivering his warehouse receipt to the pledgee; and if, in the course of his business, he sells the wheat and purchases other, the latter becomes appropriated to the contract as the property of the pledgee or depositor. National Exch. Bank v. Wilder, 84 Minn. 149.

The owner of goods may recover them in replevin from a warehouseman to whom they had been pledged by a broker who procured possession of them fraudulently for the purpose of selling them to an undisclosed principal, when in fact there was no principal, although a sale had been entered on the owner's books as a sale directly to the broker. Rodliff v. Dallinger, 1 New Eng. Rep. 608, 141 Mass. 1 the same kind and grade as that deposited. Grain subsequently purchased and stored by the warehouseman takes the place of that originally placed in store by the depositor, and is appropriated to the contract contained in the warehouse receipt, so as to become his property.

Nat. Etch. Bank v. Wilder, 34 Minn. 149; Fishback v. VanDusen, 38 Minn. 111.

After the delivery of said wheat to be stored, therefore, respondents Ehle & Co. were under no obligations, contractual or imposed by law, to respondent concerning said identical wheat, but they became the absolute owners of the same.

Appellants' intermeddling with plaintiff's property is excusable on the ground that it was done under a reasonable, though mistaken, supposition of lawful title or authority.

Pollock, Torts, 272.

Ehle & Co. were engaged in buying wheat for and on account of appellants as their agent. The right of possession and the actual possession of all wheat so purchased passed to Ehle & Co., subject to divertment pursuant to the terms of their contract of agency with appellants.

Story, Ag. § 34; Cool v. Phillips, 66 Ill. 216.

After Ehle & Co. had purchased and received such wheat, the relation between them and appellants assumed the nature of the contractual relation of bailment.

Edwards, Bailm. § 2; Schouler, Bailm. 340.

These rights and obligations give to appellants the right to have delivery of certain wheat made to them, out of said warehouse, pursuant to the terms of their contract of agency with Ehle & Co.

Under this state of facts, any exercise of dominion over or any intermeddling with said "certain wheat" by appellants in the exercise of their right of receiving delivery from said warehouse of said "certain wheat" or as bona fide purchasers for value from Ehle & Co., without notice of respondent's property rights, would certainly be "done under a reasonable, though mistaken, supposition of lawful title or authority" in appellants.

Preston v. Witherspoon, 7 West. Rep. 71, 109 Ind. 457.

Wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has en-

The fact that a warehouse receipt of goods deposited to secure a debt is made as if received from the creditor for whose benefit the deposit is made does not pay such debt or give the creditor or his agent a right to the possession of the goods, where it is never delivered to him, as against a third person loaning money thereupon to the person making the deposit. Lowrie v. Salz, 75 Cal. 348.

Under the Minnesota Grain-Warehouse Law of 1876, no distinction can be made between a person who makes an actual delivery of his grain at a public warehouse, and a pledgee of the grain of the warehouseman (actually upon deposit in the warehouse), who leaves it in store with the proprietor as his bailee, taking a warehouse receipt therefor. Eggers v. National Bank of Commerce, 40 Minn. 182.

Obligation to return the thing bailed.

A bailee for safe keeping must return the thing bailed to the bailor, or according to the bailor's directions. He cannot require proof that the bailor is also the owner. McCafferty v. Brady (Pa.) 7 Cent. Rep. 597, 19 W. N. C. 553.

A failure or refusal, by a warehouseman, to deliver on demand goods intrusted to him is prima facie evidence of negligence, sufficient to cast upon him the burden of accounting for nondelivery. Burnell v. New York Cent. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 184, 6 Am. Rep. 61; Coleman v. Livingston, 4 Jones & S. 32, 45 How. Pr. 433; Fairfax v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 11 Jones & S. 18, 87 N. Y. 11; *Schwerin v. #### Warehouse receipts void for indefiniteness.

Where a wool merchant leases part of his store to warehousemen, who, without going into possession, issue warehouse receipts to him for wool which he stores on the premises and of which he retains control, the wool not being marked or set apart, and abled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it.

Gillfillan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint. From the complaint it appears, in brief, that the firm of G. W. Ehle & Co. operated and conducted, for the storage of grain, a grain warehouse at Stewart, in this State. Fifteen different owners of grain, plaintiff being one of them, deposited at different times with said Ehle & Co., in said warehouse, for storage, different quantities of wheat, the aggregate amount so deposited being 2,647½ bushels, and upon each of such deposits each depositor received from Ehle & Co. the usual warehouse or elevator receipt for the amount so deposited, with, however, this clause (unusual, we think): that if, for any reason, it should become necessary to remove such grain, Ehle & Co. reserved the right to deliver the grain from any other warehouse operated by them, etc. As the mere desire on the part of Ehle & Co.

to sell the grain so deposited could not be regarded as a reason for removal under this clause, and no reason of necessity for its removal appears, we need not further consider that clause. None of the receipts so issued were redeemed. Ehle & Co., without the knowledge or consent of the receipt holders, sold and shipped to defendants, and they converted to their own use, so much of the wheat so deposited that there was left in the warehouse, to meet the outstanding receipts, amounting to 2,647½, only 1,144 bushels. This latter quantity was then distributed pro rata to the outstanding receipts. All the receipts other than those received by him have been sold to plaintiff. He brings the action to recover for a conversion of the wheat so sold and shipped to defendants.

It being a general rule of law that a purchaser of personal property gets ordinarily no better title than his vendor has, it will be necessary to consider what was the right or title of Ehle & Co. in or to the wheat; that is to consider what are the rights in respect to grain stored in a general grain warehouse of the depositor and depositee. This must be determined by the Statute regulating such warehouses and deposits, being of various grades not specified in the receipts, such receipts are void for indefiniteness, as against the other creditors of the merchant, upon his making a voluntary assignment. Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull (Ill.) 23 N. E. Rep. 355.

A warehouse receipt issued by a person who is not a public warehouseman does not give the holder any lien as against the receiptor's creditors. Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull (Ill.) 23 N. E. Rep. 355.

Assignment and sale of property.

One who sells personal property to be paid for in cash on delivery of a warehouse receipt, the seller retaining the receipt, has priority of lien over the assignee in insolvency of the purchaser. Rhodes v. Mooney, 2 West. Rep. 364, 43 Ohio St. 421.

Where barrels of flour and pork lying in a warehouse were purchased and paid for, and the purchaser received a written memorandum of the sale and a receipt for the money from the warehousemen, with an engagement to deliver them on board of canal boats soon after the opening of canal navigation, these documents transferred the property to the possession of the purchaser. Gibson v. Stevens, 49 U. S. 8 How. 384 (12 L. ed. 1123).

The indorsement of a delivery order upon warehouse documents of title is a sufficiently formal assignment of the property. Ibid.

A warehouse receipt given to persons in pursuance of an agreement that they were to advance on the property, dispose of it, and receive their pay therefrom, confers on them full power to dispose of the property for advances under such contract. McCullough v. Roots, 80 U. S. 19 How. 349 (15 L. ed. 681).

A license to the person giving such receipt, to prepare the property for market and select the markets and purchasers, was an indulgence to him, and did not diminish the rights of the plaintiffs in the property, or their powers under the contract. Whatever sales were made by him were made as agents of plaintiffs, and they were entitled to the price. He was not in condition to dispute plaintiffs' title; and his authority to a purchaser to appropriate the price as a credit upon another demand was fraud upon plaintiffs' rights. Ibid.

Tenancy in common in mass or bulk.

The deposit in a warehouse of wheat which becomes mingled with the wheat of other persons is a 7 L. R. A.

bailment, and the depositor does not, by reason of such mingling, lose his right to reclaim his wheat. McBee v. Caesar, 15 Or. 62.

Where several depositors have wheat stored in a warehouse, in a common mass, and a deficiency occurs, from whatever cause, not occasioned by the fault of any such depositors, the loss must be borne by each of them who were depositors at the time the loss occurred in the proportion which the amount of his wheat bears to the whole amount deposited. Brown v. Northcutt, 14 Or. 529.

Where depositors of wheat with an elevator company knew that it was commingled with wheat purchased by the company, and that the latter was selling from the common mass, such deposit clothed the company with an apparent ownership and authority to sell, which estops the depositors to assert their title thereto, as against an innocent purchaser for value believing the ownership to be in the elevator company; and the purchaser cannot be affected by any private negotiations between the depositors and the company. Preston v. Witherspoon, 7 West. Rep. 71, 109 Ind. 457.

Where a warehouseman gave a receipt for wheat which he did not receive, it did not pass the title to any specific wheat in his warehouse; and where the wheat actually on deposit there was afterwards divided among the respective depositors, an assignee of the fictitious receipt could not maintain replevin for any part of such wheat. Jackson v. Hale, 55 U. S. 14 How. 625 (14 L. ed. 526).

Where a depositor has received the full quantity of the wheat deposited by him, or a larger proportion than his ratable share in view of such deficiency, he is bound to account to the other depositors for such excess, according to the proportion of the loss. Brown v. Northcutt, 14 Or. 529.

Liability of warehousemen for negligence.

A warehouseman is liable for injuries to goods stored by him for hire, from his want of ordinary care under the circumstances. Doyle v. Mays (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 185.

Warehousemen are to be charged only upon proof of their negligence or that of their servants. Aldrich v. Boston & W. R. Co. 100 Mass. 31, 1 Am. Rep. 76; Finucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 315; Gilbert v. Dale, 5 Ad. & El. 542.

The keeper of a private bonded warehouse is only liable as an ordinary warehouseman, notwithstanding which is found in chapter 124, Gen. Stat. 1878, §§ 13-20, inclusive. In several cases we have considered some of the features of that Statute, but, although in Leuthold v. Fairchild, 35 Minn. 99, we assumed, rather than fully determined, that a warehouseman who, without the consent of the depositors, disposes of so much of the grain deposited with him that there is not enough left in the warehouse to meet his receipts outstanding, is liable to the holders of the receipts as for a conversion of their property, the question of the respective rights and relations of the depositor and depositee in such cases, and of the rights of a purchaser from the depositee, has never before been squarely brought before us.

The Statute was passed for the better protection of depositors in such general grain warehouses. The evils to be cured were those which were supposed to follow the prior rule of law,—the rule of the common law. That rule was that where a deposit was made of grain, or other like property, with the expectation that it would be commingled in a common mass of similar kind, deposited by different persons, so that its identity would necessarily be lost, and the undertaking of the depositee was not to redeliver the identical property deposited, but to deliver, in lieu thereof, an equal amount of the same kind of property, the title to the property deposited passed to the depositee. The deposit had the effect of a sale. The Statute changes this rule, and provides (§ 13, Gen. Stat. 1878) that "such delivery shall in all things be deemed and treated as a bailment, and not as a sale." Of course, it cannot be understood from this that the depositor's title to the identical grain remains. The Legislature must be taken to have had in view the way in which the business of such warehouses is, and of necessity must be, conducted. They are constantly receiving deposits of grain, and issuing receipts for it, and as constantly taking up outstanding receipts, and removing the amounts of grain called for by them, so that perhaps the same identical grain may not remain in the warehouse a week, though the amount in store is not diminished. The declaration that the delivery shall be deemed and treated as a bailment must be taken as meaning that the depositor shall be deemed to be the owner of, and to have on bailment in the warehouse, the amount of grain that he deposits, although its identity may have been lost by commingling with other, the like kind of grain, and although not a kernel of the identical ing there is a government store-keeper in charge. Macklin v. Frazier, 9 Bush, 3; Schwerin v. McKie, 5 Robt. 404, 51 N. Y. 180, 10 Am. Rep. 581; Clafin v. Meyer, 11 Jones & S. 1, 75 N. Y. 280, 31 Am. Rep. 467.

In an action against a railroad company to recover for a loss of goods through the negligence of the defendant as a warehouseman, a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, if supported by the evidence, will not be reversed merely because the complaint alleged that the defendant was liable as a common carrier. Boyt v. Nevada County N. G. R. Co. 68 Cal. 644.

Where goods deposited with a warehouseman were stolen, and the depositor demanded payment for them from him, and he finally agreed to pay a less sum than that claimed, in settlement, but paid only a part of it and suit was brought for the balance,—it was immaterial to the issue that he was not originally liable as warehousemen, the suit being brought upon the compromise agreement. Swem v. Green, 9 Colo. 358.

The assent of a shipper to delay by a warehouseman in forwarding cotton, which by reason of its surroundings was in unusual danger from fire, does not preclude the shipper from recovery for loss by fire during the delay, unless he knew of the danger. Merchants Wharfeboat Asso. v. Holdingsfelder, 64 Miss. 678.

Liability for torts.

A warehouseman wrongfully shipped wheat deposited by others for storage and delivered the bills of lading to a bank, together with drafts on the consignee. The bank discounted and indorsed the bills in blank and on payment of the drafts delivered the bills to the drawee. It was held that the bank is not liable to the owners of the wheat for conversion. Leuthold v. Fairchild, 35 Minn. 99.

Action is maintainable for falsely representing in a circular that defendant's warehouse was fire-proof on the outside, whereby plaintiff was induced to store therein certain property which was destroyed by fire communicated from the outside. Hickey v. Morrell, 3 Cent. Rep. 651, 102 N. Y. 454.

A consignee's indorsement and delivery of an elevator receipt is a conversion of the grain therein described, as against the holder of a draft drawn 7 L. R. A against it with transfer of bill of lading, of which the consignee had notice. Thompson, J., dissents. Hamlin v. Carruthers, 2 West. Rep. 423, 19 Mo. App. 567.

That the consignee may not have intended to act in violation of the rights of other persons is immaterial. Ibid.

A cause of action for a violation of the provisions of chapter 326 of 1858, as amended by chapter 440 of 1866, prohibiting any warehouseman from issuing any receipt for or upon any goods, wares or merchandise, to any person purporting to be the owner thereof, unless such goods, wares or merchandise shall have been actually received, is given by the concluding portion of § 7 of the said Act. Dean v. Driggs, 44 Hun, 490.

It is not necessary to prove that the defendant has willfully violated the provisions of the Act, but only that he has in fact violated them. Ibid.

Criminal Liability.

The Illinois Warehouse Act was intended for the protection of the public; and the issuance, by a warehouseman, to a bank, of receipts transferable by indorsement, purporting to be for property in store belonging to the bank, when in fact no such property was in store, and delivered by him to the bank as security for loans made by it to him, renders such warehouseman liable criminally, under § 25 of the Act, although he had no intent to thereby defraud the bank. Sykes v. People, 2 L. R. A. 461, 127 Ill. 117.

Section 25 was not repealed by implication by the passage of Ill. Crim. Code, §§ 124, 125, the provisions of the two Acts being distinct and not repugnant,—the offense created by the former consisting solely in issuing a receipt from which a fraudulent result may occur, and that created by the latter consisting in the making or uttering of a receipt for a fraudulent purpose or with fraudulent intent. Ibid.

That there was no intention to defraud is immaterial on the question of guilt under that section; the only intent necessary to be found to constitute the offense relates only to whether the warehouseman intended to issue the receipt knowing it to be false. Ibid.

grain deposited still remains. As fast as grain is removed, and other grain is put into the common mass, the new grain takes the place of that originally deposited, and is appropriated to the contract of bailment, so as to become the property of the depositor. National Exchange Bank v. Wilder, 84 Minn. 149.

The grain, of like kind and quality, of different depositors, not being kept separate, but put into a common mass, and each depositor owning the amount called for by his receipt, the different owners, owning the entire mass, own the mass as tenants in common, the interest of each being measured by the amount called for by his receipt. So, if the owner of the warehouse put his own grain into the mass he becomes a tenant in common of the entire body of the grain with the other owners. Ordinarily, the partition is to be made by the warehouseman, who, when a receipt is presented, and the grain it calls for demanded, and the conditions of the right to a delivery of it complied with, delivers to the holder, as his share of the entire body of grain under that receipt, the amount that it calls for. If the receipt holder is put to his action of replevin, the sheriff makes the separation. Section 16 of Statute.

But, while the interest of the depositor in the mass is measured by the amount he deposits, and mentioned in his receipt, the interest of the warehouseman, by reason of putting his own grain into the mass, is not necessarily measured by what he puts in; for if from any cause for which he is responsible, as by his taking grain out from the mass, the whole amount is diminished below what is required to fill the outstanding receipts, what he puts in is appropriated at once, so far as may be necessary, to the receipts, and becomes at once the property of the holders. Thus if there is a shortage thus arising of 200 bushels, and he puts in 400 bushels of his own, his interest in the mass after that is equal to 200 bushels, just the excess above what is required to fill the receipts. That amount, and no more, he has a right to take out and sell. It is true, it may be the practice—probably is—of warehousemen to take out and dispose of grain without reference to the relation which the amount in warehouse bears to the amount of the outstanding receipts. In other words, it may be their practice to dispose of the depositor's property. When this is done with the consent (such as the Statute requires) of the depositors, it is, of course, rightfully done; and in that case a sale by the warehouseman would pass the title. No presumption of consent on the part of the depositor could arise from the existence, however general, of such a practice. Such a practice is made unlawful.

Section 18 of the Statute provides: "No person receiving or holding grain in store shall sell, or otherwise dispose of, or deliver out of the storehouse or warehouse where such grain is held or stored, the same, or any part thereof, without the express authority of the owner of such grain, and the return of the receipt given for the same, except as herein provided."

If the warehouseman be also a dealer in grain, his right to dispose of, as his own, the grain in the warehouse, is limited to that which belongs to him, which he has purchased and put in, or, when deposited by others, which he has purchased from them, and to the excess above what is required to meet his outstanding receipts. The Statute clearly enacts that he shall not sell or otherwise dispose of grain on deposit. Its purpose is to provide that the grain shall remain in the warehouse where deposited, to meet the call of the owner. Ehle & Co. were not the owners of, they had no title to, the grain which they sold, or assumed to sell, to the defendants. It belonged to the holders of the receipts.

Much argument has been expended to show the inconvenience to commerce in grain if in such cases the owner of the grain may, notwithstanding a wrongful sale by the warehouseman, follow the grain into the hands of the purchaser. As touching the matter of convenience, the argument has much force. It might tend greatly to facilitate traffic in grain if we had, in respect to it, such a rule as in England pertains to property sold in markets overt. But there is no such rule in this country. The general rule is that an owner of personal property cannot be deprived of his right to it through the unauthorized act of another. That rule applies as well to grain or other property on deposit for the purpose of storing as to property in any other situation.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Henry C. ROCHE et al., Appts.,

v.

(....Md....)

1. Taxes upon city property and assessments thereon for street improvements must be paid by the life tenant, and he cannot compel the remainderman to contribute towards such payment.

2. The court of chancery had no jurisdiction in 1859 to order the sale of city real estate for the payment of taxes and street assessments, upon the joint petition of the life tenant and the infant remainderman suing by next friend, but for whom no guardian was appointed, and who was not made defendant nor summoned to answer the bill, although it was alleged that "it would be for the interest and advantage of all parties concerned."

3. The Legislature has no power to validate, by retroactive legislation, a judicial sale of real estate which was void for want of jurisdiction in the court to make it; at least not without making provision for compensating the owners of the property.

*An opinion was handed down in this case on December 18, 1889. A reargument was subsequently ordered, after which the opinion printed herewith was filed, which supersedes the other and renders it of no practical importance, and it is therefore omitted. [Rep.]

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore City dismissing the bill in a suit brought to ratify and confirm a judicial sale of certain real estate, and to procure a decree for the sale thereof. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Samuel D. Schmucker, George Whitelock and John S. Tyson, for appellants:

If the case of Hitch v. Davies was an ordinary suit in equity, subject to the principles and regulations applicable thereto, the jurisdiction over the appellees was complete, when, as infants, they filed the bill by next friend.

Bush v. Linthicum, 59 Md. 356; 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 68, 69; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 57-60, 70; Mitford & Tyler, Eq. Pl. 120; Calvert, Parties, chap. 8, § 29, pp. 315, 318; Edwards, Parties, 182 et seq.; Monumental Build. Assn. v. Herman, 38 Md. 132.

When an infant thus comes into court as plaintiff, he is completely bound by the proceedings. To put the infant on both sides of the docket would be to make him sue himself, which this court has designated as a solecism.

Owens v. Crow, 62 Md. 497; Tilly v. Tilly, 2 Bland, Ch. 436; Watson v. Godwin, 4 Md. Ch. 25.

The powers of a prochein ami to represent and bind an infant plaintiff are of the broadest and most complete character.

The failure to make those whose property rights are to be affected parties to the cause in the manner provided by the statute renders the whole proceeding a nullity.

Inasmuch as the infants were not summoned and had no guardians appointed for them, the decree, so far as they were concerned, was without jurisdiction and void.

Gill v. Wells, 59 Md. 492; Hunter v. Hatton, supra.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants filed a bill in equity in the Circuit Court of Baltimore City for the sale of certain real estate lying in said city. The land in question was devised by the will of one Solomon Betts, and the appellants set up a title to a portion of it, by virtue of certain proceedings in the Superior Court of Baltimore on the equity side of the court. The appellees are devisees under the said will. The circuit court dismissed the bill of complaint.

As the appellants' title is founded on these proceedings, it is necessary to examine them with particularity. Solomon Betts, who died in the year 1841, devised a tract of land in the City of Baltimore to certain trustees for the sole and separate use of his daughter, Sarah Hitch, for the term of her natural life, without being subject to the control of her husband and without being liable for his debts; and after her death for the sole and separate use of the testator's granddaughter, Augusta Hitch, for the term of her natural life; and after her death for the use of her lawful issue and for the heirs and assigns of such issue forever, if any child or descendant of hers should be living at the time of her death, and if none, then in trust for the sole and separate use of the testator's daughter, Mary Davies, for the term of her natural life, and after her death for the use of his grandson, Solomon Betts Davies, his heirs and assigns forever. By appropriate proceedings William George Krebs was substituted in the place of the trustees named in the will. In May, 1859, a bill in equity was filed in the Superior Court of Baltimore City in which Sarah M. A. Hitch, Augusta Waters, William Francis Waters, Mary Augusta Waters and Edmund C. Waters (the last three mentioned being infants) and William George Krebs, trustee, were named as complainants; Sarah Hitch and Augusta Waters were married women, the said Augusta being the Augusta Hitch named in the will of Solomon Betts. The defendants were Mary Davies and Solomon Betts Davies. The bill alleged that an ordinance had passed for the opening of certain streets through the land devised by the will of Solomon Betts, and that the paving and grading of one of them had been commenced; that the property was liable for the expenses of paving and grading, that a large arrearage of taxes had accrued on the property from the year 1849 until the filing of the bill; and that Mrs. Hitch and Mrs. Waters had effected a loan of $1,700, secured by their life interests, to prevent a sale of the property and a sacrifice of the rights of all persons interested therein. It was further alleged that it would be for the interest and advantage of all parties concerned that a sale should be made of such part of the property as would be necessary to make the required payments.

The prayer of the bill was that the sale might be made under and by virtue of the provisions of the Acts of Assembly in such case made and provided. The bill was signed by "Hugh Davey Evans, prochein ami of Infants," and by the trustee, and the married women, and by complainants' solicitor. The defendants in their answer denied the right of the life tenants to incumber the property by their failure to pay the taxes, and by allowing assessments to accrue which were alleged to be uncalled for at the time; and also maintained that the sale of the property was not sanctioned by any Act of Assembly. A sale was decreed in March, 1860, of so much of the property as might be required to pay the paving and grading taxes and assessments, and all other claims due and owing to the City of Baltimore, and also of so much of the property as would repay the money borrowed to pay arrearages of taxes. Sales were made to George Pressman and George U. Porter, and ratified by the court. (The land sold to Pressman has been acquired by the appellants, and is that to which they claim title in the bill of complaint in this suit.) After the ratification of the sales, a petition was filed in the names of Mrs. Hitch and her husband, Mrs. Waters and her husband, and the three infants by their next friend, reciting the above-mentioned proceedings, and praying for a decree or order authorizing the mortgage of the property for a sum sufficient to pay the taxes and sums due for grading and paving. A subpoena was issued for the infants and a guardian ad litem appointed for them, who filed an answer in the usual form. No further proceedings under this petition appear in the transcript of the record sent to this court.

We shall pass by without special comment the irregularity of a suit by married women in their own names, and without making their husbands parties on either side of the record. Matters of more serious moment now demand our consideration. The city taxes were due by the life tenants, and they were bound to pay them in full without contribution from these infants. The prayer of the bill is that the property in question may be sold for the purpose of paying certain paving and grading taxes, and also of reimbursing the life tenants for the expenditure which they made in payment of their own debt. The reason alleged for the sale, the sole ground on which it is asked,—the special jurisdictional fact which is supposed to authorize it,—is that it would be “for the interest and advantage of all parties concerned.” We shall proceed to inquire into this ground of jurisdiction.

It is aside from the present purpose to consider the question whether by virtue of its general care and superintendence of infants and their property, the Chancery Court of England has power to sell their inheritance, when it appears to be manifestly to their interest that it should be sold, because it is firmly held in this State that a court of equity had the right to convert the real estate of an infant into money previously to the legislation on the subject of these sales. But the jurisdiction has been very greatly enlarged by a series of statutes. Of course, we have no concern with any of these statutes which were passed subsequently to the decree in question. The Act of 1785, chap. 72, is entitled “An Act for Enlarging the Power of the High Court of Chancery.” By the 12th section the court is authorized on the conditions therein named to sell lands in which an infant, idiot or person non compos mentis has a joint interest in common with any other person or persons.

In Gill v. Wells, 59 Md. 499, it was held that the jurisdiction thus given does not exist where the parties hold separate consecutive interests in the land, but is confined to cases where they hold concurrent interests. The Act of 1816, chapter 154, was entitled “An Act to Authorize the Chancellor and the Several County Courts of this State to Order and Decree the Sales of Real Estate of Minors in the Cases therein Mentioned.” The effect of this Statute, so far as the present question is concerned, is neatly summarized in the opinion in the case just cited, and we will quote an extract from it. Speaking of the decree passed in that case, the court says: “But the Act of 1816, chap. 154, and § 9 of the Act of 1831, chap. 311, exactly meet the case, and it is to them the jurisdiction to pass this decree must be referred. By the first section of the Act of 1816 power was given to the equity courts to decree a sale of an infant's real estate upon petition of his guardian or prochein ami, provided the infant be summoned and appear by guardian ad litem, and it be made to appear to the court that it will be for the interest and advantage of the infant that the sale should be made. And by section 18 of the same Act, as amended and enlarged by section 9 of the Act of 1831, it was provided that the whole estate might be sold with the consent of the life tenants where the infant was the reversioner.” 59 Md. 499.

The decree cannot be supported under this Statute, because the essential preliminaries required by the first section were not observed. The bill ought to have been filed by prochein ami or guardian, and the infants should have been summoned, and there ought to have been an appearance for them, by guardian ad litem appointed by the court. The Statute does not require that an infant should sue himself, as has been suggested by the appellants' counsel; but it directs that the guardian or prochein ami should file a petition and bring the infant before the court as a defendant, and that the allegations of the petition should be proved as facts are proved against defendants,—a most wise and salutary provision, as the present case may well serve to illustrate.

It is vain to argue that the decree can be maintained under the jurisdiction which chancery had prior to the passage of these Statutes. While the court had power under some circumstances to sell an infant's land, when his interest demanded it, no precedent or analogy justified a sale where an adult had a part interest in the land. It was contrary to the theory and practice of chancery to sell a man's interest in land on the ground that it would benefit somebody else, or even that it would benefit himself. Even in cases of partition, sales could not be decreed until a statute gave the jurisdiction. The Act of 1785 and the Act of 1816, and their supplements, authorized sales where adults and infants owned interests in the same land; and the Act of 1831, chap. 311, § 7, first conferred power to decree a sale where all the owners were of full age, in case it was to the advantage of all of them. As a matter of course, infants may sue both at law and in equity, when their rights are invaded, and they may be sued, and their responsibilities (as recognized by the law of the land) may be enforced against them. But in this case the infants were not asserting a right against an adversary. On the contrary, they were alleging that certain liens existed against their own property; they were setting up a burden upon themselves, and they were praying that their own property should be sold, because it was for their benefit, and that of the other owners, that the sale should be made. No interests whatever were involved in the case except those of the owners, and the only question proposed for the court's consideration was whether these interests would be promoted by a sale. The only jurisdiction of the court over such a question was conferred by the Act of 1816 and its supplements; and the infants were not subjected to this jurisdiction in the mode made necessary by this Statute. It may be worth while to remark that under the Act of 1816 the infants' benefit alone was made the ground of sale; while under the Act of 1785 the benefit of all persons concerned was the inducement to the sale. It could not in this case be for the interest of the infants that the land should be sold to reimburse the life tenants for paying taxes, which it was their duty to pay without contribution from the infants. The bill was filed before the adoption of the Code of 1860, but the decree was passed after it went into effect. But the first section of the first article of this Code provided that all suits and actions pending should be prosecuted to final determination, as if the Code had not been adopted. Legislation since the passage of the decree has extended considerably the powers of the court in regard to sales alleged to be advantageous to the parties in interest; for instance, there are the Acts of 1862, chap. 156, and 1868, chap. 273. We have not alluded to the statutes authorizing sales of land under bills for partition, because we are at a loss to conceive how they can affect the present question. It will be perceived that we think that the decree of the superior court was void for want of jurisdiction.

The subsequent petition contains statements in the name of the infants, made by the prochein ami; these do not bind them and can have no influence on their rights.

It has been maintained that the sale under the decree may now be ratified by virtue of the Act of 1868, chap. 249.* Twenty-nine years elapsed between the passage of this void decree and the filing of the bill to induce it with validity. The proposition in the abstract is rather startling. The Act of 1868, by its terms, has a retroactive operation, and it authorizes the court to change the effect of decrees which had become final. It is an exercise of judicial power by the Legislature.

In Dorsey v. Dorsey, 37 Md. 64, it was held that an Act of Assembly authorizing and empowering this court to re-open and re-hear cases, decided at a term already passed, was unconstitutional and void; and the decision was well warranted by a great number of very high authorities.

In Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 52, it was said: "But it is well settled that an Act of the Legislature directing a court to rehear a cause or to grant a new trial, or any legislative action which retroacts upon past controversies, is an invasion of judicial power which is arbitrary and unconstitutional."—and a large number of decisions were cited to the same effect, including one from our own reports, —Miller v. State, 8 Gill, 145.

In Denny v. Mattoon, 2 Allen, 379, it is said: "The Legislature have no power to grant a new trial or direct a re-hearing of a cause which has been once judicially settled. The right to a review, or to try anew facts which have been determined by a verdict or decree, depends on fixed and well-settled principles, which it is the duty of the court to apply, in the exercise of a sound judgment and discretion. These cannot be regulated or governed by legislative action." And the court founds its opinion on well-established principles and well-considered adjudications.

The Act of 1868, in its retrospective effect, would enable the court, by new proceedings, to give validity to a decree which, when pronounced, was beyond its jurisdiction. An Act of the Legislature of Illinois of the same character came under consideration in McDaniel v. Correll, 19 Ill. 226. A short passage from the opinion will show the views of the court: "If it was competent for the Legislature to make a void proceeding valid, then it has been done in this case. Upon this question we cannot for a moment doubt or hesitate. They can no more impart a binding efficacy to a void proceeding than they can take one man's property from him and give it to another. Indeed, to do the one is to accomplish the other."

It is true, as stated in Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, that "a retrospective statute curing defects in legal proceedings where they are in their nature irregularities only, and do not extend to matters of jurisdiction, is not void on constitutional grounds unless expressly forbidden." Marg. p. 371.

But it is also true, as stated in the same work, that in judicial proceedings, if there was originally a failure of jurisdiction, no subsequent law can confer it. Marg. p. 333.

In Dorsey v. Gilbert, 11 Gill & J. 87, land of a deceased debtor had been sold by a trustee under a creditor's bill. One fifth of the land belonged to the minor children of the deceased debtor in right of their mother, and of course was not bound for debts, and could not be validly sold under the decree. An Act of Assembly was passed authorizing the chancellor to confirm the sale, provided a petition was filed by the purchaser and the answers of the infants were taken in the ordinary way, and provided he was satisfied by proof that the sale was fair and advantageous to the infants; under these circumstances he was required to award to the infants one fifth of the purchase money of the whole tract. The court says that this Act furnished infants with substantially the same safeguards as are provided by the Act of 1816, chap. 154, p. 91. The purchase of the land at the sale was simply an offer by the purchaser which could have no effect unless accepted by the court. The Act of Assembly authorized the court to accept this offer, provided it was shown to be advantageous to the infants in a manner similar to that required by the Act of 1816; and on the acceptance of the offer and confirmation of the sale, the infants

*That Act, which is now § 62 of art. 16 of the Code of 1888, vol. 1, provides that where, upon the petition of any infant by his guardian or next friend, a decree has been passed for a sale of the land of the infant and a sale has been made and confirmed, and "it shall appear that there was a failure to summon said infant and to have him answer by a guardian duly appointed, it shall be lawful for the court to confirm said sale and all proceedings had thereon, upon the petition of the guardian or next friend of the infant, or upon the petition of any party having an interest in said sale, and after summoning such infant and his appearance by guardian to be appointed by the court, and such other proceedings had as required for a decree of sale of infants' real estate: provided upon a hearing and examination of all the circumstances it shall appear to said court that said sale was fairly and bona fide made, and that at the date of the decree it was for the benefit and advantage of said infant to sell said real estate," etc. [Rep.]

were to be awarded their due proportion of the purchase money. This case has been very earnestly pressed upon us, but it cannot be tortured into an authority that it is competent for an Act of Assembly to authorize by retroaction the ratification of a void sale, simply and absolutely, without requiring compensation to the owners of the land.

This case was decided at the last term of the court and was ordered to be reargued. We have endeavored to be very explicit in the statement of our views, as the former opinion was very much misapprehended. At the reargument something was said about the appellants' claim for improvements made on the land, but there is nothing in the transcript of the record showing that improvements have been made, or in any way referring to the subject. We are not to be understood as saying that they will not be entitled to the value of any betterments which they may have made on proper proceedings to that end.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

Shope, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit, by appellee against appellants, upon the following instrument:

Form B.

Dalziel's Railway Advertising.

$300.00. Chicago, March 5, 1887.

On July 1st, 1887, we promise to pay D. Dalziel, or order, the sum of three hundred dollars, for the privilege of one framed advertising sign, size—×—, in one end of each of 159 street cars of the North Chicago City Railway Co., for a term of three months from May 15, 1887.

No. — Siegel, Cooper & Co.
—which was indorsed by Dalziel, the payee, to appellants, for value, on the day of its execution.

The first question presented is, Is this instrument negotiable? And this question has been answered affirmatively by the circuit and appellate courts. The appellate court having affirmed the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the case is brought here by appeal, upon certificate of importance, granted by that court. It appears that, before the time when the privilege of advertising was to commence, Dalziel forfeited any right he may have acquired to use the cars in the manner indicated, and the privilege specified never was furnished appellant; and it is insisted that the instrument is a simple contract only, and that therefore the same defense, failure of consideration, is available against the indorsees of the paper for value and before due, as might be interposed against such paper in the hands of the payee. It is also insisted that the instrument shows on its face that payment depended upon a condi-

A promissory note containing an unconditional and absolute promise to pay a certain sum of money creates an absolute liability for such payment, although the consideration is further described to be certain property the title to which is not to pass until the note is paid; and the destruction of such property before the note is paid does not destroy the liability. Burnley v. Tufts, 66 Miss. 48.

But a writing, "Two years from date, for value received, I promise to pay J. S. K. or bearer, one ounce of gold," is not a negotiable promissory note. Roberts v. Smith, 2 N. E. Rep. 468, 56 Vt. 492. See notes to Wright v. Traver (Mich.) 3 L. R. A. 50; Bowie v. Hall (Md.) 1 L. R. A. 544.

tion precedent to be performed by the payee, and therefore the indorsees took it with notice, and, by the failure of the payee to perform the condition, no right of recovery exists in the indorsees.

It is not contended that the indorsees had any other notice than that contained in the instrument itself; and it is apparent that at the time of its indorsement, which was the day of its execution, no right to the consideration had accrued to the maker. It is a promise to pay a certain sum of money at a day certain, for a consideration thereafter to be rendered, and depends for its validity upon the implied promise of the payee to furnish the consideration at the time and in the manner stipulated; that is, it is a promise to pay a sum certain on a particular day, in consideration of the promise of the payee to do and perform on his part. A promise is a valuable consideration for a promise.

But the question remains whether the statement, or the recital of the consideration, on the face of the instrument, impairs its negotiability, and in this instance amounted to a condition precedent. The mere fact that the consideration for which a note is given is recited in it, although it may appear thereby that it was given for or in consideration of an executory contract or promise on the part of the payee, will not destroy its negotiability, unless it appears through the recital that it qualifies the promise to pay, and renders it conditional or uncertain, either as to the time of payment or the sum to be paid. Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 790, 797; Davis v. McCreedy, 17 N. Y. 230; State Nat. Bank v. Cason, 59 La. Ann. 865; First Nat. Bank v. Michael, 96 N. C. 53; Goodloe v. Taylor, 8 Hawks, 458; Stevens v. Blunt, 7 Mass. 240.

In State Nat. Bank v. Cason, supra, it is said: "Plaintiff received the note before maturity, and before a failure of the consideration. Even if it were known to him taking it that the consideration was future and contingent, and that there might be offsets against it, this would not make him liable to the equities between defendants and payee. It cannot affect the negotiability of a note that its consideration is to be hereafter realized, or that from some contingency it may never be enjoyed."

The most that can be said of a recital in the instrument itself of the consideration upon which it rests is that the indorsee, taking it before maturity, is chargeable with notice of the recital. Such recital, however, is not sufficient of itself to advise him that there was, or would necessarily be, a failure of consideration, but that, if at the time of the indorsement the consideration has in fact failed, the recital might be sufficient to put him upon inquiry, and, in connection with other facts, amount to notice. Henneberry v. Morse, 56 Ill. 394.

The case at bar does not, however, fall within the rule just stated; for the assignment was made the same day the note was made, and by the terms of the recital it was apparent the payee was required to do no act till the 15th of May following, an interval of seventy days.

There is a distinction, clearly recognized in the authorities, between an instrument payable at a particular day and one payable upon the happening of some event; and the rule is that where the parties insert a specific date of payment the instrument is then payable at all events, and this although, in the same instrument, an uncertain and different time of payment may be mentioned, as that it shall be payable upon a particular day, or upon the completion of a house, or the performance of other contracts, and the like. McCarty v. Howell, 24 Ill. 841, and authorities supra.

But the doctrine of this and kindred cases, where there is both a certain day of payment and one more or less contingent, need not be here invoked; for the time of payment in the instrument under consideration is not made to depend upon the happening or not happening of any event, but is specific and certain, and must occur by the efflux of time alone.

If, therefore, it be conceded, as it must, that a condition inserted in a promissory note postponing the day of payment until the happening of some uncertain or contingent event will destroy its negotiability, and render the instrument a mere agreement, yet, under the authorities, if by the instrument the maker promises to pay a sum certain, at a day certain, to a certain person, or his order, such instrument must be regarded as negotiable although it also contains a recital of the consideration upon which it is based, and although it further appear that such consideration, if executory, may not have been performed. Here the money was payable absolutely on the 1st day of July, 1887, a time when the contract for the advertising could not have been complete. If the instrument had remained the property of the payee, and upon its maturity suit had been brought, it is clear that no plea of partial failure of consideration could have been sustained, for the reason that the entire term had not then expired, and for the reason that the promise of the makers was based upon the promise of the payee to perform his undertaking at a time subsequent to the day fixed for payment. No analysis of the instrument itself is necessary. The most careful examination of it will fail to disclose a condition precedent to the payment of the money at the time stipulated. Nor is there anything in the recital of the consideration to put the indorsees upon inquiry at the time indorsement was made. Indeed, it is clear that at that time no inquiry would have led to notice that Dalziel would fail to comply with his contract on the 15th of May thereafter, when the term was to commence. All that the recitals would give notice of was that the note was given in consideration of an agreement on the part of the payee that the privilege of advertisement named should be enjoyed by the makers for three months from May 15, 1887. Giving to the language employed its broadest possible meaning, it cannot be construed as notice to the indorsees of the future breach of the contract by Dalziel. The presumption of law would be that the contract would be carried out in good faith, and the consideration performed as stipulated. The makers had put their promissory note into the hands of Dalziel upon an expressed consideration which they were thereafter to receive, and for the performance of which they had seen fit to rely upon the undertaking of Dalziel; and we are aware of no rule by which they can hold these indorsees for value, before due and before the time of performance was to begin, chargeable with notice that the promise upon which the makers relied would not be kept and performed. Wade, Notice, § 94a; Loomis v. Mowry, 8 Hun, 812; Davis v. McCready, supra.

It is also contended that the court erred in giving the eighth instruction,* in behalf of appellee, as to the meaning of the words "good

*That instruction was as follows:

"In answer to your question as to the meaning of the words 'good faith' used in the instructions heretofore given, the court instructs you that they mean the opposite of 'bad faith'; that 'good faith' means 'honesty' and 'bad faith' means 'dishonesty.'"—[Rep.]

faith." Without pausing to discuss the instruction, we think it clear that appellants were not prejudiced thereby, and that no inference unfavorable or prejudicial to them could have been drawn therefrom by the jury. While, therefore, the instruction may be regarded as inaccurate, it worked no injury, and appellant cannot complain.

Other minor objections are urged which, it is sufficient to say, we have examined with care, but we find no prejudicial error.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

Board of Commissioners of the TOWN OF TARBORO.

(....N. C....)

1. All property of whatever description, and not merely that selected for taxation by the Legislature, must be taxed, under Const., art. 7, § 9.
2. The word "property" in Const., art. 7, § 9, relating to taxation, includes moneys, credits, investments and other choses in action.
3. Although the power of a municipal corporation to tax is not conferred by the Constitution, when such power is exercised the Constitution compels the taxation of all property therein, and that it shall be taxed according to its true value in money and by a uniform rule.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Edgecombe County in favor of defendant in a suit to recover back money paid under protest in satisfaction of certain taxes alleged to have been illegally assessed. Affirmed.

Statement by Shepherd, J.:

This is a controversy submitted without action, as allowed by the Statute (Code, §§ 567-569), and the following is so much of the case submitted as need be reported:

"(1) That the plaintiff, Claudia Redmond, is a resident of the Town of Tarboro, and has been for a number of years. (2) That in 1888, at the time required for listing property for taxation in said Town, she refused to give in to the list-taker of said Town $43,312, which she owned in solvent credits. (3) That by an order of the board of commissioners of said Town the said solvent credits were ordered to be placed by the list-taker on the list, and were ascertained from the county list-taker's list, and were accordingly returned by the town list-taker on his list for taxation in said Town against the protest of the said Claudia, as was done in other like cases of solvent credits owned by persons resident in said Town. (4) That of said solvent credits of plaintiff so placed upon the town list, $39,978.97 were owing by parties resident outside of the Town, 7 L. R. A.

and such amount is secured on property not located within the limits of said Town; and $3,328.08 or thereabout were owing by parties residing within and citizens of said Town, with the exception of a few dollars, which she cannot accurately determine. (5) That the said board of commissioners, at their regular meeting of 1888, levied a tax of one half of 1 per centum, or fifty cents on the one hundred dollars' worth of property, including solvent credits; in the words of the order, 'that an assessment of fifty cents on the one hundred dollars valuation be levied on all property in the Town of Tarboro, not exempt from taxation, both real and personal, including all moneys, credits in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise.' (6) That the tax-list for said years 1888-89 was put in the hands of John W. Cotton, tax collector for said Town, who made demand upon plaintiff for the sum of $216.56, which said sum was for taxes on the solvent credits placed as aforesaid upon the list of taxables against the protest of plaintiff, at the rate levied aforesaid, and the plaintiff under protest paid the said sum for said taxes on solvent credits, and holds therefor the receipt of the tax collector. (7) That said plaintiff has made demand in writing on the defendant board for the return of said taxes, and they refused to pay over to her the same. The question presented to the court is whether the solvent credits so listed, or any part of them, are liable to the levy so made by the Town of Tarboro."

The court gave judgment as follows: "It is considered and adjudged that the solvent credits listed by the plaintiff are liable to the levy as made by the Town of Tarboro. It is further adjudged that the plaintiff pay the costs of this proceeding;" and the plaintiff, having excepted, appealed to this court.

Messrs. H. A. Gilliam and Donnell Gilliam for appellee.

Shepherd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The very important question presented by this appeal is whether the Town of Tarboro has the power to levy a tax upon the solvent credits of its citizens. It is necessary to an intelligent discussion of the question that we should review the several decisions of this court in reference to municipal taxation, and extract from the conflict of authority and confusion in which the subject is involved the true principles governing such taxation. Section 9, art. 7, of the Constitution, provides that "all taxes levied by any county, city, town or township shall be uniform and ad valorem upon all property in the same, except property exempted by this Constitution."

Does this provision simply apply the rule of uniformity and equality to the particular subjects which may be selected by the Legislature for taxation, or does it command that all property, of whatsoever description, shall be taxed, and taxed according to the said principles? If the latter be the correct view, and "moneys, credits, investments," etc., are embraced in the said section, it necessarily follows that all general laws, and the special provisions of the charters of these various municipalities which conflict with the said provision of the Constitution, are void, and that the refinements of construction which are sought to be applied to their particular phraseology become wholly impertinent to the present discussion.

1. We will first inquire, then, whether the said provision of the Constitution commands that all property shall be taxed. "Taxes" are defined to be burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power of a State upon persons or property, to raise money for public purposes (Blackw. Tax Titles, § 10); and the power to levy them is one of the essential attributes of sovereignty, and is inherent in and necessary to the existence of every government. Knowlton v. Rock Co. 9 Wis. 418; McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316 [4 L. ed. 579].

In the absence of constitutional limitations, there is, it is said, no restraint whatever upon the Legislature, and it may discriminate in favor of or against a particular class of persons or property, and pass laws in violation of every principle of just government, by an unequal distribution of the public burdens. The check upon such an abuse of power is in the influence of constituents over their representatives, and the weight of authority is that the courts have no right to interfere with this exercise of the legislative will. Thus it is seen that a wide field is open for a war between different classes of property, in that one class may be taxed to the exclusion or to the prejudice of another, and that under the forms of a free government an excited partisan legislative majority may commit wrongs against the rights of property as flagrant and oppressive as those which have disgraced the reigns of the most despotic rulers.

But it is said that the General Assembly will be influenced by proper motives, and will levy taxes upon a just basis. Experience in many of the States has shown that the principles of taxation should not be left to the uncertainty or caprice of successive Legislatures, but that they should be fixed and immutable, and embodied in the fundamental law, under whose broad shield all property, of whatsoever species, may be equally protected. This, we think, was the purpose of the framers of our Constitution in inserting therein the section referred to, as well as section 3, art. 5, relating to state taxation. No one who reads these and other provisions of the Constitution will fail to be impressed with the earnest effort there made to ingraft upon our Organic Law the great principle of equality in taxation. "The subjects of every State ought to contribute to the support of the government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation."

Such are the words of the author of "The Wealth of Nations" (book 4, chap. 2), quoted with approval by Judge Cooley (Taxn. p. 9); and we think that they well illustrate the true spirit and purpose of our constitutional provisions upon the subject.

We are of opinion that section 9, art. 7, was not intended to apply the rules of uniformity and equality to the subjects which the Legislature might alone select for taxation, but that it requires that all property shall be taxed, and taxed in accordance with the said rules. A contrary view was taken by the court soon after the adoption of the Constitution, in the case of Pullen v. Raleigh, 68 N. C. 451. The charter enumerated eight subjects of taxation, "beginning with real estate situate in the city, and ending in encroachments on the streets by porches," etc.; but it did not include moneys, credits, etc. The court affirmed the opinion of the superior court judge that the Constitution was "intended to declare simply the manner in which municipal corporations should levy taxes, to wit, that they should be uniform and ad valorem, and not to declare the subjects to be taxed by them." The decisions in which this case has been cited (such as Winston v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 210; State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554; Latta v. Williams, 87 N. C. 126, and perhaps others), have reference only to the taxing of trades, professions and the like, and these, not being property, are correctly placed within the principle declared therein.

Under the construction of the Constitution as declared in Pullen's Case, it would be in the discretion of the Legislature to unequally distribute the burdens necessarily incident to government, and the worst species of class legislation would be tolerated. It would (says Dixon, Ch. J., in Knowlton v. Rock Co., 9 Wis. 422) "make the Constitution operative only to the extent of prohibiting the Legislature from discriminating in favor of particular individuals, and would reduce the people, while considering so grave and important a proposition, to the ridiculous attitude of saying to the Legislature, 'You shall not discriminate between single individuals or corporations, but you may divide the citizens up into different classes, as . . . the owners of different species or descriptions of property, and legislate for one class, and against another, as such as you please, provided you serve all of the favored or unfavored classes alike;' thus affording a direct and solemn constitutional sanction to a system of taxation so manifestly and grossly unjust that it will not find an apologist anywhere, at least outside of those who are the recipients of its favors."

Such a construction, in our opinion, not only offends the true spirit of the Constitution, but has been distinctly and solemnly repudiated by the uniform decisions of this court in subsequent cases. These cases decide that, when the taxing power is exercised for a public purpose, the Constitution, and not the Legislature, declares what property shall be taxed; and that it requires that all shall be taxed, and by a uniform rule, and ad valorem. This construction is conceded as to state and county taxation, under section 3, art. 5, and we are unable to conceive why the same rule should not apply to section 9, art. 7, as the language of the latter is even more imperative than that of the former.

In Cobb v. Elizabeth City, 75 N. C. 1, Rodman, J., after quoting section 9, art. 7, says: "All taxes, therefore, must be levied as well on personal as on real property, notwithstanding any contrary provision in the charter."

In Kyle v. Fayetteville, 75 N. C. 445, it was decided that "shares of stock in a national bank are proper subjects of state, county and municipal taxation." The court said (Bynum, J., delivering the opinion) that, "in our view, it was unnecessary for the Revenue Act or the charter of the Town of Fayetteville to tax specifically the national-bank shares of either residents or nonresidents. . . . The Constitution seizes them and exacts from them their proportional share of the public burdens. Neither the Legislature nor the town corporation can exempt them from taxation without doing violence to the Constitution." "It is the provision and was the purpose of the Constitution that thereafter there should be no discrimination in taxation in favor of any class, person or interest; but that everything real and personal, possessing value as property, and the subject of ownership, shall be taxed equally, and by a uniform rule. In this respect the present Constitution shows no favors and allows no discretion. If, then, the Town of Fayetteville has the power to tax, the Constitution steps forward, and commands that all property shall be taxed, and by a uniform rule." To the same effect are Young v. Henderson, 76 N. C. 420; London v. Wilmington, 78 N. C. 109, and Pitt v. Gaston County, 84 N. C. 709.

The language of the court in these decisions can admit of no question, and, if anything further were needed to sustain the principles there laid down, we have the high authority of the late distinguished chief justice (Smith) in Vaughan v. Murfreesboro, 96 N. C. 317, who says that the Constitution, art. 7, § 9, "commands that all taxes levied in any county, city, town or township shall be uniform and ad valorem upon all property in the same, except property exempt by this Constitution; by force of which, notwithstanding the omission in the charter, personal as well as real [property] must be assessed and subjected to the same public burden."

This overwhelming weight of authority, so consonant with the principles of equality in taxation everywhere pervading the fundamental law, conclusively establishes the proposition that, wherever the taxing power is exercised for a public purpose, all property shall be taxed, notwithstanding any contrary provisions in the General Law or the charter.

2. It only remains, therefore, for us to consider whether the word "property" in said section 9, art. 7, includes moneys, credits, investments and other choses in action. Considering the essential justice of the principles we have mentioned, and which are so plainly recognized in the several provisions of our Constitution, the mind naturally rejects in their interpretation any narrow or strained rules of construction which may be relied upon to defeat their beneficent purpose. These provisions should be construed in the light of their general spirit and intention, and thus full effect be given to the will of the people as expressed in their fundamental law. Clear and convincing, indeed, then, must be the reasoning which gives a restricted meaning to the word "property," when used in reference to municipal taxation, while as to all other taxation it is to be taken in its natural and general sense. Upon what principle can it be contended that one who has no tangible property, but who owns $100,000 in solvent credits, may enjoy all of the conveniences, safeguards and other benefits of town life, and contribute nothing whatever to the payment of the common expenses? Yet such will be the effect, if the restricted interpretation contended for is to prevail. It is clear that all who enjoy these privileges should pay their part of the expenses. For instance, the evidences of these very solvent credits receive greater protection by the police of a town, and yet the police are to be paid only by those who own tangible property. No good reason can be assigned in support of such an unjust discrimination, while every principle of justice and common fairness sternly forbids it.

In support of this restricted interpretation of the word "property," the plaintiff relies upon the case of Vaughan v. Murfreesboro, supra: The charter provided that the tax should be levied "upon all persons and property within the town subject to taxation for county purposes, under the General Laws of the State." Under sections 3, 6, art. 5, of the Constitution, there can be no question but that choses in action were taxable for county purposes, but it was held that under the charter they were not included. It is not easy to understand how the language of the charter was material to the decision of the case, as the opinion, as we have seen, fully committed the court to the principle that the Constitution, and not the charter, determines what property shall be taxed. While the opinion lays much stress upon the "localizing" words ("within the town") which are used in the charter, it seems to approve of the following dictum in Pullen v. Raleigh, supra: "In regard to that word ['property'], by the bye, we see that the Constitution does not make it include 'money, credits, investment in bonds,' etc." These words are spoken of in Vaughan's Case as an "adjudication," when, from an examination of the opinion, it will appear that the decision rested entirely on the ground that the objects to be taxed depended "upon the charter," and the charter having enumerated eight specific subjects, in none of which were embraced "debts and securities for money," the latter were excluded. So far from adjudicating the meaning of the word, the learned chief justice is careful to say that "the word 'property,' about which so much was said on the argument, is not used in that enumeration of the subjects of taxation." The dictum is founded solely upon the supposed distinction made in the use of the words "real and personal property," in section 8, art. 5, which words, it is said, are "used in a sense to exclude such credits and investments." The exclusion is as follows: "Laws shall be passed taxing, by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise; and also all real and personal property, according to its true value in money." The suggestion is (for, after all, it is but a suggestion) that by the verbal arrangement of this section the words "real and personal property" are so restricted in their meaning as to exclude moneys, credits, etc., and that this limited sense is to be attached to the word "property," as used in section 9, art. 7.

It therefore becomes material that we should examine § 3, art. 5, and ascertain whether there is in fact such a distinction as is contended for. It is true that the meaning of the section is not very happily expressed, but it must be construed with reference to the context and spirit of all of the constitutional provisions upon the subject, and their general intent and purpose cannot be defeated by the confused arrangement of words, or, as is suggested, by the presence of a semicolon between the two first clauses, since, even in the interpretation of an ordinary deed, punctuation must be disregarded, and words may be transposed to "bring them to the intent of the parties." Bunn v. Wells, 94 N. C. 67. Let us now see whether such a distinction exists, or has ever been recognized and acted upon by this court. If there be such a distinction, the argument founded upon it must be followed to its logical results, and it cannot be used in the construction of one section of the Constitution and abandoned as to others. Now, if the words "real and personal property" are used in the second clause in such a sense as to exclude "moneys, credits," etc., and the two clauses are divorced, as is argued, by a semicolon and the words "and also," and are therefore entirely independent of each other, upon what rule of construction has this court so often applied the principle of ad valorem, mentioned in the second clause, to the "moneys, credits," etc., mentioned in the first clause? Clearly, this cannot be done but by holding that the words "real and personal property" include "moneys, credits," etc. Again, if these clauses are independent of each other, how, we may ask, has this court so frequently applied the rule of uniformity contained in the first clause to the real and personal property contained in the second clause? These considerations alone ought to be sufficient to meet the supposed distinction upon which the dictum is founded.

We are not without aid, however, in the construction of this provision of the Constitution. It seems to have been taken from the Constitution of Ohio, as the language is precisely the same. In that State, in the case of Columbus Exch. Bank v. Hines, 8 Ohio St. 1, an effort was made to draw the very distinction which we have been discussing, and the court said: "But it is argued that the uniform rule in taxing, required by the Constitution, applies only to moneys, credits, investments in bonds. . . . Why should so important a rule as that of uniformity in taxation be established by the Constitution, and then limited in its operation to a few specific classes of personal property? It is said that all other property is to be taxed 'according to its true value in money.' This requirement, however, only fixes the standard for ascertaining the taxable valuation, and does not necessarily imply equality and uniformity either in the rate and mode of assessment, or in the different localities throughout the State. The taxable valuation may be fixed according to the true value of property in money, and yet discriminations may be made between different classes of property, and between different localities in the State, imposing unequal and unjust burdens of taxation."

In speaking of the first clause, it is said that "this provision, arising out of abundant caution, was not intended to give these enumerated things any new distinctive classification, nor does it in fact exclude them from the denomination of 'personal property,' to which, by their nature and legal incidents, they belong. Mr. Broom, in his Selections of Legal Maxims (p. 415), says 'that the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, requires always great caution in its application. Thus, where general words are used in a written instrument, it is necessary, in the first instance, to determine whether these general words are intended to include other matters besides such as are specifically mentioned, or to be referable exclusively to them; in which latter case only can the above maxim be properly applied.' In the interpretation of legal instruments, words used out of abundant caution are often to be tolerated, at the expense of tautology. The object of the language of the Constitution under consideration was comprehension, not exclusion. The words, 'all real and personal property,' therefore, in the second clause of this second section, are to be taken in their most comprehensive legal import, including every kind of real and personal property whatsoever, not excepting the several classes of personal property expressly mentioned in the first clause of the section. If this interpretation be in any sense liable to the charge of tautology, it certainly is not to that of repugnancy. If this had not been the meaning intended by [the framers of] the Constitution, there would have been added to the words, 'all real and personal property,' these words, 'other than that above mentioned.' It is more in harmony with the settled rules of construction to convict the law-makers of some inelegancies in rhetoric and the use of unnecessary words, than to depart from the leading object and intent of the instrument. . . . Any other interpretation than this would lead to consequences at variance with the manifest spirit and true intention of the Constitution. If moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, etc., may be subjected to a different rate of taxation from that imposed on other kinds of property, or if moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, etc., may be taxed at less than their true value in money, while all other property is required to be taxed at its true value, in either case great and unfair inequalities may be created by legislative discretion. . . . There can exist no sound reason why a person whose property consists of moneys, credits, stocks, etc., should bear a less burden of taxation than that which is imposed on the lands and chattels of the agriculturist, the implements, machinery and materials of the manufacturer, or the goods and wares of the merchant; and the Constitution, truly interpreted, recognizes no such distinction."

This case was decided in 1853, and has been cited with approval by this court in Worth v. Petersburg R. Co., 89 N. C. 301, in which it is said that the provision under consideration "was copied from the Constitution of Ohio." The construction put upon it, therefore, by the Supreme Court of that State, is entitled to great weight. "Where the terms of a statute which has received judicial construction are used in a later statute, whether passed by the Legislature of the same State or country or by that of another, that construction is to be given to the latter statute. Com. v. Hartnett, 3 Gray, 450; Ruckmaboye v. Mottichund, 32 Eng. L. & Eq. 84; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 693; Rigg v. Wilton, 13 Ill. 15; Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 265.

"It is presumed that the Legislature which passed the latter Statute knew the judicial construction which had been placed on the former one, and such construction becomes a part of the law." Potter's Dwar. Stat 274, note; Bridgers v. Taylor, 102 N. C. 89.

The foregoing rule, while not absolutely binding, is used as a valuable aid in the construction of laws.

This high authority determines, we think, that the words "real and personal property," as used in the said section, comprehend moneys, credits, investments, etc., and that there exists no such distinction as that relied upon to sustain the argument which seeks to place a restricted meaning upon the word "property," when used in other parts of the Constitution, and especially in section 9, art. 7. If the latter construction prevails, much obscurity, confusion and conflict will be introduced into the Organic Law, which can easily be avoided by holding, as we do, that section 9, art. 7, is but a concise form of expressing the principles contained in section 3, art. 5; the difference in the language employed being attributable to the probability that the two sections were framed by different committees of the convention. A contrary construction would lead to results which were little contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. For instance, if the word "property," in section 9, art. 7, does not comprehend "moneys, credits," etc., they are without the pale of constitutional protection, and municipal corporations may tax them without regard to the rule of uniformity and equality. Thus it will be in the power of the Legislature to put the entire or an unequal part of the burden of municipal government upon moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, etc., and in this way indirectly confiscate this species of property. Such an abuse of the taxing power would, in the language of Miller, J. (in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Citizens Sav. & Loan Assn. v. Topeka, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 655 [23 L. ed. 455]), be "none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law, and is called 'taxation.'" And it is manifest that such an unlimited power of discrimination was not intended to be permitted by the Constitution. It should therefore be a matter of serious consideration to the owners of this species of property that, in attempting to escape the payment of their part of the public municipal burdens, they are invoking a principle which excepts them from the protecting power of the limitations contained in the Organic Law.

Another incongruity growing out of the construction contended for is presented by section 6, art. 5, which provides that county taxes "shall be levied in like manner with state taxes." State taxes, as we have seen, must be levied on money, credits, etc., by a uniform rule and ad valorem. The word "county" is for some purpose inserted in section 9, art. 7, preceding the words "city, town or township." Now, if this section is to have any effect upon county taxation, and the word "property" is to be taken in its restricted sense, we have a direct conflict with section 3, art. 5, both in respect to the subjects of taxation, and the principles by which such taxation is governed. Again, if such an interpretation is correct, it must be followed in section 1, art. 5, which provides that "the General Assembly shall levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant of the State, . . . which shall be equal on each to the tax on property valued at $300 in cash; . . . and the state and county capitation tax, combined, shall never exceed $2 on the head." As the word "property" alone is used, moneys, solvent credits, etc., constituting, it is estimated, one eighth of the taxable values of the State, would be excluded from the benefit of the limitation in the above section, and would not enter into the calculation of the amount to be raised at any given per cent on the equation system for state or county purposes. In passing, we will remark that the importance of imposing some restriction upon city and town authorities as to this species of property is enhanced by the fact that this court has held that the constitutional limitation as to the per centum on the value of property does not apply to such municipal corporations. Young v. Henderson, supra; French v. Wilmington, 75 N. C. 482.

It does not follow, however, that because there is only a legislative limitation, the principle of equation shall not be enforced, nor that the municipality may not collect from polls an amount equal on each to the tax imposed, for municipal purposes, on property worth $300; in which case there would be no obligation to devote it to the support of schools and the poor, as section 2, art. 5, only directs the application of the capitation tax collected for state and county purposes.

These views are presented to illustrate how the whole system of taxation growing out of the construction we have given to the Organic Law could be made to operate harmoniously, as well as justly, whether imposed by the State or a municipal corporation, under the powers conferred upon it. Just here we will notice an argument derived from the language of the foregoing provision of the Constitution. It is said that, because property is there required to be valued at its true value in cash, it is a recognition of the distinction in section 3, art. 5. This is a petitio principii, as the existence of such a distinction is the very point in question. We have shown, we think, both by reason and authority, that no such distinction exists, and that the said section means that all property, of whatsoever description, must be taxed at its true value, and by a uniform rule. Upon this we have also a legislative construction in chapter 218, § 18, Acts 1889, where solvent credits, investments, etc., are required to be taxed at their "true current or market value." We will also add the remark of Rodman, J., in Wilson v. Charlotte, 74 N. C. 752, that such a construction of the word would place this class of property outside of the Bill of Rights in respect to jury trial and other privileges guaranteed therein, as the word "property" only is there used. It must be apparent to everyone that if such a finely drawn distinction is to be deduced from an involved sentence, and made the basis of a limited definition of the word "property," we will meet with nothing but confusion and incongruities in many parts of the Constitution; whereas, if the general and legal meaning of the word is adopted, all of its provisions will be in perfect accord, working out together the benign principles of equality and uniformity in taxation.

For the foregoing reasons, we think that the dictum in Pullen's Case was unfounded, and it is singular that it should still be quoted as authority. It was clearly not so regarded by its author, the distinguished chief justice, as we find the same court, over which he presided with such great ability, declaring in Wilson v. Charlotte, supra, that "such an inference is hasty, and cannot be fairly drawn," and unanimously deciding that the word "property," as used in section 2, art. 7, does include money, credits, etc.

Again, in Cobb v. Elizabeth City, supra, the court held that the word "property" includes bonds, stocks, solvent notes," etc. In Kyle v. Fayetteville, supra, the court said (Bynum, J., delivering the opinion): "For wherever the power to tax is exercised, all taxes, whether state, county or town, by force of the Constitution, must be imposed upon all the real and personal property, money, credits, investments in bonds, stocks," etc.

In Pruitt v. Gaston Co., supra, the late learned chief justice in delivering the opinion of the court quoted the foregoing language with unqualified approval. These well considered cases, it seems to us, establish, as well as judicial authority can establish anything, that the word "property," used in said section, is not to be taken in the restricted sense as suggested, but that it includes moneys, credits, investments or any other chose in action. But the opinion in Vaughan's Case does not rest alone upon the "hasty" inference alluded to, but apparently seeks the aid of the common-law definition of the word "property." The cases referred to are where it is used in residuary clauses of wills, in which a sale and division of the proceeds were directed. It was held, says Judge Reade in Hogan v. Hogan, 68

N. C. 228, "that money on hand and choses in action did not pass, the prominent reason being that they are not ordinarily the subjects of sale, and in all the cases a sale was directed, and a division of the proceeds." Judge Rodman, in Wilson v. Charlotte, after examining one of the cases, and showing that the decision was controlled by the context of the will, remarks: "There can be no doubt, I suppose, that a bequest of 'all of my property' to A. would pass bonds belonging to the testator."

It is hardly necessary, however, to pursue this phase of the discussion further, as the opinion in Vaughan's Case admits that these decisions "are not in harmony, and are referred to as showing how the usual import of words may be restrained in their operation by the context."

While we do not for an instant concede that the manifest spirit and intent of the Organic Law of a State is to be controlled by the strict technical definitions of the common law as applied to wills and other dispositive instruments, we will insert some authorities which plainly show that at common law the word "property," when not limited by the context of the instrument in which it is found, includes choses in action. It is a nomen generalissimum. "Standing alone, the term includes everything that is the subject of ownership." Anderson, Law Dict.

"Property" includes not only ownership, estates and interests in corporeal things, but also rights, such as trademarks, copyrights, patents and rights in personam, capable of transfer or transmission, such as debts. See Birchall v. Pugin, L. R. 10 C. P. 897; 2 Aust. Jur. 817, et seq.

"Property," in a policy of insurance, has been held to include current bank-bills owned by the assured. Whiton v. Old Colony Ins. Co. 2 Met. 1.

The terms "goods and chattels" include choses in action. Ford and Sheldon's Case, 12 Coke, 1; Ryall v. Rolle, 1 Atk. 182.

The word "property" includes choses in action as well as choses in possession. It includes money due as well as money possessed. Carlton v. Carlton, 72 Me. 116; Ida v. Harwood, 30 Minn. 195.

"A credit," says Judge Reade in LiUy v. Cumberland Co., 69 N. C. 307, "is property, and as such is liable to taxation as any other property."

In Adams v. Jones, 6 Jones, Eq. 221, Manly, J., speaking for the court, said that "the share of stock in the R. & G. Railroad Company is property, to be sold under the eleventh clause of the will. The word is among the most comprehensive of those in use, to signify things which are owned and subject to be owned and enjoyed."

Speaking of constitutional provisions similar to ours, Cooley on Taxation, 134, says: "These provisions preclude discrimination in favor of or against any classes of property or persons whatsoever. They require the taxation of loans or any other credits, these being property as much as lands or chattels in possession."

Moreover, we have a legislative interpretation of the word which is to be used "in the construction of all statutes," and which reflects much light upon its meaning, when used in the Constitution. Code, § 3765, provides that "the words 'personal property' shall include moneys, goods, chattels, choses in action and evidences of debts, including all things capable of ownership, not descendible to the heirs-at law. The word 'property' shall include all property, both real and personal."

To the suggestion that this view of the subject will discourage the investment of capital in towns and cities, we reply that such a consideration should have no weight in a legal discussion, but that it is not true that such a result will follow, as the owner of solvent credits, etc., is only taxed as to them at the place of his domicile.

After this lengthy discussion, made necessary by the doubt and obscurity into which the subject has fallen, and sustained, as we are, by the general intention of the Constitution as interpreted by the repeated decisions of this court and other weighty authorities, we conclude that, although the power of a municipal corporation to tax is not conferred by the Constitution, yet, when such a power is exercised, the Constitution "steps in," and, without regard to the provisions of its charter, commands that all property therein, real and personal, including moneys, credits, etc., shall be taxed, and that it shall all be taxed according to "its true value in money," and by a uniform rule. This, we feel sure, is in accord with the true spirit and meaning of the fundamental law, whose evident purpose is not to be defeated by a construction based upon a supposed distinction growing out of "inelegancies in rhetoric" and the improper punctuation of one of its provisions.

For the reasons given it is unnecessary that we should examine into the provisions of the charter. We are of opinion that his honor properly held that the solvent credits of the plaintiff were liable to taxation by the defendant corporation.

Affirmed.

Merrimon, Ch. J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the decision of this case, and, as it is one of moment, I will state some of the grounds of my dissent.

The decision of the question raised by the assignment of error must depend upon the proper interpretation of several important provisions of the Constitution, affecting, as they do, materially the whole subject of taxation. Their true meaning is not entirely free from doubt, and to settle this is the more embarrassing, as such provisions have come before this court repeatedly, and its decisions in respect to some aspects of them are not, as will be seen, in harmony with each other. Article 5 of the Constitution is entitled "Revenue and Taxation," and is devoted mainly to the designation and classification of the several subjects of taxation, as to the particular kinds and character of them, and the methods of levying taxes. These distinctions and classifications are fundamental, and must be observed and prevail in all proper connections. Moreover, terms used must be strictly applied in the sense in which they are employed. The first section of the article just cited provides and declares that "the General Assembly shall levy a capitation tax" as therein prescribed, which shall be equal, on each person subject to it, "to the tax on property valued at $300 in cash," and "the state and county capitation tax combined shall never exceed $3 on the head." The third section thereof provides that "laws shall be passed taxing, by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise; and also all real and personal property, according to the true value in money. The General Assembly may also tax trades, professions, franchises and incomes, provided, that no income shall be taxed when the property from which the income is derived is taxed."

These sections are general, leading and controlling as to the subjects of taxation for general purposes, and as to how the same shall or may be taxed. It will be observed that there are four distinct classifications of subjects.

First, that of "capitation tax," which is defined and limited, and the limitation is based on the prescribed valuation of property, classified as such property, as we shall presently see, must be taxed according to its value, and thus it has the quality of definiteness. This is important for such purpose, and as tending to show the meaning to be attributed to the term "property."

A second classification is that of moneys, credits, investments in bonds, or however made as such, all of which must be taxed "by a uniform rate,"—not necessarily according to their value in money,—but each of the subjects so enumerated must be taxed in the same way as the other, and in the same measure, whatever this may be. Thus they may be taxed according to their value, or a fixed per cent or otherwise, "by a uniform rate," in the wise discretion of the General Assembly. It must pass laws taxing such things, but it is left to judge of the expediency of taxing them more or less, and the particular method of taxing them by uniform rule as indicated. Money, in general, passes from one person to another. Credits, bonds and investments are very variable and uncertain, and often precarious in their values, and therefore considerations of justice and public policy might induce the Legislature to tax them at a greater or less rate, as a class of subjects of taxation, than other like subjects. Such seem to have been the reasons, or some of them, for such classification. Anyhow, the Legislature is invested with such power. The classification distinctly appears. The constituent parts of it are enumerated, and must be taxed, and it is particularly prescribed that they must be "by a uniform rule." There is no other limitation or restriction on the power of taxation as to them. This classification is distinctly separated from that which next follows it in sense and application, by a semicolon, while the succeeding one specifies another subject, designated as "real and personal property," as distinguished from the next preceding one, which must be taxed "according to its true value in money." The distinction so prescribed would be unnecessary and nugatory if the subjects embraced by it were put on the same footing and in the same classification with "real and personal property." The distinction specified can and must mean something,—serve some purpose,—and it is difficult to see that it means anything else than the clear classification indicated.

A third classification is that of "all real and personal property" (with specified exceptions), which must be taxed "according to its true value in money." Thus a clear and important fundamental distinction, for the purposes of taxation, is made between "moneys, credits and investments," as specified, and "property." The latter term is used in the limited sense of "realty,"—land,—and "personalty,"—tangible things other than such as are specified in the second and fourth classifications prescribed. While the term "property," in its broadest and most general signification, embraces all kinds of property, including choses in action, rights and credits, and the like things, it is very often and conveniently used in its limited sense, as in the connection under consideration, and this is so notwithstanding the statutory provision, Code, § 8765, par. 6. This provision could not affect the meaning of terms employed in the Constitution; indeed, it purports to apply only to statutes, and not to them, when the meaning is manifestly otherwise than as therein provided and defined. "Real and personal property," thus classified, is such property as is most durable, less transitory, more uniform and steady in its value, and more generally owned and used by individuals of all classes and conditions, than any other. It constitutes, ordinarily, the most certain and leading subject of taxation in every respect. Hence the Constitution classifies it, and prescribes a just and reasonable rule of taxation as to it, that puts it beyond the control of the Legislature, except as to the measure of the taxes levied. The rule as to it is, in effect, that it must be taxed uniformly and ad valorem, because all lands must be taxed.

A fourth classification is that of "trades, professions, franchises and incomes." It is not made mandatory upon the General Assembly to pass laws taxing these subjects of taxation. It is left to it to determine when it is just and expedient to do so. There might be reasons of justice and public policy that would render it unwise to impose a tax on them; and, for the like reason, the tax, when levied, is not necessarily to be uniform. It might be wise to tax some trades, professions, franchises and incomes, and not others, and at one time, and not at another. The subject is intentionally left to the wisdom and discretion of the Legislature. Thus the subjects of taxation, and the methods of taxing them for the purposes of raising the general revenues of the State, are prescribed and established by the Constitution. In section 6 of the same article of the Constitution, it is provided that "the taxes levied by the commissioners of the several counties for county purposes shall be levied in like manner with the state taxes, and shall never exceed the double of the state tax except for special purposes, and with the special approval of the General Assembly." The several counties are constituent parts of the State, and are political instrumentalities thereof, intended to promote and aid in the administration of the government, particularly in the localities where they are situate. It is in and through them, to a very large and material extent, that the government is administered, and the public revenues necessary for that purpose are correspondingly large. Hence the provisions just recited find an appropriate place in the article of the Constitution on the subject of "Revenue and Taxation," and hence, also, the General Revenue Laws of the State embrace counties, and the raising of revenue through them for their proper county purposes. Hence, too, the provision in the section last recited, that "the taxes levied for county purposes shall be levied in like manner with state taxes," implies that they shall be levied "in like manner" in all respects, including the subjects of taxation; otherwise, the "like manner" would be partial, and not to the whole extent as intended.

The article of the Constitution cited above makes no reference to taxation of cities and towns. In another article—that entitled "Municipal Corporations" (§ 9 thereof)—it is provided that "all taxes levied by any county, city, town or township shall be uniform and ad valorem upon all property in the same, except property exempted by this Constitution." The term "property," thus employed, is used in the same restricted sense, and for the like purpose, that it is in the third classification of subjects of taxation, already adverted to above. It applies to the same subject of taxation, and must be taken in the same sense, nothing to the contrary appearing, and nothing does so appear. By the third classification mentioned, "all real and personal property," as pointed out above, must, in effect, be taxed uniformly and ad valorem; and thus it likewise appears that the word "property" is used in the same sense in both of the sections recited. Indeed, the intention of the last-recited section is to exclude the possible inference and conclusion that "municipal corporations" could levy taxes on "property"—real and personal property—otherwise than as the Legislature might do for the general purposes of the State, and to prevent the Legislature from allowing them by statute to do so. Moreover, the use of the word "property" in the exceptive provision of the section last recited also tends to show that it is used in the restricted sense. Such corporations shall not levy taxes upon "property" exempt by the Constitution, and all such "property" is real and personal, in the restricted sense of that term. See article 5, § 5. Besides, to use the term "property" in the last recited section in its broadest sense would render that section as to counties incompatible with article 5, § 6, above recited. This section requires that taxes for county purposes must be levied in "like manner with the state taxes." It is certainly unreasonable and unwarranted to merely infer, in the face of what so appears to the contrary, that cities and towns may—must—levy taxes uniform and ad valorem upon all "property" embraced by that term, used in its broadest sense. Cities and towns cannot levy taxes at all, except as the Legislature may allow them to do; and when they are allowed to levy taxes on property simply, this implies property in the limited sense, and taxes levied upon the same must be "uniform and ad valorem." They cannot tax one sort of such property, and not another, nor can they levy a tax otherwise than ad valorem. The Constitution has fixed the meaning of the term "property," when used in connection with the subject of "Revenue and Taxation," and that meaning must be accepted and acted upon. The Legislature can only levy taxes on the subjects of taxation accordingly as classified, and in the way prescribed and allowed by the Constitution.

There is no provision of the Constitution that requires or allows cities and towns, where they already exist, or shall be created, to levy taxes for their purposes on all or any property, of any kind whatever, within them; nor is there any such provision that requires the Legislature to confer upon them power or authority to do so. The single provision as to them in respect to taxation is that "all taxes levied by" them "shall be uniform and ad valorem upon all property in the same." This must imply when they shall be allowed by appropriate enactment of the Legislature to levy taxes on "property," as explained above. The purpose of the provision is to prevent cities and towns from taxing one species of property they may be allowed to tax, and not another, and one kind more than another, and likewise to prevent the Legislature from allowing them to do so. The Constitution does not regulate the subject of taxation in cities and towns otherwise than as just explained. It is left to the Legislature to allow them to tax property, moneys, credits, investments, trades, professions, franchises and incomes as it may deem wise and expedient; but it is not bound to do so, nor is it required to allow them to tax all such subjects of taxation or none.

Moreover, it is unreasonable and unwarranted to make article 5, § 8, of the Constitution, apply to cities and towns, and not, also, section 1 thereof, in respect to the equation of taxation. What reason can be suggested for such discrimination? Taxation may be unlimited as to towns; it must be limited as to the State and counties. The power of the Legislature to confer upon cities and towns powers of taxation grows out of its power to create and invest them with such powers as it may deem proper, and not inconsistent with the Constitution. The power to create them implies the power to effectuate the purpose by proper, pertinent means. It is wisely left to the Legislature to determine what powers of taxation they shall exercise, and what subjects thereof they may tax. They are not regular instrumentalities of government, like counties. Their purposes are special in a large degree. They afford the people who live in them special advantages, oftentimes varied and peculiar in their nature. They possess more corporate powers and functions than counties, and serve the purpose of the corporators, as such, much more than the same of the public and government. Hence their powers of taxation and what they ought to tax may depend largely upon their circumstances and conditions,—the population; the kinds and character of their business; their industries; the volume of business done in them; their locations, and like considerations.

In Pullen v. Raleigh, 68 N. C. 451, it is distinctly held that the power of city authorities to levy tax upon "debts and securities, for money held by the citizens, depends upon the charter," and that they can only levy taxes on such subjects of taxation as are specified therein; and therefore the City of Raleigh could not levy a tax upon money and credits of its citizens, as such subjects of taxation were not specified in its charter. The court says, in respect to the word "property," that the Constitution (art. 5, § 8) does not make it include "money, credits, investments in bonds," etc.; and that "real and personal property" is used in a sense to exclude such "credits and investments." The opinion is brief, and not very satisfactory, but the case has been cited with approval in numerous cases. Wilson v. Charlotte, 74 N. C. 752; Latta v. Williams, 87 N. C. 126; State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554; Winston v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 210.

In Vaughan v. Murfreesboro, 96 N. C. 317, a recent case, it is cited and commented on at considerable length, and approved as good authority, and it was held in that case (the latest) that, where a statute allowed a town to levy a tax upon all persons and property within the same, it did not authorize a tax on solvent credits, money or bonds. This case, that of Pullen v. Raleigh, supra, and other like cases, are necessarily overruled by the present one.

In Wilson v. Charlotte, supra, it is strongly suggested that the term "property," as used in art. 7, § 9, is not confined "to tangible property;" but this was no more than a suggestion, because in that case the charter of the defendant in terms expressly allowed it to tax all subjects of taxation. This case is cited in Cobb v. Elizabeth City, 75 N. C. 1, as authority to support the decision therein that under the Constitution (art. 7, § 9) all taxes "must be levied, as well on personal as on real property, notwithstanding any contrary provision in the charter. The word 'property' includes bonds, stocks, solvent notes," etc. This is an extreme view, and the court gives no reason for it,—it simply so decided.

In Kyle v. Fayetteville, 75 N. C. 445, it is broadly held, without citing any authority, that inasmuch as the Town of Fayetteville possessed the power of taxation, therefore, perforce of the Constitution (art. 5, § 8; art. 7, § 9), the town must tax all the real and personal property, money, credits, etc., situate in the town. In such a state of conflict and confusion of authorities in a respect so important, I deem it the duty of the court to put an end to doubt and such conflict, as far as practicable, by its decision in this case. It will be observed that I have followed, mainly, Pullen v. Raleigh, supra, and the cases in harmony with it. It seems to me that the interpretation I have given the clauses of the Constitution cited and commented upon is reasonable, and, as well, necessary to the free and efficient operation of the Organic Law in respects of serious moment to the people. Moreover, what I have said and decided is sustained in material measure by a line of decisions already cited.

In the present case, the charter of the defendant Town allowed it to levy a tax "on all the real and personal property not exempt under the state laws in said Town," etc. As has been seen, such provision did not confer on the defendant power to tax money and solvent credits. It therefore had no authority to tax the credits of the plaintiff, as it undertook to do, unless it had such authority by virtue of the General Statute (Code, § 3900), which provides, among other things, that the commissioners of towns may "lay taxes for municipal purposes on all persons, property, privileges and subjects within the corporate limits which are liable to taxation for state and county purposes." I think it had no authority thus conferred, because its charter specified particularly the subjects of taxation it might tax, and the same Statute (Code, § 3827) provides that "this chapter shall apply to all incorporated cities, towns and villages, where the same shall not be inconsistent with special Acts of incorporation, or special laws in reference thereto," etc. The limited power to tax "real and personal property" is not consistent with the larger power to tax all subjects of taxation. For some reason the Legislature limited the defendant's power in such respect. It is not to be presumed that nothing was intended by such limitation. If the General Statute would apply, then the limitation was useless,—served no purpose. I think there is therefore error. The judgment ought to be set aside, and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the stipulation in the controversy submitted.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alexander County in favor of defendants in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

This was a civil action for the recovery of land, tried at the Spring Term, 1889, of the Superior Court of Alexander County, before Clark, Judge.

The land on which the Town of Taylorsville, the county seat of Alexander, is situated, was conveyed to James Thompson, chairman of the Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions, and his successors in office, on the 11th of June, 1847. On the 28d of January, 1898, A. A. Hill, mayor of the Town of Taylorsville, and W. R. Sloan, chairman of the board of county commissioners of Alexander, "in consideration of $100 to A. A. Hill paid by said parties of the second part (the said Sloan joining in the conveyance, to convey any interest the county may have)," conveyed to the plaintiffs, J. C. Moose, W. L. Moose and J. F. Teague, a portion of said land, including all of East Back Street lying between North Main Street and North Back Street (both of which streets East Main crosses), except an alley of sixteen feet wide, next to defendants' lots. The defendants, and those under whom they claim, bought lots bordering on and bounded by the portion of East Back Street covered by deed of plaintiffs, and in controversy, in 1848, under the county authorities, and have occupied the lots since the year 1853. When the ancestor of defendants bought, East Back Street had been laid off 66 feet wide. The plaintiffs claim in this action all of the original street covering the front of the defendants on East Back Street, except the alley in their immediate front, mentioned in the case agreed. The defendant C. J. Carson is the only heir-at-law of J. M. Carson, deceased, and D. P. Carson is the widow of J. M. Carson; and they claim title through the deeds which they produced in evidence. A copy of the old town plat or survey was also shown in evidence. It is admitted that the town was located and laid off, as indicated, in lots and streets, in the year 1847, and the locus in quo was conveyed in deed, and that many of the streets remain unused to this day. The land in controversy is that part of East Back Street described in plaintiffs' deed, and embraced between North Main Street and North Back Street. The width of East Back Street is admitted to be 66 feet, and that defendants are now in possession of all East Back Street lying between North Main Street and North Back Street, except a small part inside of lot fences Nos. 85 and 86, not in controversy; but defendants claim no advantage by reason of possession of the street. At the time plaintiffs purchased, the town authorities left an alley of sixteen feet adjoining defendants' lots Nos. 15 and 18, and running back from North Main Street to North Back Street. It is also admitted that lots Nos. 15 and 16, abutting said East Back Street, were purchased by the defendants, and those under whom they claim, after the town was laid off into lots and streets, as indicated in the plat, and have been in possession of the defendants, and those under whom they claim, ever since the purchase in 1848, and the defendants' deeds cover the said lots. Upon the facts, the court was of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, and gave judgment, accordingly, that defendants go without day, and recover costs. The plaintiffs except to the judgment, and appeal.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is a well-settled principle that where a corporation, acting through its properly-constituted authorities, or an individual, sells or conveys a town or city lot, bounded by streets or alleys, marked out on a plat, and the grantee enters upon it, and expends money in improving it, he is entitled to a right of way over such street or alley, as appurtenant to the land; and any subsequent conveyance by his grantor, or those claiming under him, of the portions of such streets or alleys by which the grantee's lot is bounded, will be held void. Pratt v. Law, 18 U. S. 9 Cranch, 456 [8 L. ed. 791]; 8 Meyer, Fed. Dec. § 1046, Contracts; Chapin v. Brown, 15 R. I. 579, 4 New Eng. Rep. 918; Sarpy v. Municipality No. 2, 9 La. Ann. 597; Port Huron v. Chadwick, 53 Mich. 320; Harrison v. Augusta Factory, 73 Ga. 447.

The grantor thus dedicates the land covered by a street to the use of the public, and will be precluded by such appropriation from reasserting any right to the actual possession of the land, or at least so long as it remains in the public use. Kennedy v. Jones, 11 Ala. 68; Proctor v. Lewiston, 25 Ill. 153; Adams v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. 11 Barb. 414; Penny Pot Landing v. Philadelphia, 16 Pa. 79; Re Pearl St. 111 Pa. 565.

When, by laying off streets, third parties have been induced to buy lots adjacent to them, and build on the lots, by an individual grantor, the dedication to the public use has been held irrevocable, although the streets may not have been formally accepted by the authorities of a town in which they lie. Grogan v. Hayward, 4 Fed. Rep. 161.

No one can acquire, as a general rule, by adverse occupation, as against the public, the right to a street or square dedicated to the public use. Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 437.

We may deduce from the rules of law already stated the further principle that the owners of a lot having a property or easement appurtenant in the adjacent streets, with reference to the advantages of which they expended their money for the land and the improvements put upon it, cannot be deprived of their rights by a sale for the benefit of the town that was in effect, though not nominally, one of the grantors through whom they claim title, nor has the Legislature the power to deprive them of such appurtenant rights by authorizing such grantor, whether a person or a corporation, to again enter upon and sell such streets to others. The General Assembly cannot, without a violation of the Constitution, divest, or provide for divesting, by law, the right of a person to his property, for the purpose of vesting such right in another person or corporation, merely for private use, at all; and it has no power, under the Organic Law, to provide for taking private property for public purposes without just compensation, to be ascertained in a mode pointed out by the law. The appurtenant right of the owner of a lot in the street that formed its boundaries at the time when he, or those under whom he claims, bought it originally, with reference to such outlets, is protected against the reassertion of the grantor's claim to it just as fully as is his title to the lot conveyed, even though the State may undertake by law to sanction the re-entry on the streets by one claiming under his title.

Neither the mayor of the Town of Taylorsville nor the County Commissioners of Alexander County, by virtue of the authority derived from section 1, chap. 86, Priv. Laws 1887, to hold lands conveyed to the town, nor under the more explicit power to sell streets, that in terms is given by chapter 8, Priv. Laws 1889, are empowered to make a valid conveyance to any part of a street with reference to which, as a boundary, the defendants, or those under whom they claim, bought lots in the year 1848, and improved them in 1853. Pratt v. Law, supra; Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493; Brooks v. Riding, 46 Ind. 15.

The said mayor or commissioners cannot diminish the width of such streets from 66 feet, as laid off when the lots were originally sold, to 16, by conveying 50 feet of East Back Street, extending from North Main to North Back Street, and leaving an alley of only 16 feet, as a passway for the defendants, along their front. Their ancestor took with his title all the appurtenant advantages of a street 66 feet wide; and the tendency of converting it into an alley would, or might be, to impair the value of their property for the benefit of the town and without compensation to them. Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. supra; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 675, p. 674, note 1.

The defendants do not own the fee in the street or their front, but hold only an appurtenant easement therein, and the municipal corporation that sold the lots occupied the same relation to them as would an individual grantor who had originally sold to them, or to those under whom they claim, and he could, neither with nor without authority purporting to be derived from the Legislature, have reasserted his right to the streets laid out by him before selling. New Orleans v. United States, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 717 [9 L. ed. 594]; Grogan v. Hayward, supra.

The plaintiffs have shown no such title as would warrant the court in granting a writ of possession. If the fee were vested in the town, which is not conceded, there would still be wanting in the plaintiffs, its grantees, the right to prevent possession and occupancy of a street dedicated to the public. Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 431 [8 L. ed. 452].

It is not necessary to decide whether the mayor of the Town of Taylorsville, by joining the chairman of the board of county commissioners, could, by virtue of a private sale, make a valid conveyance of any land belonging to the town, when the Statute (Code, § 3824) gave the power to the "mayor and commissioners of any incorporated town to sell at public outcry after thirty days' notice." If the original conveyance did not operate to pass the title to the street when executed, the Legislature could not, pending this suit, impart to it such vitality as to relate back to the commencement of the action, and establish plaintiff's right to recover. The municipality derives its powers from the express grant of the Legislature, and exercises and enjoys them subject to the legislative right of revocation; but, in controlling the property of the corporation, the General Assembly is restricted by the fundamental principle that private property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation, nor can a town be invested with authority to violate its implied contract (either directly or through its grantee, who is in privity with it), to provide a street 68 feet wide for the advantage of a lot conveyed by one who held in trust for the benefit of the town. There is no error.

NOTE.—Duress, what constitutes.

Duress is that degree of constraint or danger, either actually inflicted or threatened and impending, sufficient to overcome the mind and will of a person of ordinary firmness. Anderson, Law Dict.; Brown v. Pierce, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 214 (19 L. ed. 138); Baker v. Morton, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 187 (20 L. ed. 264); French v. Shoemaker, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 322 (20 L. ed. 356); United States v. Huckabee, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 431 (21 L. ed. 464); 1 Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. 239; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 301, 302; 1 Wharton, Cont. Pref. IV.; 3 Wharton, Ev. § 931, 1099; 1 Story, Eq. § 239; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 950.

Duress is an actual or threatened violence or illegal restraint of a man's person, to compel him to enter into a contract or to do some act which, in the absence of such violence or restraint, might be valid or legally effective. Dimmitt v. Robbins, 74 Tex. 441.

To constitute duress by threats, it is sufficient that they do in fact compel the person threatened to do an act which otherwise he would not have done. Parmentier v. Pater, 13 Or. 121.

A deed, obligation or contract procured by means of threats to take the life of the person executing it is inoperative and void. Baker v. Morton, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 150 (20 L. ed. 262); Brown v. Pierce, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 205 (19 L. ed. 134).

Moral compulsion, produced by threats to take life or to inflict great bodily harm, is sufficient to constitute duress. French v. Shoemaker, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 314 (20 L. ed. 352).

Although where a person who is attacked by robbers borrows money of another to comply with their demands he is liable for the debt, yet where the lender is shown to be a confederate and conspirator with the pretended robbers, the loan is 7 L. R. A.

made under duress, and is void. Dimmitt v. Robbins, supra.

To constitute duress by threats of illegal arrest, the act which the party seeks to avoid must have been done by him through fear of such threatened arrest. Flaigan v. Minneapolis, 36 Minn. 406.

There can be no binding contract where the physical act of concurrence therein has been coerced through duress of imprisonment. Turley v. Edwards, 1 West. Rep. 450, 18 Mo. App. 689, distinguishing Kitchen v. Greenbaum, 61 Mo. 110.

Where there is no arrest made nor force used, but simply threats uttered, the question of duress is ordinarily one of fact, and it must be shown that the will of the promisor was constrained thereby. Dunham v. Griswold, 100 N. Y. 223, 1 Cent. Rep. 303; Fisher v. Bishop, 36 Hun. 114.

Regard should be had to the age, sex and condition of the parties, and a fear which would not be deemed sufficient to influence a man in the prime of life, might be sufficient in respect to a woman, or a man in the decline of life. Eadie v. Slimmon, 28 N. Y. 12.

A case of duress is sufficiently stated by alleging the circumstances, a threat of prosecution and the fear of its execution, from which the jury may determine its effect. Turley v. Edwards, supra.

It is not necessary to specially allege that, by reason of the threat, free will and agency were overcome. Ibid.

Where evidence is not preserved by bill of exceptions, and the averments contain strong elements of a coercion, a verdict based upon a finding of duress will not be disturbed. Ibid.

What not duress sufficient to invalidate contract.

It is not duress for one who believes himself wronged to threaten the wrong-doer with a civil

Hemingway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant had advertised for sale, and was about to sell, lands of the appellee, under the power contained in two mortgages, purporting to have been executed by him and his wife to secure the payment of certain notes therein described.

One mortgage bears date March 15, 1886, and recites that it was given to secure one note given for borrowed money and six notes for the interest thereon. The other is dated December 8, 1886, and was given to secure the same notes, except one interest note which had been previously satisfied. The appellee's son paid it.

The appellee brought this suit to cancel both mortgages and to restrain a sale under them.

The complaint alleges that the prior deed and the notes therein described are forgeries, and that the plaintiff was entirely ignorant of their existence until the day that he executed the latter deed. That appellant's agent visited his residence on the 8th day of December, 1886, for the purpose of obtaining the deed and notes of that date. That Mangum showed him the forged instruments and told him they had been forged by his son J. E. Watson and that he had thereby obtained the amount of money therein indicated. That he, Mangum, only wanted the money secured, and if that was done the liberty and good name of the son would be saved; but that if it was not done he would be vigorously prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary and lose his standing at the bar and in society. That in order to prevent the prosecution and ruin of the son, the deed of trust and notes, all of which Mangum brought ready for signature, were executed and the deed acknowledged before a justice of the peace, who had accompanied Mangum for that purpose.

The appellee testified that the only consideration for the deed and notes was Mangum's promise not to prosecute his son.

The court found that the material averments of the complaint were true, and that the deeds and notes executed by appellee on the 8th of December were void because they were made upon an illegal and invalid consideration; and it decreed that the appellant should surrender for cancellation said deed and notes and be forever enjoined from selling the land or collecting the notes.

From this judgment the appellant has appealed; he insists that the first mortgage and notes were executed by the appellee and are valid, and that the second mortgage and notes were given as a further security for the first, to remove all doubts as to their validity. He asked no affirmative relief in his answer and we have not considered what his rights would be if he had done so.

The evidence shows that the appellee did not execute the mortgage of March 15, and fails to satisfy us that he was a party to a conspiracy to obtain money by means of it. As the deed was forged, the appellee is not estopped to set it up, although the son obtained money upon the faith of it and loaned a portion of it to him, unless he participated in the illegal acts. A sale under the power in that deed would cast a cloud on the appellee's title and was properly restrained.

suit or a criminal prosecution. Hilborn v. Bucknam, 3 New Eng. Rep. 268, 78 Me. 483; Harmon v. Harmon, 61 Me. 227.

Where an officer threatens to take the execution debtor to jail, unless he secures the debt by a chattel mortgage, when the officer has process requiring him to do so, it is not duress. Bunker v. Steward (Me.), 2 New Eng. Rep. 424.

A mere threat to sue and to arrest defendant in a suit, or by virtue of an execution which could be issued upon a judgment, would not be such duress as would avoid a promise induced by the threat. Dunham v. Griswold, 1 Cent. Rep. 307, 100 N. Y. 224; Higgins v. Brown, 2 New Eng. Rep. 450, 78 Me. 473; Shepherd v. Watrous, 3 Calnes, 168 b; Knapp v. Hyde, 60 Barb. 80; Karmer v. Walter, 2 Edw. Ch. 601.

Mere threats of criminal prosecution, when no warrant has been issued or proceedings commenced, do not constitute duress. Bunker v. Steward, supra.

Where a son, convicted and awaiting sentence with his father for conspiracy to defraud the latter's creditors, gives them a bond to secure their claims; and the court afterwards sentences defendants to pay a merely nominal fine and costs,—he cannot avail himself of the circumstances under which the bond was given as a defense to a suit on it. Avery v. Layton, 12 Cent. Rep. 159, 119 Pa. 604.

Money paid upon a promissory note given by the plaintiff to prevent the prosecution of his son for larceny cannot be recovered, if both parties intended the compounding of the felony; and it is immaterial that the plaintiff was influenced by the duress of the defendant, since both were in pari delicto. Haynes v. Rudd, 3 Cent. Rep. 449, 102 N. Y. 872; Williams v. Bayley, 35 L. J. N. S. Ch. 717.

Where both parties to a settlement compounding a felony stand on an equality, they are in pari delicto, 7 L. R. A.

and neither can recover the consideration. Haynes v. Rudd, supra.

Whether both parties stood in pari delicto depends upon the fact whether the note was given for compounding the felony. Ibid.

So where a note and mortgage were made by a mother to protect her son from prosecution for embezzlement it will be canceled as without consideration and obtained by undue influence. Foley v. Greene, 1 New Eng. Rep. 17, 14 R. I. 618.

In such a case the maxim, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis, does not apply.

A deed for real estate, given in part consideration of the withdrawal of a criminal complaint for embezzlement, is not void, in the absence of proof of any unconscionable advantage taken. Wilcox v. Daniels, 2 New Eng. Rep. 499, 15 R. I. 261.

A note for an amount actually due, executed to prevent the maker from being put out of possession of land under valid legal process, is not executed under duress. Davis v. Rice (Ala.) 6 So. Rep. 751.

Threats and intimidation by the judgment creditor, which secured the execution of a bond, if true, render the bond void. Mills v. Rodowald, 17 Hun, 304; Whelan v. Whelan, 3 Cow. 537; Sears v. Shafer, 1 Barb. 408, 6 N. Y. 272; Ellis v. Messervie, 11 Paige, 467; Evans v. Ellis, 5 Denio, 640.

Threats to one party by a stranger to the contract (e. g., the husband of that party), without the knowledge of the party, will not avoid the contract. Fairbanks v. Snow, 5 New Eng. Rep. 180, 145 Mass. 158; Gardner v. Case, 10 West. Rep. 800, 111 Ind. 494.

Duress cannot be set up by a stranger. Oak v. Dustin, 3 New Eng. Rep. 614, 79 Me. 23.

The surety on a bail bond cannot offer as a defense the fact that the principal was compelled by duress to give the bond. Ibid.

The question whether the appellee, on the case made by him, is entitled to any relief as against the latter mortgage and notes, is not free from difficulty. His case in effect is, that his son had forged a mortgage, on the faith of which he had obtained money from the appellant. That appellant desired to obtain security for that money and appellee desired to suppress the criminal prosecution of the son. That appellant proposed to appellee, that if he would execute the mortgage and notes tendered, appellant would not prosecute his son. That the proposition was accepted and the papers executed and received accordingly. That the son was prosecuted through other agencies and the appellee at no time sought to withdraw from the compact or to recover the securities given in pursuance of it, until the sale was advertised, —an interval of over two years,—and never released the appellant from his promise except as it may be implied by bringing this suit.

Upon this state of case, can the appellant invoke equitable relief?

The allegation of duress is not sustained. It seems to be conceded that the son was guilty of a felony and the appellant threatened only to prosecute him for his crime unless the amount obtained was secured. It was not a threat to prosecute on a simulated charge in order to extort money. Marvin v. Marvin (Ark.) 12 S. W. Rep. 875.

It is a practical principle that guides equity courts in their administration of justice that he who invokes their aid must come with clean hands—that he who hath committed iniquity shall not have equity. It is the policy of the law that crime shall be prosecuted, and it prohibits, under severe penalties, the suppression of prosecution. An injured party, who agrees with the felon who robs him that he will not prosecute him on condition that he return the stolen goods, or who takes a reward on such condition, violates the spirit as well as the letter of the law. The party who gives a reward and the party who receives it, on such condition, stand in pari delicto.

Mr. Story, treating the subject as to the rights of parties to such an agreement, states the law as it is generally approved: "The general rule is that, where an illegal contract has been made, neither courts of law nor of equity will interfere to grant any relief to the parties, but will leave them where they find them, if they have been equally cognizant of the illegality." 2 Story, Cont. § 486; 2 Parsons, Cont. 746; 2 Addison, Cont. pp. 715, 724; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 402.

There are some exceptions to the rule where the contract is malum prohibitum, as also where public policy is considered as advanced by allowing the parties or the less culpable one to sue for relief; but it is not material to consider the exceptions now, for cases like this have been considered to fall within the general rule.

In the case of Atwood v. Fisk, 101 Mass. 363, Atwood sued to compel the surrender and cancellation of the notes, and a mortgage given to secure them, on the ground that they were given upon the consideration that the defendant would not prosecute him for a felony. The bill was dismissed because the plaintiff was not in a position to claim the equitable relief prayed for.

Compton v. Bunker Hill Bank, 96 Ill. 301, is a case in which a wife sought to cancel a conveyance executed by her to the defendant in consideration of its promise not to prosecute her husband for embezzlement; the court reviewed the authorities and concluded that the bill should be dismissed, saying: "But though the deed may be void for such reason, equity does not relieve the party who executed it upon or for such illegal and immoral consideration and purpose."

We might add many citations to the same effect: Allison v. Hess, 28 Iowa, 389; Worcester v. Eaton, 11 Mass. 877; Smith v. Rowley, 66 Barb. 503; Swartzerv. Gillett, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 207.

Nor can he derive benefit from the rule, that a party to an executory, illegal contract may rescind it while it is executory and unperformed, and recover back money paid under it. The contract was to give notes and mortgage in consideration of a promise not to prosecute for a felony. When the papers were delivered and the promise given, there was nothing more to be done by either party, and the contract was fully executed.

It was held in Atwood v. Fisk, supra, that the delivery of securities was the same in effect as the payment of money. But conceding that there was a time when the appellee might have withdrawn from his illegal compact, removed the obstacle he had placed in the way of justice and recovered the securities, he never sought to do it, until the illegal purpose failed from other causes, and his agreement no longer thwarted justice. Both parties, following impulses of their own, willfully contracted to violate the law. The law will lend no aid to either of them but leave them where they have placed themselves.

The judgment will be reversed, and a judgment rendered here canceling the mortgage of March 15, 1886, and enjoining any sale under it; but no relief will be given as against the second mortgage.

A stockholder's liability to creditors of the corporation because of the failure to make and record a certificate of the payment of all the capital stock as required by the Act of 1875, is not penal and survives his death.

(February 25, 1890.)

APPEAL by the executors of William A. Wiechers, deceased, from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of the New York Special Term denying a motion to revive against such executors an action to enforce the liability of said Wiechers, as a stockholder of the defendant corporation, for corporate debts. Affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Schmitt, with Messrs. Abbott & Fuller, for appellants:

Wiechers' only liability is under § 87, chap. 511, Laws 1875, and an action to enforce it is a penal action and does not survive.

An action against the trustees of a corporation for failure to file a report, as required by the Statute, is penal in its character and does not survive against the executors of a deceased trustee.

California Bank v. Collins, 5 Hun, 209; Easterly v. Barber, 65 N. Y. 252; Reynolds v. Mason, 54 How. Pr. 218, affirmed, 6 N. Y. Week. Dig. 531; Stokes v. Stickney, 98 N. Y. 323.

In cases where an action does not survive by express statute the survivorship of actions is confined to actions ex contractu, express or implied.

People v. Starkweather, 8 Jones & S. 460.

So far as the executors of a deceased stockholder who had paid in the full amount of his subscription are concerned, the action in any event is in the nature of a penalty, and does not survive.

Irvine v. McKeon, 23 Cal. 472; Erickson v. Nesmith, 4 Allen, 233; Halsey v. McLevin, 12 Allen, 442; Andrews v. Callender, 13 Pick. 490; Ritpley v. Sampson, 10 Pick. 872; Dane v. Dane Mfg. Co. 14 Gray, 488; Woodruff & B. Iron Works v. Chittenden, 4 Bosw. 406; Vincent v. Sands, 42 How. Pr. 235; Gregory v. German Bank, 3 Colo. 333; Victory Webb Printing & F. Mach. Mfg. Co. v. Beecher, 26 Hun, 52.

Mr. Henry D. Hotchkiss, for respondents:

The individual liability of the stockholder is an essential element in the contract by which the stockholders become members of the corporation. The liability arises from the fact that the individual is a member of the body corporate, and as such is responsible for the debt.

Chase v. Lord, 77 N. Y. 38; Corning v. McOullough, 1 N. Y. 47; Story v. Furman, 25 N. Y. 214; Lovry v. Inman, 48 N. Y. 119; Wiles v. Suydam, 64 N. Y. 178.

Everyone who becomes a member of the company by subscribing to its stock assumes this liability, which continues until the capital stock is all paid up and a certificate of that fact is made, published and recorded. The fact that the liability ceases when these events take place does not change its nature and make that a penalty which would, without such limitation, be a liability founded on contract.

Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371 (27 L. ed. 966).

A cause of action to enforce such liability survives the death of the stockholder.

Batley v. Hollister, 26 N. Y. 112; Chase v. Lord, 77 N. Y. 1, 6 Abb. N. C. 258; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27 (30 L. ed. 864).

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs are judgment creditors of the American Opera Company, Limited, a domestic corporation formed under chapter 611 of the Laws of 1875, for the incorporation of business corporations with limited liability. The capital stock of the company was fixed at $500,000, only $148,000 of which was ever paid in, and no certificate that the capital stock had been paid in has ever been made or recorded, as prescribed by the Statute under which the company was incorporated. The plaintiffs' action is in the nature of a creditors' suit to settle the affairs of the American Opera Company, Limited, and to distribute its assets, as well as the proceeds of the stockholders' individual liability, among the company's creditors. Pfuhl v. Simpson, 74 N. Y. 187.

The complaint alleges the incorporation of the company; the amount of its capital stock; the amount paid in, as above stated; and the fact that no certificate of the company had been made or filed as required by the Statute. Numerous persons have been joined as defendants with the opera company, as to whom it is alleged that they are either creditors or stockholders of the company, and among these William A. Wiechers was named as a defendant as to whom it was claimed that he was a stockholder holding twenty-five shares of the stock of the company. It is also alleged in the complaint that several of the parties defendant who were stockholders were indebted to the company for their stock. This allegation is general, and the particular persons claimed to be so indebted are not named. Wiechers was served with the complaint, and appeared and answered. On or about December 14, 1888, he died, leaving a last will and testament wherein he appointed executors. The will has been admitted to probate by the surrogate of New York County, and letters testamentary issued to the executors, who have qualified and taken upon themselves the execution of the will. After the death of Wiechers the plaintiffs applied to the special term to revive and continue the action against the executors, and the special term denied the motion, upon the ground that the cause of action stated in the complaint against the deceased was of a penal character, and did not survive. Upon appeal to the general term from this order, it was reversed, and the court directed that the action be revived and continued against the executors of Wiechers, and that the plaintiffs have leave to serve a supplemental summons and complaint on the executors. From the order of reversal the executors have appealed to this court.

The cause of action stated in the complaint against the stockholders is twofold: first, it is alleged that many of them are indebted to the company for their capital stock; and, second, that as the capital stock was never fully paid in, and no certificate thereof ever made or filed, the defendants who were stockholders are liable for its debts to the extent of their stock. The question is whether a liability of this character on the part of a stockholder to the creditors of a corporation survives. If the liability is penal in its nature, it is conceded that it does not survive; while if the liability is in the nature of a contract obligation it is conceded that it does.

The provision of the Statute of 1875 (chap. 611, § 37), upon which this action is based, so far as the stockholders are concerned, is as follows: "In limited-liability companies all the stockholders shall be severally individually liable to the creditors of the company in which they are stockholders to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by them, respectively, for all debts and contracts made by such company, until the whole amount of capital stock fixed and limited by such company has been paid in, and a certificate thereof has been made and recorded as hereinafter prescribed."

We think the liability created by this Statute survived the death of the stockholder, and continues against the executors. It is not like the liability of a trustee for neglecting to make a report, or for declaring dividends out of capital stock, or acts of a kindred character. These are breaches of duty on the part of the managing agents of the corporation for which the Statute has made them liable, and this liability cannot be said to rest upon or grow out of a contract. The liability of a stockholder in the present case is different. Upon becoming the owner of the stock, he voluntarily assumes the obligations imposed by the Statute, and the creditors of the corporation who trust it may be said to do so upon the faith of the Statute, which is part of the contract. The statutory obligation is inherent in and forms a part of every contract that the corporation makes with creditors prior to the time that the certificate required by the Statute is filed.

In Louvy v. Inman, 46 N. Y. 119, Allen, J., stated the principle (pages 125, 126) as follows: "A personal liability of stockholders for the debts of a corporation, in virtue of the charter, is not in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture, and does not exist solely as a liability imposed by statute. It is not enforced simply as a statutory obligation, but is regarded as voluntarily assumed by the act of becoming a stockholder. By such act he assents to be bound, or that his property shall be charged with debts of the corporation, to the extent and in the manner prescribed by the Act of Incorporation."

In Wiles v. Snyder, 64 N. Y. 173, it was sought to hold the defendant as a stockholder in a manufacturing company on his liability under § 10 of the Act of 1848, chap. 40,—a section which, in substance, is almost identical with the one now under consideration; and also as a trustee on his liability for all the debts, because of a failure to file a report. A demurrer on the ground of the improper joinder of causes of action was sustained. The court, distinguishing between the two kinds of liability, said (Church, Ch. J.): "The cause of action against the defendant as a stockholder consists of the debt, and the liability created by statute against stockholders when the stock has not been paid in, and a certificate of that fact recorded. . . . The first cause of action against the defendant as a stockholder is an action on contract. The six-years' Statute of Limitations applies. The defendant is entitled to contribution."

The liability of Wiechers, therefore, being in the nature of a contract obligation, it survived his death, and the action can be continued against his personal representative.

In Bailey v. Hollister, 26 N. Y. 112, the court expressly recognized this principle. Gould, J., said: "It will be conceded that, when a stockholder in any corporation dies, his estate succeeds him in the title to, and the rights in, the stock he held. Of necessity, it must take that title and those rights subject to any liability then existing upon them; and so long as the estate is, by operation of law, the holder of such stock, the estate must become responsible for any obligations accruing during that time, which the law may impose upon any holder of the stock, as such. Such liability proceeds, not from any new contract, made by or on behalf of the estate, but is inherent in the property itself; . . . or, calling it a 'contract liability,' it arises out of a contract made by the stockholder, and binding his personal representatives as it bound him, as long as the relation of stockholder existed." The liability of the estate of the deceased stockholder under the Statute is so well established upon principle and authority that further discussion is unnecessary. Chase v. Lord, 77 N. Y. 1; Flash v. Conn. 109 U. S. 371 [27 L. ed. 906]; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27 [80 L. ed. 804].

The order of the Special Term denying the motion to revive and continue the action against the executors was properly reversed by the General Term, and its order of reversal should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The finding of the referees that Susannah Wilder executed and delivered to the defendant the deed of June 20, 1853, is supported by evidence and has been confirmed by the general term. The execution of the deed by the grantor was proved by two witnesses who were present at the time, and no attempt was made on the trial to show that the signature to the deed was not genuine. The fact of delivery was not directly proved by an eye witness. But the defendant produced the deed, and the possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence of delivery, where there is nothing to impeach the bona fides of his possession. The other circumstances proved on the part of the defendant confirm the presumption of delivery arising from possession of the deed. It was shown that it was drawn by a scrivener, pursuant to the directions of the grantor. The sister of the defendant testified to declarations of her mother, the grantor, to the effect that she intended that the son should have the lot in question. She also testified that from the time of the execution of the deed until the mother's death, several years thereafter, the deed was in the custody of the defendant and was kept by him in a box with his other papers.

The defendant's wife was permitted, without objection, to testify to the same fact. The defendant rented the house, paid taxes and made repairs on the premises, and during his mother's life, after the deed had been executed, exercised such control of the property as usually attends ownership.

If the evidence on the part of the plaintiff can be regarded as casting any doubt upon the point whether there was an absolute delivery of the deed, with intent to pass the title to the property, we are concluded by the finding in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff claims title to an undivided part of the premises in question under deeds from some of the heirs of Susannah Wilder, who died intestate July 15, 1868, executed after her death. The deed from Susannah Wilder to the defendant was neither acknowledged by her nor was its execution attested by a subscribing witness. The plaintiff insists that for this reason the deed was void as to the plaintiff under the Statute (1 Rev. Stat. 738, § 187), which declares that an unacknowledged and unattested deed "shall not take effect as against a purchaser or incumbrancer until so acknowledged."

The conclusive answer to this claim is that the plaintiff is not a purchaser within the meaning of the Statute. The word "purchaser" in this Statute means one who derives title by purchase from the grantor in the unacknowledged and unattested deed, or from one who, himself, is mediately or immediately a purchaser from such grantor. The word "purchase," as designating the origin and nature of title to real property, has a technical but well settled meaning. It includes every mode of acquisition of an estate in land known to the law, except that by which an heir on the death of his ancestor becomes substituted in his place as owner by operation of law. Burrill, Dict. title Purchase.

The heir who takes by descent is not a purchaser in the eye of the law, and does not hold the estate descended by purchase. He may, when he has come into the inheritance, originate a title by purchase, upon his conveyance to another, but his own title is not such. The Statute uses the word "purchase" in its legal sense. It is well settled that the title under an unacknowledged and unattested deed duly delivered is good as between the parties. This is so both under the Statute and at common law. Wood v. Chapin, 13 N. Y. 509; Dole v. Thurlow, 12 Met. 157.

The grantor cannot reclaim the estate conveyed, in contravention of his deed, nor can his heirs. Both are bound by it. The Statute does not aid the grantor's heirs, for the reason that they are not purchasers, and as to them the Statute has no application.

On the death of Susannah Wilder she was neither seised nor had she any title to the land in question, and the heirs took no other estate by descent than such as was vested in her at her death. Their conveyance to the plaintiff conveyed nothing, because they had no interest to convey. The defendant's deed, which was good as against Susannah Wilder, was good also against her heirs or those claiming title from them.

This disposes of the case. We think it unnecessary to consider whether the exception taken to the question put to the defendant, as to the time during which he had possession of the deed, was well taken. It would be difficult to sustain the ruling under our recent decision in Oliff v. Moss, 112 N. Y. 426.

Excluding, however, the defendant's evidence on this point, there is left the uncontradicted evidence of two unimpeached witnesses to the fact that the deed was in his possession after its execution, during his mother's life.

We find no error in the record prejudicial to the plaintiff, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Wygant v. Smith, 2 Lana. 185; Youmans v. Boomhower, 3 Thomp. & C. 24.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1882, the Yates County National Bank recovered a judgment in justice's court against Zeno T. Carpenter and others, for about $111, and caused a transcript thereof to be filed in the county clerk's office, July 17, 1884. In June 1884, the United States government issued and delivered an invalid pension certificate to Zeno T. Carpenter, as a soldier in the United States army, which was deposited by him in the First National Bank of Yates County, for collection, in July, 1884. In October, 1884, Carpenter purchased and took a conveyance of a dwelling-house and lot in the Village of Penn Yan, his place of residence, from one Hurford, for $1,300, paying the sum of $700, cash, upon the purchase price and securing the balance by a mortgage to the grantor upon said lot. The cash payment was made from moneys received by him from the First National Bank, as part of the collection of his pension certificate. Carpenter was a married man, having a wife and five infant children, and the house and lot were purchased for the purpose of securing a home for himself and family. He had no other means, or property, liable for the payment of debts. In February, 1885, the Yates County National Bank caused an execution upon such judgment to be issued and levied upon said house and lot, and advertised the interest of said Carpenter therein for sale at public auction to satisfy said execution.

Upon proof of these facts Carpenter moved the county court for an order setting aside the said levy and enjoining the plaintiff from taking any proceedings to enforce said execution by the sale of said real estate, upon the ground that such property was exempt from levy and sale upon execution. That court granted the order asked for; but, upon appeal to the general term this order was reversed and such motion was denied. The defendant, Carpenter, appeals to this court from the order of reversal.

At the time of the levy, the only interest Carpenter had in such real estate was an equity of redemption, which we must assume, on the facts in this case, did not exceed in value the sum paid for it, and it therefore represents, to the extent of his interest, the proceeds of his pension. Was this interest liable to levy and sale on execution? The plaintiff insists that it is, and such is the judgment of the court below. The question presented involves the construction of § 1393 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, so far as the matter here concerned is affected, reads as follows: "A pension heretofore, or hereafter, granted by the United States . . . for military . . . services . . . is also exempt from levy and sale by virtue of an execution, and from seizure for non-payment of taxes, or in any other legal proceeding." That statutes of this character are to be liberally construed, with the view of promoting the objects of the legislation, is established by a uniform course of authority; and that their force and effect are not to be confined to the literal terms of the Act has also been held in numerous cases.

In Hudson v. Plets, 11 Paige, 180, it was held that a creditor's bill would not reach the right of action of a judgment debtor for the conversion of exempt property.

In Andrews v. Rowan, 23 How. Pr. 126, it was held that a receiver of the property of a debtor, appointed in supplementary proceedings, did not take a claim or a judgment thereon for damages accruing to such debtor from one who had wrongfully taken and sold his exempt property on execution for debt.

Justice Grover, writing the opinion of the supreme court in that case, says: "If the judgment rendered for the injury may be acquired by a judgment creditor, by proceeding supplemental to execution, there would be nothing to prevent seizing exempt property, selling it upon execution, and, when the debtor had sued and recovered a judgment therefor, compelling the application of such judgment to the payment of the debt for which the property was seized, thus entirely depriving the debtor of the exemption, and enabling the creditor in this way to collect his debt from property that the law has declared not liable for its payment."

The only case in this court bearing upon the subject is that of Tillotson v. Wolcott, 48 N. Y. 188, where it was held that the exemption of a team, provided for a householder, should also apply to a judgment recovered by such householder against one who had tortiously taken and converted it to his own use. It was said by the court that "the judgment when recovered by the debtor for the wrongful invasion of his privilege of the exemption of his property from levy and sale, represents the property for the value of which it was recovered." While the language of the Statute did not, in terms, cover a judgment, it was held that it came within its spirit and could not be taken by creditors. The opinion of Justice Grover in Andrews v. Rowan, 23 How. Pr. 126, is referred to and approved in the opinion of Judge Leonard.

The General Exemption Laws of the State provide for the protection of specific articles or classes of property with a view of alleviating the condition of the poor by securing to them the use or consumption of the property exempted; but the present law has departed from the ordinary form of exemption and, while seeking to accomplish the same object, provides, in terms, for the exemption of money or its equivalent. It is quite obvious that such an exemption can produce no beneficial effect, unless it is extended beyond the letter of the Act, and given life and force according to its evident spirit and meaning. Like other statutes, the section in question must be construed according to the meaning and intent of the law-makers and so as to effectuate their intention, so far as the language of the Act will permit it to be done. Did the Legislature intend to limit the force of their exemption to a pension so long only as it remained an obligation of the government, or consisted of cash in the hands of the pensioner; or did they also intend to protect it after it had been expended in the purchase of articles of property designed to administer to the comfort and support of such pensioner and his family.

If the latter was not intended, we must ascribe to the law-makers the absurd intention of granting pensions for the purpose of satisfying claims against pensioners, and not to provide for the care and comfort of invalid or aged soldiers. If the soldier is not protected in the act of exchanging his pension for the necessities of life, its only effect would be to enable his creditors to take it in satisfaction of their claims. No benefit is conferred if the protection is not extended beyond the possession of the money itself, for its only value consists in its purchasing power, and if the soldier is deprived of that, the pension might as well, so far as he is concerned, have remained ungranted. The plain purpose of the Act was to promote the comfort of the soldier; to secure to him the bounty of the government free from the claims of creditors, and to insure him and his family a safe, although modest, maintenance so long as their needs required it. In the case of an exemption of specific articles from levy and sale upon execution, it seems to be well settled that it extends not only to the protection of such articles while in use or possession, but also to any claim arising out of their conversion by a wrong-doer, or their destruction by fire or otherwise, when insured. Freeman, Executions, § 235.

The rule seems to be just and reasonable and within the spirit of the exemption. In the case of the exemption of money, or its equivalent, there has been some controversy in the courts with reference to the extent to which the exemption shall be carried. In such case it is somewhat difficult to lay down a rule in precise terms by which it may be determined in all cases what property is liable and what exempt from levy and seizure upon legal process for the payment of debts, but we entertain no doubt that where the receipts from a pension can be directly traced to the purchase of property, necessary or convenient for the support and maintenance of the pensioner and his family, such property is exempt under the provisions of this Statute.

Where such moneys can be clearly identified and are used in the purchase of necessary articles, or are loaned or invested for purposes of increase or safety, in such form as to secure their available use for the benefit of the pensioner in time of need, we do not doubt but that they come within the meaning of the Statute; but where they have been embarked in trade, commerce or speculation, and become mingled with other funds so as to be incapable of identification or separation, we do not doubt but that the pensioner loses the benefit of the statutory exemption. These propositions, we think, are fully supported by the cases in this and other States. See Freeman, Executions, § 235, title Proceeds of Exempt Property.

In Burgett v. Fancher, 35 Hun, 647, and Stockwell v. Malone Bank, 36 Hun, 583, it was held that moneys received from a pension and deposited in a bank in the name of the pensioner were not subject to proceedings on the part of creditors to have them applied in payment of debts, although the relations between the depositor and the bank were those of creditor and debtor. The debt represented the pension and that was exempted by the Statute.

The case of Wygant v. Smith, 2 Laus. 185, when limited, as it must be, to the facts appearing in the case, is not an authority for the plaintiff here. In that case the pensioner had embarked his pension in business or trade, and in some transactions had made a profit. It was impossible to identify the fund in the various articles of property in which, through numerous and successive changes, it had become invested, and it was held that the pensioner had lost his right of exemption.

The order of the General Term should be reversed and that of the County Court affirmed, with costs to defendant in all courts.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.)

CORN EXCHANGE BANK, Appt.,

v.

FARMERS NATIONAL BANK of Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

(118 N. Y. 423.)

1. A bank which has charged up to the drawer, canceled and sent a draft in payment of a check received through the agency of two other banks, which had successively received it for collection, the latter of which, not knowing that the former was not the owner thereof (the payee's indorsement being in blank), having given credit therefor, reserving the right to charge it back if dishonored, and sent it on for collection and remittance, cannot, at the request of the drawer and payee of the check, stop payment of the draft to the correspondent bank, because the bank first receiving the check for collection had become insolvent. The insolvent bank only is the agent of the payee of the check, and the drawee, after signing the draft, is not justified in refusing payment for the benefit of such payee, even assuming that he is entitled to the proceeds thereof.

2. Only the first of several banks successively receiving a check for collection is the agent of the payee.

Whiting v. Rochester City Bank, 77 N. Y. 363.

Messrs. Clark & Sanborn, for respondent: Cameron delivered the check to the Harrisons only for collection. The Harrisons having indorsed it to plaintiff expressly for collection, plaintiff held it only as agent for that purpose, and had no other interest in it. While the check was in plaintiff's possession, Cameron could have demanded and recovered it, or its value, from plaintiff.

If the money had been collected by plaintiff on the check, Cameron could have claimed and recovered the money immediately from plaintiff.

Dickerson v. Wason, 47 N. Y. 439.

The fact that the proceeds of the check, instead of having been paid to plaintiff in current money, took the form of the draft payable to plaintiff's order, cannot make any difference as to the right to those proceeds. The agency of plaintiff constituted the only consideration for the draft, and the only right of plaintiff to receive payment of the debt represented by the draft; and it matters not whether plaintiff be considered the direct agent of Cameron, or a sub-agent, for in either case Cameron, the principal, had the power to revoke the agency, and when that power was exercised, that consideration at once failed, and that right terminated, and the draft was thereafter of no effect in plaintiff's hands.

Defendant, by receiving and retaining the check and returning it to the drawer, became indebted to the owner of the check in the amount named in it.

People v. Merchants & M. Bank, 78 N. Y. 272.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1884, Mary C. Melson resided at Lancaster, Pa., where the Farmers National Bank of Lancaster was located, with which she kept an account. July 9, 1884, she drew a check on this Bank for $1,871.84, payable to John J. Cameron or order, and mailed it to him at Indianapolis, Ind., who, July 15, 1884, indorsed it in blank and delivered it to a firm of private bankers doing business at Indianapolis under the name of "Harrisons' Bank." The check, though indorsed in blank, was in fact delivered and received for the purpose of collection only. The Corn Exchange Bank was the New York City correspondent of Harrisons' Bank, and they exchanged collections and kept mutual accounts, Harrisons' Bank being accustomed to draw sight bills or checks against its balance with the Corn Exchange Bank. The view we take of this case makes it unnecessary to further consider the manner in which these accounts had previously been kept.

July 15, 1884, Harrisons' Bank indorsed the check to the Corn Exchange Bank for collection and credit and forwarded it by mail. It was received July 17, and credited by the Corn Exchange Bank to Harrisons' Bank, reserving, however, the right to charge it to Harrisons' Bank if it should be dishonored. It was not found by the court, nor was it asserted, that the Corn Exchange Bank knew or had the slightest reason to suspect that Harrisons' Bank did not own the check and was acting only as a collecting agent for Cameron or some undisclosed owner, and so the Corn Exchange Bank became the holder of the check in good faith, and could, had it been dishonored, have maintained an action thereon for its collection. July 17, the Corn Exchange Bank indorsed the check "for collection and remittance" to the Farmers' National Bank of Lancaster, the drawee, with directions to remit by draft, payable in the City of New York. July 18 the check was received by the Farmers' National Bank of Lancaster, was charged to the account of the drawer, Mary C. Melson, and canceled. For this service the Farmers' National Bank of Lancaster charged the Corn Exchange Bank $1.84, and on the same day drew its check, or sight draft, payable to the Corn Exchange Bank or order, on the First National Bank of New York for $1,870, and mailed it to the Corn Exchange Bank. The check was no longer a valid contract. The liability of the drawer and indorsers thereon was ended and could never be restored. The Lancaster Bank had legally and in good faith discharged its duty to the drawer, the indorsers and the holder of the check, and the Corn Exchange Bank had accepted of the draft of the Lancaster Bank in discharge of the liability of the drawer and indorsers. The Lancaster Bank accepted of the agency tendered by the Corn Exchange Bank, performed the services and received payment therefor. The relation of principal and agent was established, and in discharge of its liability thus assumed the Lancaster Bank mailed the draft. July 17, 1884, Harrisons' Bank failed, and on the 18th, but after the check had been paid and canceled, and the draft given in payment mailed, the drawer of the check, Mary C. Melson, and the payee, John J. Cameron, requested the Lancaster Bank to stop payment of its draft, which it did, and the draft was dishonored.

The Corn Exchange Bank brings this action to recover the amount of the draft, which the Lancaster Bank defends on the ground that the plaintiff did not hold the check for value and is not entitled to its proceeds as against John J. Cameron, the payee. The defense is not placed on the ground that it is necessary to protect the defendant from any present or future liability, for it is conceded that it has exactly performed all of its duties in respect to the check. It does not deny that it became the agent, for a consideration, of the Corn Exchange Bank, and promised by its draft to pay the plaintiff $1,870.

By the law of this State Harrisons' Bank was the agent for Cameron, but neither the plaintiff nor defendant was his agent; and had either neglected to take the necessary steps to collect the check, to Cameron's injury, he would have had no right of action against either, but would have had a cause of action against Harrisons' Bank. Allen v. Merchants Bank, 22 Wend. 215; Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459; Commercial Bank of Pa. v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 203; Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y. 570; Pittsburg Exchange Nat. Bank v. Third Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 276 [28 L. ed. 722]; Morse, Banks and Banking, 3d ed. § 272.

In Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank and the Bank of the State of New York, supra, the plaintiff indorsed and sent a draft to the Albany City Bank for collection, which in turn indorsed and sent it to the Bank of the State of New York for collection, but the latter bank negligently omitted to present the draft for payment, and the drawer and indorsers were discharged. The plaintiff sued both banks and recovered against both at circuit, and the judgment was affirmed by the general term; but it was reversed in the court of appeals as to the Bank of the State of New York, and affirmed as to the Albany City Bank. It was said: "The New York State Bank was the agent directly guilty of the neglect. That bank was employed to do the service by the plaintiff's agent, the Albany City Bank, as its agent, to which it was alone responsible for its acts and neglect, and for which the latter, according to the settled rule, was alone responsible to the plaintiff, there being no agreement to the contrary, expressed or implied."

It is unnecessary to specially consider the cases which were decided in this State prior to Allen v. Merchants Bank, supra, or those of States in which it is held that the bank receiving payment of the paper is the agent of the owner notwithstanding it may have passed through several banks before reaching the bank making the collection.

The ground upon which the defendant seeks to justify the refusal to perform its contract with its principal seems to be that if the plaintiff receives the money, it ought to pay it to John J. Cameron, but may not, and therefore this defense.

Assuming, but not deciding, that Cameron could maintain an action against the Corn Exchange Bank to recover the amount of the check, such fact would in no wise support this defendant's contention. No contract relation exists between it and Cameron, nor is there any privity between them.

When the owner of commercial paper delivers it for collection to bank A, which forwards it for collection to bank B, which, in turn, forwards it for collection to bank C, to which it is paid, it has been held that if bank C, instead of paying the money to bank B, retains and applies it on a debt due from bank B, the owner (bank A being insolvent) may recover of bank C; but we are unable to see that these cases justify this defendant in resisting the payment of its draft, to which it has no defense, for the benefit of a third person, who may have a right to recover the money represented by it.

The check which the defendant received from the plaintiff having been paid, charged to the account of the drawer and surrendered, the account closed, and the draft therefor delivered to the Corn Exchange Bank, the defendant cannot now assert as against its principal the legal rights or equities of a third person. McKay v. Draper, 27 N. Y. 256; Aubery v. Fiske, 36 N. Y. 47; Wharton, Ag. § 242, and cases there cited.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Bradley, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur with the majority of the court in the result or reasons given for it.

The check drawn by Mrs. Melson on the defendant was indorsed in blank by Cameron, the payee, and left with the Harrisons, the Indianapolis bankers, for collection. They indorsed it to the plaintiff's cashier for collection, and sent the check to the plaintiff, their correspondent in the City of New York, and the latter in like manner indorsed it to the cashier of the defendant, and sent the check to him with directions to remit to the plaintiff its proceeds in New York City funds. This was received by the defendant on July 18, and on the same day it drew its draft on the First National Bank of New York for the amount less exchange, and mailed it to the plaintiff. The Harrisons failed and suspended payment on July 17, and immediately after hearing of such failure and on July 19 Cameron requested the defendant not to pay it, and afterwards, before the defendant's draft was presented, requested the defendant to stop its payment, and thereupon, on the last-named day, the defendant notified the bank on which its draft was drawn not to pay the draft and asked the plaintiff to hold it. It was, however, afterwards presented to the drawee, and payment being refused, the draft was protested for non-payment. This action was brought on that draft, and the question is whether the facts, so stated, constitute a defense. They clearly would not if the plaintiff had taken the apparent and actual title to the check and become a holder of it in good faith for value, because the indorsement in blank by the payee apparently operated as a transfer of the check to the Harrisons. But the plaintiff parted with nothing on the faith of the check. While the letter in which it was received by the plaintiff stated that it was inclosed for credit, the indorsement made upon the check by the Harrisons was restrictive and purported that it was sent to the plaintiff for collection. And it appears that this portion of the letter preceded the statement of the remittance and was printed and was the ordinary form of the letters of the Harrisons in which all their transmissions of paper to the plaintiff were made.

That fact may, in view of the manner that the indorsement was made, deny to that formal portion of the letter the significance which it might otherwise have had. But it has no essential importance upon the question here, inasmuch as the plaintiff advanced nothing upon the check. The plaintiff had for many years had an account current with the Harrisons arising from remittances of paper from each to the other for collection and credit of the proceeds, and the latter from time to time drew drafts upon the former. When the check was received by the plaintiff, the amount of it was credited to the Harrisons in such account, and, after the protest of the draft, was charged back to them in accordance with the course of dealing, as understood between those parties, that if paper received and credited was not paid it should be placed to the debit of the party sending it.

The check having been placed in Harrisons' hands for collection, the plaintiff by crediting them with it in general account acquired no title to it as against Cameron, the payee. His was the right to reclaim the check or to obtain its proceeds, if paid, or to stop its payment by the defendant to any party other than a holder in good faith for value, which position the plaintiff did not have. Dickerson v. Wason, 47 N. Y. 439; Warner v. Lee, 6 N. Y. 144; Commercial Bank v. Marine Bank, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 405; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. King, 57 Pa. 202.

The question now arises whether the situation in which the defendant was placed, or its relation assumed to the plaintiff, was such as to deny to it the right to make the defense which it sought to make in this action. Treating the defendant as a mere volunteer in the denial of its liability upon the draft, it clearly could not defeat a recovery. It could not in such case question the title of the plaintiff. That was the principle of the cases of the City Bank of New Haven v. Perkins, 29 N. Y. 554; McKay v. Draper, 27 N. Y. 256; Aubery v. Fiske, 36 N. Y. 47, and Hayes v. Hathorn, 74 N. Y. 486, cited by the defendant's counsel; and the same may be said of the other cases cited by him on the question of the right of the defendant to defend the action. The disability may arise out of the relation which one party assumes to another, whom he represents, and between whom, in some sense, that of principal and agent exists, and the latter may not be liable to third persons, but to his principal only while the relation exists; nor can the party who undertakes to perform a duty assumed to another, when called upon for performance, set up by way of relief from liability to do so the right in a third party with whom he is not connected and with whom he has personally no concern upon the subject. Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459.

But that is not this case. The payee of the check never parted with the title to it. The Harrisons were employed by him to collect it, and the plaintiff was employed by them to aid in the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was left with them by the payee. The latter had the right to step in and intercept the check in the hands of any party other than a holder in good faith for value, and reclaim it as his property, and in like manner to interrupt the transmission of the proceeds of it to the Harrisons and recover them. This right of the owner is within the doctrine of the Commercial Bank and Dickerson Cases before cited. And the cause for its attempted exercise was the insolvency of the Harrisons. The check had then been charged by the defendant to the drawer, and the draft, as directed by the plaintiff, had been mailed to it by the defendant. The latter had discharged its duty to both the drawer and the plaintiff, and nothing remained for it to do towards the accomplishment of the purpose for which the check was drawn and transmitted through the plaintiff to the defendant. The fund was represented by the draft, which the defendant had mailed to the plaintiff. The draft was the means by which the proceeds of the check were sent on their way to the destination contemplated when the check was left with the Indianapolis bankers, and they belonged to Cameron, its payee. He, as such owner, having the right to step in and control their destination, and thus countermand the authority which he had given to the Harrisons to receive the proceeds of the check, with that view requested the defendant to act for him and stay the fund from the hands of the plaintiff by stopping the payment of the draft so forwarded to it. This was done, and in doing so the defendant represented him. The facts justifying his right to do so supported the action of the defendant and afforded to it a defense in the plaintiff's action upon the draft, unless the defendant by its relation to the plaintiff was disabled from acting upon the request and direction of the owner of the fund.

The situation presented by the facts was that the Harrisons were the agents of the payee of the check and the plaintiff was their agent to aid in its collection, and by the latter the defendant was called upon for its payment. The direction of Cameron to stop the payment to the plaintiff operated as a revocation of the agency he had set in motion, and to stay, at the then stage of their progress, the means which had been adopted for its execution. It was unimportant for that purpose and such effect that the defendant had issued and forwarded its draft. The direction which he had a right to give, and the defendant, in view of the facts, had the right to observe, was that the latter should not pay his money to the plaintiff, who as against Cameron and his direction had no right to it. And thus was afforded to the defendant a defense founded upon the right of Cameron and his authority or requirement. The question would have been no different if the defendant's messenger had been on his way with the funds to the plaintiff, and his mission had been countermanded before handing over the money to the latter. The draft sent was a mere transmission in that form of the apparent liability of the defendant to pay, upon which the plaintiff probably may have realized but for the interruption caused by the direction given to the drawee of the draft not to pay it. It follows that the defendant was justified in asserting that the plaintiff had no right to the fund represented by the draft, as effectually as Cameron could have done if he had been interpleaded as a party defendant. Comstock v. Hoag, 5 Wend. 600; Herrick v. Corman, 10 Johns. 224; Burke v. Prentiss, 6 Mass. 480.

And in view of the facts found by the trial court, and as before stated, it is unnecessary to further consider the state of account between the plaintiff and the Harrisons, as it is quite unimportant on which side of it the balance was, since the credit of the check to the latter was on general account, and no advance was made to them on account of the check. McBride v. Farmers Bank, 26 N. Y. 450; Lindauer v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 55 Barb. 75; Dod v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 59 Barb. 265.

In Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank the question was as to whom the correspondent of another, who had received commercial paper for collection, and sent it to him for a like purpose, was liable for failure or neglect to perform the duty assumed to charge the indorsers. It involved no consideration having relation to the fund when collected, and is not in conflict with the later cases, to the effect that the beneficial owner of the proceeds of the paper when collected may effectually assert his right to the fund as against any party receiving it in the execution of the agency. It is said in the prevailing opinion in the present case that if the check had been dishonored, the Corn Exchange Bank could have maintained an action upon it. Assuming that, if not interrupted by the payee, it might have been so, it is wholly without importance upon any question in this case. But against whom could such action be supported? Certainly not against the defendant without its acceptance of the check (Atty-Gen. v. Continental Life Ins. Co. 71 N. Y. 925); or against Cameron, the payee and indorser, because he was the beneficial owner of it; nor against Harrisons, the plaintiff's principal. And a further reason why plaintiff could have maintained no action in its own name upon the check is that it took no apparent title. The purpose of the indorsement by the Harrisons, as expressed in it, was that it was made to the plaintiff for collection of the check. This restriction denied to the plaintiff the apparent title, and it had none in fact to support any action in its name upon the check. Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 698, 699; White v. Miners Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 658 [26 L. ed. 250]; Sigourney v. Lloyd, 8 Barn. & C. 622; Hook v. Pratt, 78 N. Y. 871.

The purpose of the suggestion that the defendant charged the plaintiff $1.64 for the draft is not apparent. If, however, it was made to show a consideration between the parties for the draft issued by the defendant, it may be added that this amount retained by the defendant was taken from the proceeds of the check for exchange, which was legitimately within the expense of collection of the check in the usual course for that purpose, and the amount of the draft was so much less than that of the check. It seems to be without significance for any purpose in this action.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS

Lewis DANIELS et al., Appts.,

v.

CITY OF NEW LONDON.

(58 Conn. 156.)

1. An attorney has no implied authority to submit a case in which he is employed to arbitration by a submission made in pite without order or direction of the court, or the knowledge of his client.
2. A material change in a submission to arbitration by the parties cannot be made by an attorney, by an act in pite, unless he is expressly authorized to make it.
3. A change in a written submission to arbitration by which the award is to be made final instead of being returned to court for judgment by the court is a material change such as an attorney cannot make unless expressly authorized.

(September 27, 1899.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for New London County in favor of defendant in a suit to set aside an award, and to enjoin the taking of any proceedings under it. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. S. Lucas and A. P. Tanner, for appellants:

Where no suit is pending an attorney has no implied powers to submit a matter to arbitration.

The submission by an attorney, even in a pending suit, must be with the approval of the court and appear of record.

There is a well-recognized distinction as to the position of an attorney in relation to proceedings in and out of court.

The change made in the submission was a material one. It cuts the parties off from all right of review.

The original submission was approved by the clients, who appeared and took their chances in the trial, and they are estopped from contesting the award.

Blakely v. Graham, 111 Mass. 8.

The authority to "submit" under such circumstances includes the authority to amend the submission, where the change is made in good faith and for the best interests of the clients.

Atling v. Munson, 2 Conn. 691; Brooks v. New Durham, 55 N. H. 539.

It was necessary and highly expedient for the attainment of the object sought that the change suggested, and which was for the benefit of the appellants, should be accepted by the attorney. His authority therefore is reasonably to be inferred.

Brackett v. Norton, 4 Conn. 524; Holker v. Parker, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 449 (3 L. ed. 401).

Arbitrators have authority to decide all questions of fact and of law necessary to the decision of the matters submitted, and their award is conclusive even though founded upon a mistake of law, unless the submission itself plainly reserves the legal questions involved for the review of a court of law.

Boston Water Power Co. v. Gray, 6 Met. 131, 165; Ward v. Am. Bank, 7 Met. 439; Fairchild v. Adams, 11 Cush. 550; Smith v. Boston & M. R. Co. 16 Gray, 521.

Their award was conclusive as well of the law as of fact.

Bigelow v. Newell, 10 Pick. 348; Gardner v. Boston, 120 Mass. 266; Ennos v. Pratt, 26 Vt. 630; 2 Parsons, Cont. 704.

In the light of these authorities the amendment to the original submission gave no new powers to the arbitrators, and deprived the appellants of no rights.

An attorney at law, having the conduct of a case, is authorized to submit it to arbitration, whenever that form of proceeding is, in his judgment, best calculated to promote the interests of his client.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 27th of August, 1897, a controversy between the plaintiffs and defendant concerning the amount and validity of certain sewer assessments was pending before a judge of the superior court under the Statute, and on that day the parties agreed to submit the matters in controversy to arbitration. The judge before whom the matter was pending was made at first the sole arbitrator, but another judge was afterwards by agreement associated with him.

The written submission provided, among other things, that the arbitrators, in hearing and determining the controversy, and in taxing costs, should be governed by the laws applicable to such cases and by the rules of practice obtaining in the trial of causes in the superior court; that the written award to be made should be returned to the Superior Court for New London County, and that the court should render judgment pursuant thereto.

Under this submission, which was drawn up by the attorneys of the plaintiffs, and was signed by the attorneys of both parties, a hearing attended by all the parties in interest was had before the arbitrators. Some months after the hearing was finished, but before the award was published, one of the attorneys employed by the plaintiffs, without the consent or knowledge of his associate, and without the authority or knowledge of the plaintiffs, but with the consent of the attorney of the defendant, so amended the written submission as to make the award final and to give the arbitrators full power to decide the matters referred to them as they should consider right and just.

Shortly after this amendment was made the arbitrators, without further hearing, and in pursuance of the powers conferred upon them by the amended submission, published their award.

As soon as the award and amendment came to the knowledge of the plaintiffs they repudiated and disapproved of both, and of the action of their attorney in making the amendment, and brought suit to restrain the defendant from enforcing the award and to have it set aside, on the ground that the amendment materially changed the submission and had been made without their authority or knowledge. On the trial of the suit in the court below the court found that the amendment was made in good faith by the senior counsel in the case, that he believed he had full power to make it, and believed that it was for the best interests of all concerned that it should be made.

A special finding was made, and on the facts so found the plaintiffs requested the court to rule that the attorney who made the amendment had no authority to do so, but the court refused to so hold, and rendered judgment dissolving the temporary injunction and for the defendant to recover its cost. From that judgment the plaintiffs appealed, and the sole question made before this court is, whether the court below erred in refusing to rule as requested.

On the argument the defendant contended that the amendment did not materially change the original submission and so did not affect the rights of the parties, but we are satisfied that the amendment was a material one.

The main question then is, whether the attorney upon the facts found was authorized to make the amendment to the original submission so as to bind the plaintiffs.

If he had such authority it must have been conferred upon him by the plaintiffs as a matter of fact, expressly or by implication, or he had it by virtue of his retainer and employment as an attorney in the case.

The court finds that the plaintiffs did not expressly confer such authority, but the defendant contends that the attorney had an implied authority arising out of the special circumstances of this particular case and his relations to it and to his clients. If this last claim means that the plaintiffs in fact conferred the authority by implication at least, then the court below should have so found, for this is a conclusion of fact, and not being found this court cannot draw such conclusion. Had the facts warranted such conclusion it is reasonable to suppose the court would have so found.

If, however, the claim means that the attorney had such authority by virtue of his employment in the case and not otherwise, such claim will be considered in connection with the next question in the case, which is, Did the retainer and employment of the attorney in the case confer upon him such authority?

That an attorney-at-law retained and employed in a cause pending in a court of common law has authority, without the consent or knowledge of his client, to submit such cause to arbitration by rule of court or under the direction of the court, seems to be established by numerous authorities and is not questioned by the plaintiffs in the case at bar. And if the attorney can under such circumstances bind his client by the submission, we think it would follow that he could bind him by an amendment made to the submission in good faith without the knowledge or consent of his client.

The defendant contends that the present case comes within the above rule, or, if not, he contends that an attorney-at-law, having the management of a matter in controversy, whether pending in court or not, is by law authorized to submit the same to arbitration without the consent or knowledge of his client or of the court.

Let us examine the first of these positions. At the time the original submission was executed the cause was pending before a judge of the superior court under the Statute, and when the amendment was made the matter was pending before the arbitrators; and so it seems to be claimed by the defendant that there was in either case a cause pending in court within the above rule.

Without determining whether this claim is a valid one or not, it may for the purposes of the argument be granted, and still it does not help the defendant. There is no pretense that either the submission or the amendment were made under the authority or direction of the tribunal before which the matters to which the submission or the amendment relate were pending, within the spirit and intent of the rule we are considering.

The submission was made in pais; with its execution the judge had nothing whatever to do; and by its terms he had nothing further to do with the submission or the matters involved therein. This is true also of the amendment, even though made at the suggestion of the arbitrators, as the court finds. We think, therefore, that the case does not come within either the letter or the spirit of the rule, because, even if it be conceded that at the time the submission and amendment were made there was a cause pending in court, still both submission and amendment were made in pais and not under nor in subjection to the authority of the tribunal in either case. As to the other position of the defendant, we are satisfied that the weight of authority is against it.

The cases establishing an attorney's authority to submit to arbitration a pending cause under the authority and direction of the court are somewhat numerous, and as is well said in Markley v. Amos, 8 Rich. L. 468, this of itself "affords a fair inference that he cannot submit in any other way."

We have been referred to no well-considered case, nor do we know of any, which supports this claim of the defendant. On the other hand some of the authorities cited on the plaintiffs' brief are directly against such a position. See the cases of Jenkins v. Gillespie, 10 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 81; Markley v. Amos, supra; Scarborough v. Reynolds, 12 Ala. 252; Morse, Arbitration and Award, 16.

In addition to the cases cited there is the case of McGinnis v. Curry, 13 W. Va. 29, decided in 1878, where the court holds that an attorney has no authority, before or after suit brought, to make an agreement in pais to submit his client's cause to arbitration without special authority of his client. So far as the reasoning and conclusions of the court in that case on the point in question here are applicable to the case at bar we adopt them, and feel justified in quoting from the opinion at some length. The court says: "The authority of an attorney at common law by a consent order made in the court to submit a pending suit to arbitration is universally admitted. And the court, in cases where such a consent order has been made at the instance of counsel, have frequently spoken of the authority of counsel to submit a controversy of his client to arbitration in general language which would be broad enough to include, not only a case of a submission of a controversy in a pending suit by an agreement of counsel in pais, but even in a controversy about which no suit was pending. But all the cases in which such loose and general language was used were cases where the authority of counsel was exercised not only in a pending suit, but by a consent order agreeing to the submission made in open court. See Wilson v. Young, 9 Pa. 101; Holker v. Parker, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 449 [3 L. ed. 401]; Somers v. Balabrega, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 164 [1 L. ed. 83]; Bingham v. Guthrie, 19 Pa. 418.

"In England, though, so far as I know, it has never been decided that an attorney had a right to submit his client's controversy to arbitration when no suit was pending, or by an agreement in pais, and not by an order of court when a suit was pending, yet there are English cases from which it may be inferred that the courts may there consider the power of the attorney to submit his client's cause to arbitration as general, and not confined to pending suits or to orders of reference made in courts. See Banfill v. Leigh, 8 T. R. 571; Re Jamieson & Birns, 4 Ad. & El. 945.

"But in considering how much weight should be attached to these dicta of English judges, it should be remembered that an attorney in England occupies towards his client a very different relation from what he does in this country. There he is frequently the general agent of the client, and transacts a great deal of his general business. But here an attorney is generally employed to attend to his client's interest in reference to some single controversy.

"In Pennsylvania, too, there are decisions which might seem to imply that the power of an attorney to submit to arbitration was not confined to the making of a consent order in a pending cause to refer it to arbitration. See Bingham v. Guthrie, 19 Pa. 419.

"But in considering what weight should be attached to the dicta of Pennsylvania judges, it should also be borne in mind that in Pennsylvania the authority of attorneys is more extensive than elsewhere. See Lynch v. Com. 16 Serg. & R. 368; Wilson v. Young, 9 Pa. 101.

"While I have found no case deciding that an attorney has a general authority to submit his client's controversies to arbitration, there are cases in which it has been decided that he does not possess such general authority. See Jenkins v. Gillespie, 10 Smedes & M. 81; Scarborough v. Reynolds, 12 Ala. 252.

"It is true that these were cases in which there was no lis pendens. But it seems to me that, as it is held that an attorney by reason of his being employed to institute a suit or defend a threatened suit has no authority to submit by an agreement in pais signed by the attorney the case to arbitration, that it must follow that he has no such authority though the suit be pending. An authority to act in pais could only be inferred, if it existed, from his employment before the institution of the suit as an attorney, and such employment as we have seen confers no such authority.

"This conclusion is not at all inconsistent with the numerous cases deciding that an attorney has authority in a pending suit by an order of court to submit the cause to arbitration. When the courts have assigned any reason for their decisions they have been based, not merely, if at all, on the employment of the counsel by the client, but on the fact that he is an officer of the court acting in the presence and under the control of the court, and as such has a right to take any legal steps he may deem proper in prosecuting or defending the suit. But this reasoning has no application to any action of the attorney in pais, such as agreeing to submit the case to arbitrators by an agreement signed by him without any special authority from his clients."

If an attorney cannot, without special authority from his client, submit a controversy to arbitration by an act in pais, we think it follows that he cannot by any like act, without such authority, materially change a submission already made or adopted by his client. To hold otherwise would give the attorney power to do indirectly what he has no power to do directly.

The case of Jenkins v. Gillespie, supra, was a case where an attorney amended the original submission without authority from his client, and the court held he was not bound by the act of the attorney. The court says: "But admitting that an attorney has in general power to submit, has he power to change the terms of the submission made by the parties? That would be to change their contract. . . . We think it would be going too far to say his assent to the change should bind his client."

In the case at bar, although the court finds that the submission was drawn and signed by counsel who believed and were justified in the belief that the language and legal effect of the submission were intrusted to their judgment and discretion, still the submission was the contract of the parties, its language was theirs and theirs only, and in legal effect it had all the incidents of a contract of submission made by the parties out of court. They had made it theirs by ratifying and adopting what their attorneys had done, and had been heard under such contract as completed. After such hearing the plaintiffs had a right to rest in the belief that the law under the circumstances gave their attorneys no binding authority to make a material change in that completed contract.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the court below failed to find that the attorney had any authority from the plaintiffs to make the amendment, and we are of opinion that the law gave him none, we are constrained to hold that he had no authority to make the amendment so as to bind the plaintiffs.

We regret that the facts and the law bring us to such a conclusion in this case, for the amendment was made and suggested in the utmost good faith, and was well adapted to promote the best interests of all parties concerned.

There is error in the judgment complained of.
In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

No presumption of negligence arises from the fact that a patient does not recover.

Haire v. Reese, 7 Phila. 133.

The special findings cover all the evidence introduced in this case, and absolve the defendants from negligence; hence judgment should have been entered notwithstanding the general verdict.

Messrs. Bleik Peters, D. B. Nash and George E. Hubbell, for appellee:

Plaintiff employed the defendants for reward, to set, reduce, care for, cure and heal the fractured limb. Under such contract the defendants not only obligated themselves to proper, ordinary and diligent care and treatment in the performance of their professional duties, but to continue such services so long as the condition of the injured limb should require treatment.

Ballou v. Prescott, 84 Me. 305-313.

Beck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I. The defendant, The German Klinik, is an incorporation whose business appears to be connected in some way with the treatment of diseased and injured persons; the defendants, Gustave Hoepfner and others, are members of the incorporation and surgeons and physicians having charge of the patients treated by the corporation. Plaintiff by some accident broke the bones of his left leg, and employed defendants to treat him. After treatment according to the usual course pursued by surgeons, which was once or twice renewed by reason of the fact that the patient had not wholly recovered, the plaintiff was finally discharged from treatment by defendants or ceased further to employ or consult them. His leg not being wholly cured became bent and crooked, and finally, after this suit was commenced, it was amputated by other surgeons.

This action is brought to recover for the injuries plaintiff sustained by defendants' neglect and want of skill in the treatment of his broken limb.

The cause was upon the evidence submitted to the jury under instructions of which no complaint is made in this court. A general verdict was had for plaintiff and special findings in response to questions propounded by the court were returned by the jury. They are in the following language:

1. Did the defendants or either of them properly set the plaintiff's leg on December 21, 1885?

A. Yes.

2. Did the said defendants, Jaenicks and

Hoepfner, or either of them, properly treat the plaintiff from the day on which they set his leg up to the time at which they released him from the splint and bandages?

A. Yes, but we do not consider it a perfect cure when discharged.

8. Were the methods and appliances which defendants used in plaintiff's treatment such as were found among the different methods and appliances used and approved of by physicians who were possessed of and who exercised at least the average skill of the medical profession as a body at that time?

A. Yes.

4. Was plaintiff's leg when taken from the splint and bandages as crooked, or nearly as crooked, as when amputated?

A. No.

5. Did plaintiff exercise ordinary care in the use of his leg after being released from the bandages?

A. Yes.

Defendants moved that the general verdict be set aside, and that judgment be rendered for them upon the special findings. This motion was overruled and judgment was rendered for plaintiff on the general verdict. This action of the court constitutes the only ground of complaint of defendants on this appeal.

II. It is insisted that the special findings are inconsistent with the general verdict, and are such as show that defendants are not liable in this action, and therefore a judgment thereon should have been rendered for defendants.

The instructions given to the jury are not complained of by defendants. Among others the following are given:

"When the defendants undertook the treatment of this case, the duty rested upon them to give to it such care and skill as the ordinarily educated and skilled members of their profession at the time would have given to it, and to give to the patient proper instructions for the care and use of the wounded limb. If the evidence satisfies you that they did this then they did all that the law required of them, and they would not be liable. It is for you to say from the evidence before you whether they gave to the treatment of the case such skill, care and attention or not, and to the patient proper instructions for the care and use of the wounded leg. If they did not they were guilty of negligence, and would be liable for injury resulting from such negligence, unless the evidence satisfies you that plaintiff contributed to such injury by his own negligence and want of care."

It will be observed that this instruction declares, rightly enough, that defendants were charged with the duty among others of giving plaintiff "proper instructions for the care and use of the wounded leg," and that if they omitted this duty they were guilty of negligence and would be liable for injury resulting therefrom. The rule of law is doubtless correct; at all events, it is the law of this case and so recognized by both parties, neither objecting to it.

Now if the jury found that defendants failed in the discharge of duty stated in this instruction, they rightly found for plaintiff upon the general verdict. There was evidence tending to authorize such a finding, which is sufficient to support it. A brief reference to the evidence found in the original and amended abstracts fully sustains this conclusion.

The plaintiff and two or more witnesses testify that the defendants directed plaintiff to use his limb after the gypsum bandages used to keep the bones in place were removed, and to walk with crutches, and that they gave no directions further as to the manner or extent of such use. There was evidence tending to show that the broken bone had not well united, either because of improper treatment or because of its diseased condition, and that when the bandage was removed, or soon thereafter, the limb at the wounded part was crooked. These facts the jury were authorized to find from the evidence. They are shown by the testimony of physicians and surgeons and other witnesses who testified in the case. One of the surgeons, Dr. Grant, testifies upon an examination of the limb after amputation, that there was a diseased condition of the bone which might have been caused by "a splinter or a muscle getting between the bones;" and in that case walking would irritate and produce a tendency to disease." He further declares, "I would instruct my patient not to walk on a leg I found not united." "The least weight of the foot, after patient commenced walking, would tend to separate that at the top" (pointing to a portion of the bone, having the amputated limb before him). "If the bone, when set, confined in its apparatus for eight weeks, came out in that crooked condition or form, then the tendency of the use of that limb in walking would impair its efficiency and would induce disease." The recitation of other evidence in the case is not demanded to support our conclusion.

Upon the evidence we have quoted from the abstracts and other evidence found therein, the jury were authorized to find that plaintiff had no correct instructions as to the proper care and use of his wounded leg; that he had wrong instructions which directed him to use his leg; that the diseased condition of the bone was caused or aggravated by use of the leg which defendants directed, and that with proper instructions, which we will presume plaintiff would have followed, his leg would have been saved, or at least the disease of the bone would have been ameliorated and he would have escaped much suffering. There is nothing in the special findings of the jury in conflict with the finding of negligence in the failure of the defendants to give plaintiff proper instructions, or in the giving of improper instructions as to the care and use of his wounded leg, upon which the general verdict was undoubtedly based. The jury found specially that defendants properly set plaintiff's leg; that they properly treated it until he was discharged; and that they used proper and approved methods and appliances in the treatment of the leg; but it is nowhere found, directly or by implication, that they gave plaintiff proper instructions or did not give him improper instructions for the care and use of his injured leg. Defendants may have exercised proper care and used proper skill in all things, yet under the law of the case, if they omitted to give plaintiff proper instructions for the care and use of his wounded leg they were rightly held liable by the jury. As we have said, the jury were authorized to find for plaintiff under the evidence on the ground of defendants' negligence by the omission to discharge their duty to instruct plaintiff as to the care and use of his injured leg.

For these reasons we reach the satisfactory conclusion that the judgment of the District Court ought to be affirmed.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

The special findings show that defendants discharged fully all duties which devolved upon them to the time when plaintiff was released from the splint and bandages. They had properly set the broken bones, and had given the injured limb their personal supervision for eight weeks. Plaintiff was young and healthy, and the uncontradicted evidence proves that under the conditions shown the broken bones should have been healed when the splint and bandages were removed. When that was done defendants instructed plaintiff to procure and use crutches in walking. The special findings show that plaintiff exercised ordinary care in the use of his leg after that time. The instructions which plaintiff admits having received from defendants necessarily informed him that the injured limb was not entirely cured; that he should use crutches in walking and should be careful in using it. What further instructions, if any, should have been given, the record nowhere discloses. No evidence whatever was offered as to the instructions which should have been given plaintiff when the splint and bandages were removed.

The jury were left wholly without the aid of evidence to determine that matter. As they were not experts, the plaintiff was as competent to determine what instructions should have been given, and consequently the care and use of his injured limb which would have been proper, as were the jury. But the jury found that he used ordinary care; therefore no damage could have resulted from the failure of defendants to give such instructions as the jury were competent to find should have been given. The fact that a perfect cure had not been effected when the splint and bandages were discarded does not alter the case, under the law as announced to the jury. They were charged that "a physician or surgeon, in undertaking the treatment of a patient, does not thereby insure a cure." Plaintiff was not under the personal care of defendants, but was treated at his own home. The splint and bandages were removed about the 1st of February, 1886. Plaintiff did not see defendants from that time until the month of June following, when he went to them with a brother who had an injury which required surgical attention. Defendants then noticed that the limb was crooked and advised plaintiff that he should have treatment at his home or in hospital. He refused to have it so treated, but consented to have defendants place around the limb a plaster of paris bandage, which was designed as a support. That was removed in about one month; and defendants did not again see plaintiff until near the end of that year. It was then found that the limb had continued to grow worse, but defendants were refused permission to treat it further. It thus appears that plaintiff refused to follow the advice of defendants when given.

The opinion of the majority ignores the fact that even if defendants neglected to give proper instructions to the plaintiff, yet they would not be liable for such neglect unless injury resulted. The record before us contains no evidence which even tends to show that the conditions of which plaintiff complains would have been avoided had defendants given instructions which were not given.

It seems to me that the majority opinion casts upon defendants the burden of proving what instructions, if any, should have been given plaintiff; that such instructions were in fact given, or if omitted that none of the damage of which plaintiff complains resulted from such omission. That the law does not impose such burden upon defendants is evident. Defendants are presumed to have discharged all obligations which rested upon them until the contrary is shown.

A part of the relief asked by defendants is that the general verdict be set aside because not supported by the evidence, and to that I think they are entitled. This does not seem to me to be a case where there is a conflict in the evidence, but rather one where there is an entire absence of evidence on the material issues, not settled by the special findings, to support the general verdict.

Clopton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Both parties concede that J. M. Gafford was formerly seised and possessed of the land in controversy. Appellee, who was the plaintiff in the circuit court, derives title under a mortgage executed by him February 22, 1873. Defendants do not claim that title ever passed from Gafford to them, or either of them, by any legal conveyance. Their defense is that Gafford, being indebted to Mrs. Sally Gafford, who was his wife, for money of her separate estate which he received and used, gave her, in February, 1872, by parol, the lands on which he then lived, including the land in controversy, in payment thereof, putting her in possession; and that she has been in continuous possession, claiming the land as her own, for the length of time prescribed by the Statute of Limitations as a bar to the entry of plaintiff. The court having given the affirmative charge in favor of plaintiff, the main inquiry arises whether, from the undisputed facts, the conclusion of law is that Mrs. Gafford did not and could not have such adverse possession as by its own mere force could ripen into a title.

The legal title in the lands, being vested in Gafford when the mortgage was executed, thereby passed to plaintiff. There is no pretense that he had notice of Mrs. Gafford's claim. The possession of the mortgagor thereafter was referable and in subordination to the mortgagee's title, unless rendered adverse by an open and positive disclaimer of his title, brought to his knowledge. Coyle v. Wilkins, 57 Ala. 108.

So long as the mortgagor holds in subservience to the title of the mortgagee, the possession of his vendee under a parol contract of sale cannot become adverse to the mortgagee, unless there is a disclaimer of the title of the mortgagor, and a holding adversely to him. Counsel invoke the principle pronounced in Collins v. Johnson, 57 Ala. 304, and Vandiver v. Stickney, 75 Ala. 227, that an uninterrupted possession of a donee, under a parol gift, or by a vendee under a parol agreement to purchase when the purchase money is paid, accompanied by a claim to the lands, is adverse to the donor or vendor, and will be protected by the Statute of Limitations, maturing into a perfect title if continuous for the period prescribed by the statute. But, to have such effect, the facts essential to constitute an adverse holding must enter into and characterize the possession. The mere assertion of a hostile claim or right, and of possession, unaccompanied by adverse actual occupancy, is insufficient.

There is no dispute that Gafford entered into possession of the lands in 1862, and continued in possession, claiming them as his own, until February, 1872, the time of the alleged parol contract of sale. While Mrs. Gafford testifies that she was put into possession at that time, and thereafter claimed the possession and ownership, she also states that there was no change of possession, but she and her husband continued to reside on and occupy the lands, and he controlled them, until his death, which occurred in 1882. Ten years not having elapsed after his death before the institution of the action, the bar of the Statute can become complete only by taking her possession during the continuance of the marital relation to her possession after the death of her husband. The direct question, then, is whether the wife can hold premises adversely to her husband, which she claims to have derived from him under a parol agreement of purchase, and on which they continued to reside and jointly occupy as husband and wife. The statement and application of a few elementary principles furnish an answer.

Possession, to be adverse, so as to vest title in the possessor after the lapse of the requisite time, must be not only open, notorious and continuous, but also exclusive. It must operate to oust or dispossess any other person who may claim title or right of possession. In order to fall within the operation of the Statute of Limitations, the possession must be sufficiently exclusive to put the dispossessed claimant to his action or entry. This can never be the case where the party having the title is in possession, though it may be joint. Two contemporaneous possessions of the same property, each adverse to the other, is a legal absurdity not conceivable. Hence when two persons are in possession, claiming under different and hostile rights, the law refers the possession to the party having the title. Pickett v. Pope, 74 Ala. 122; Bragg v. Massie, 33 Ala. 89; Farmer v. Eslava, 11 Ala. 1028.

It may be that, under the laws in force at the time of the transaction in question, a title would vest in a married woman by the mere force of an uninterrupted possession of real estate for the statutory period under a parol gift or purchase, where the husband never had nor claimed any title, nor interfered with her possession. There is a clear distinction between a possession of that nature and a possession under a gift or purchase directly from the husband. There being no actual change of possession, the oral agreement between Gafford and his wife was void. It vested no right nor equity, and created no separate estate. It is material only to the extent it may constitute the origin and basis of an adverse possession. Had Gafford executed a conveyance directly to his wife, it would have been inoperative as a transfer of the legal title. Their continuance in joint possession thereafter, for no length of time, could have availed to divest him of the title and vest it in her. Certainly a continuance of joint occupancy, without a conveyance, merely under a parol gift or agreement of purchase, can have no greater effect. The elements essential to an adverse possession in that sense, which can ripen into a title by its own force and the lapse of time, do not and cannot exist in such case. The husband is not ousted or dispossessed, actually or constructively. The possession of the wife does not exclude or encroach upon his possession.

The possession of Mrs. Gafford during coverture was the possession of her husband, and did not become antagonistic to his rights. Bell v. Bell, 37 Ala. 536; Hendricks v. Ransom, 53 Mich. 576; 1 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 250.

It results that the Statute of Limitations did not commence to run until the death of her husband.

1. Where an executor and trustee under a will renders a final account and charges himself with a certain amount as retained by him to pay annuities, and never sets this sum apart but uses it in his business together with his own money, and afterwards makes an assignment for benefit of creditors, the annuitants cannot impress the funds in the hands of the assignee with a trust for payment of their annuities.
2. APPEAL by defendants Emily Bugbee et al., from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court, rendered by a single justice in Suffolk County upon a bill by trustees in an assignment for creditors praying instructions as to the execution of their trust. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs were trustees under an assignment by Aaron D. Williams, for benefit of creditors, and filed this bill for instructions as to the execution of their trust.

Among the claims presented to them was one arising out of the following facts:

One Nancy Williams died leaving a will which was duly probated, by which she appointed Aaron D. Williams executor and trustee, and among other provisions gave to her brother Charles Bugbee, or to his widow, in case of his death, an annuity of $600; and to such of their children as should survive them an annuity of $200 each.

Williams retained in his possession a sufficient fund to pay this annuity, and, Bugbee having died, his widow and children claimed that the bonds in plaintiff's hands should be impressed with a trust for the payment of such annuities, and that a fund sufficient to pay them should be set apart before a dividend was made to the general creditors of Williams. The court disallowed the claim and the claimants took this appeal.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The executor and trustee under the will of Mrs. Williams having assigned his property in trust for the benefit of his creditors, the annuitants under that will seek to establish a trust in that property and to obtain a decree that $10,000 be set apart for the assignees and appropriated to secure and raise the annuities. It was, however, found at the hearing that none of the property so conveyed was charged with any such trust, and this finding appears to be the only one that the evidence would warrant.

There is nothing to show that there was ever any distinct trust fund in the hands of Williams, the executor and trustee, which was represented by any specific property. He was also the residuary legatee, and nearly one half of the assets of the estate consisted of a debt due from himself. The rest was chiefly notes secured by mortgages. There was no real estate. The moneys received by Williams from the estate were mixed with his own. He paid the debts and other legacies and rendered an account called "fin 1" in which he charged himself with "balance of this account retained to pay annuity of $600 per annum to Charles Bugbee, $10 000." It was his duty to set apart this sum and to keep it separately invested, but he did not do so. The settlement of the account merely showed that he was held responsible for that sum, and if he had set it apart, as he ought to have done, the trust would have attached to the property thus set apart. But since this was never done, the trust was never impressed upon any specific property or money held by Williams. There was merely an indebtedness or liability on his part to account for that sum. This indebtedness or liability might itself be the subject of a trust, just as if it had been the indebtedness of another person. The trust, however, in such case attaches merely to the indebtedness and to whatever may be realized from it, and not to any particular property held by the debtor. The view most favorable to the annuitants that could be taken is, that Williams had the sum of $10,000 in money in his hands, which was retained for the purpose of raising the annuities. The evidence shows that this was not the case; but assume that it was, the trust would then attach to it as long as the money could be identified or traced, but no longer. When trust money becomes so mixed up with the trustee's individual funds that it is impossible to trace and identify it as entering into some specific property, the trust ceases. The court will go as far as it can in thus tracing and following trust money, but when, as a matter of fact, it cannot be traced, the equitable right of the cestui que trust to follow it fails. Under such circumstances, if the trustee has become bankrupt, the court cannot say that the trust money is to be found somewhere in the general estate of the trustee that still remains; he may have lost it with property of his own. And in such case, the cestui que trust can only come in and share with the general creditors. Atty-Gen. v. Brigham, 143 Mass. 248; Howard v. Fay, 188 Mass. 104; White v. Chapin, 184 Mass. 280; Bresnihan v. Sheehan, 125 Mass. 11; Harlow v. Dehon, 111 Mass. 195, 198, 199; Andrews v. Bank of Cape Ann, 8 Allen, 313; Le Breton v. Peirce, 2 Allen, 8-13; Johnson v. Ames, 11 Pick. 173, 181, 182; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 16-29; Ferris v. Van Vechten, 73 N. Y. 113; Frith v. Carliland, 2 Hem. & M. 417; Holland v. Holland, L. R. 4 Ch. 449; Isaacson v. Harwood, L. R. 3 Ch. 225; Perry, Tr. §§ 845, 836, 842; Story, Eq. §§ 1253, 1256; Lewin, Tr. 8th ed. 241, 836, 892.

There is nothing to the contrary in Baltimore Cent. Nat. Bank v. Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 54, 66, 71 [26 L. ed. 693, 698, 701], and Re Hallett's Estate, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 696, 708, 721, which are chiefly relied on by the annuitants.

In Wisconsin a majority of the court has declared that it is not necessary to trace the trust fund into any specific property in order to enforce the trust; and that if it can be traced into the estate of the defaulting agent or trustee, this is sufficient. McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401-409.

But this seems to us to be stated too broadly.

In the present case, there is no such thing as tracing the $10,000 into any particular pieces of property covered by the assignment by Williams for the benefit of his creditors. The most that can be said is, that he had this money and also other moneys of his own and used all the moneys together as his own for several years in buying, building and selling, and that he finally failed. There is no means of ascertaining, as a matter of fact, that the trust money, if it ever was trust money, is now represented by any property in the hands of the assignees.

*1. A policy of insurance provides that proof of loss shall be furnished to the insurance company within thirty days from the date of the loss, and that all claims under it shall be barred, unless prosecuted within six months from the same date, and also provides that the loss shall be paid in sixty days after proof of loss. The six months' limitation begins to run at the close of the sixty days allowed the company for payment, not from the actual loss.

2. One person chartered of another a barge to be employed by him in the conveyance of freight in a business trip for profit, and has the barge in his custody and possession. He has an insurable interest in the barge, and may insure it in his own name, not only for his own protection, but also for the protection of the owner of the barge; and if his act of so insuring it was authorized by the owner, or is ratified by him, suit may be maintained upon the policy, in case of loss, and damages recovered to indemnify the loss of the owner of the barge, not merely the loss of the charterer.

3. Statutes are to be construed to have a prospective operation, unless a contrary intention in the Legislature is manifest and plain.

4. In an action on a contract, a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for a sum of money while § 14, chap. 131, Code 1868, as originally enacted, was in force, providing that judgment should be entered for the amount found, with interest from the date of the judgment; and judgment was not entered on such verdict until 1887, when said section 14, as amended by chapter 120, Acts 1882, was in force, providing that on verdicts judgment shall be rendered, with interest from date of verdict. Such judgment should have called for interest from its date, according to the law in force when the verdict was rendered, and not from the date of the verdict.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ohio County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a policy of marine insurance to recover for the loss of a barge. Reversed.

*Head notes by BRANNON, J.

NOTE.—Proof of loss; limitation clause construed.

The condition limiting the time of commencement of an action to a period less than that prescribed by the Statute of Limitations is valid, and the Statute does not operate to extend the time beyond the six months. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wells, 88 Va. 738.

The words "loss or damage," in the limitation clause, must be taken to relate to the time of the loss. Blair v. Sovereign F. Ins. Co. 7 Can. L. T. 410; Lampkin v. Western Assur. Co. 18 U. C. Q. B. 361.

Where proofs are received within a reasonable time before expiration of the period fixed by the policy for suing, the company cannot cut off the right to sue by any negligent act on its part. Chambers v. Atlas Ins. Co. 51 Conn. 17.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Caldwell & Caldwell, for plaintiff in error:

The effort of the plaintiff is to make the policy read that defendant insured Thomas Murdock on account of John M. Hare. A written contract cannot thus be varied by parol evidence.

Crawford v. Jarrett, 2 Leigh, 630; Towner v. Lucas, 18 Gratt. 710; Lockwood v. Holliday, 16 W. Va. 656; McGuire v. Wright, 18 W. Va. 507.

The suit was brought upon the policy, and the plaintiff sets up the policy himself and must recover on the contract he declares on or he cannot recover at all. The fact that the policy was not made in accordance with representations of the insured is immaterial since the representations had been made a part of the contract, and the insured had had an opportunity to examine what was in the representations.

New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519 (20 L. ed. 934).

The previous verbal arrangement was merged in the written agreement.

If the policy is in behalf of the owners, no other person than the owners can recover.

The damages assessed by the jury were excessive and the verdict should have been set aside. The policy was a contract to indemnify Thomas Murdock for his loss. Yet the jury rendered a verdict for the full amount of the policy.

Murray v. Columbian Ins. Co. 11 Johns. 813; Dumas v. Jones, 4 Mass. 650.

The amount judgment was rendered for was excessive as to interest. The verdict was rendered in 1873. In 1882 a statute made the amount of the verdict bear interest, not from the date when the judgment was entered, but from the date the verdict is found. The Legislature, without process of law or judicial finding, could not take away defendant's money to a large sum in interest by simply passing an Act that defendant should be liable for interest

The condition that the insured must give notice of loss is a material part of the contract, and a compliance therewith is a prerequisite to the right of recovery by the assured, and mere silence of the company is not a waiver of such proofs. Central City Ins. Co. v. Oates, 88 Ala. 558.

To make the condition effectual against the insured it must be specially pleaded in defense like the Statute of Limitations. Lampkin v. Western Assur. Co. supra.

Where there is a single subject of insurance which is entirely destroyed, and immediate notice of the loss is given, further detailed proof is not necessary. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. v. Haws (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 413.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Thomas Murdock instituted an action of covenant for use of John M. Hare, in the Circuit Court of Ohio County, upon a policy of marine insurance, against the Franklin Insurance Company, for loss of a barge, and there was a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence by the defendant, and a verdict assessing the plaintiff's damages subject to it, and a judgment for the plaintiff for such damages. The said Company has sued out this writ of error. The brief of appellant's counsel contends that the action is barred by the limitation provided in the policy, "that, in all cases of loss or damage, the assured shall furnish to the said Company the proofs of the same within thirty days from the date thereof, and all claims under this policy shall be barred, unless prosecuted within six months from the same date." There is a provision, also, in this policy, that, "in case of loss, such loss to be paid in sixty days after proof of loss, proof of interest and adjustment exhibited to the assurers."

The loss occurred from the sinking of the barge Joseph McDonald in the Cumberland River, April 8, 1868. Proof of loss was furnished May 28, 1868, and action was commenced November 2, 1868. Much discussion has occurred in courts of other States upon clauses in insurance policies limiting the period for bringing suits upon them for losses. The Company contends that the six months commenced to run from date of loss; the plaintiff contends that it began at the close of the sixty days given the Company for payment, which was sixty days after proof of loss.

"Where the policy provides that the loss shall be payable within sixty days, ninety days, or any other period after proof of loss is made, an action brought inside of the period limited is premature." Wood, Ins. § 436; May, Ins. § 476.

Some courts have held that the letter of the limitation must govern, and that the period begins from the loss. Johnson v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 91 Ill. 92; Moore v. State Ins. Co. 72 Iowa, 414, if the latter case can at all be said to hold this.

But the great weight of authority is in support of the text of Wood, on Insurance, § 443: "When a policy stipulates that no action shall be brought unless commenced within a certain time after loss or damage shall accrue, and there is a provision in the policy that the company will pay in thirty, sixty, ninety or any other number of days after proofs of loss have been served, the limitation does not attach until after the period which the Company has in which to pay the loss has expired. The limitation cannot apply until a right of action has accrued, and, until the period which the company has to pay the loss has expired, no right of action exists." New York v. Hamilton F. Ins. Co. 89 N. Y. 45; Chandler v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 21 Minn. 85; Ellis v. Council Bluff Ins. Co. 64 Iowa, 507; Hay v. Star F. Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 285; May, Ins. § 479.

The case in this court, of Barber v. Wheeling F. & M. Ins. Co., 16 W. Va. 658, strongly leans to, in effect sustains, this position. The policy involved in that decision contained a provision that the loss should be paid sixty days after proof, and, further, that either party might ask an arbitration, and that no suit should be brought until afterwards, and a provision that no suit should be maintained unless within six months after the loss should occur. This court held that it provided for an indefinite period before suit, and that the "intent of the parties to the contract was that the six-months' limitation should commence to run when the cause of action accrued, and not before." There that was upon the award. Here no arbitration is provided nor can we say an indefinite period is to elapse before suit; but it is provided that the Company has sixty days in which to pay after proof of loss. So, that case is authority for the position (1) that the limitation does not begin until cause of action accrues; and (2) that it does not begin from the actual loss,—thus departing from the letter of the policy. The Company insists that it denied its liability by letter from its secretary on April 25, 1868, saying: "I do not think there is any liability on this Company for the loss of said barge; hence I cannot give you any instructions in the case. Supposing that you will be here soon, we will then give you our reason for this opinion."

This is not an absolute, unqualified denial of liability, but contemplated further interview; and were it such, according to the opinion in 2 Parsons, Marine Ins., 480, the insured must wait until the time for payment has gone.

It is next contended by counsel of appellant that Murdock had no insurable interest in the barge Joseph McDonald, and that at any rate, under this policy, Hare, the owner of it, could not take its benefit, because of its being expressly "on account of steamboat Charleston and owners." The policy reads: "On account of steamboat Charleston and owners, loss payable to Captain Thomas Murdock. This policy of insurance witnesseth that the Franklin Insurance Company, by these presents, do cause to be insured, lost or not lost, in the sum of $1,000 on the barge James McDonald, towed by the steamboat Charleston, from Wheeling," etc. It is plain that it was the intention of the parties to insure against loss to the barge. Murdock's relation to it, having chartered it of its owner, Hare, and being in possession and custody of it for the trip for business for profit, gave him an insurable interest in it.

Parsons, in his work on Marine Insurance (vol. 1, p. 161), asks and answers the question: 7 L. R. A.

"What is the interest in the property which is the subject matter of the insurance which shall make the contract valid? We think the best definition to be, any such interest as shall make the loss of that property a pecuniary damage to the insured. The most common form of this is the direct interest of absolute ownership. But it is certain that the insured need not be an owner, if he be so circumstanced with respect to the property that he will derive some pecuniary benefit from the safety of the thing or its continued existence, and some injury from its destruction."

This doctrine is supported by high authority. Lucena v. Craufurd, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 269; Buck v. Chesapeake Ins. Co. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 151 [7 L. ed. 90]; opinion in Hooper v. Robinson, 98 U. S. 558 [25 L. ed. 221].

A charterer may insure. Bartlett v. Walter, 18 Mass. 267; Robbins v. New York Ins. Co. 1 Hall, 825.

The very fact that the Company, having opportunity to inquire, if it wished, as to the interest of the assured, and that it did issue to him a policy, is prima facie evidence of his insurable interest, placing the burden on it to disprove it. Sheppard v. Peabody Ins. Co. 21 W. Va. 368.

Thus, Murdock has relations recognized by the law of insurance to this barge, and was not a mere stranger to it. Then the further question arises, Did this policy cover only Murdock's interest, or also that of Hare? We think it covered the interest of Hare as owner of the barge. The fact that the policy is "on account of steamboat Charleston and owners," and that this barge is the thing insured, and that it was to be towed by the steamboat, leads us to the conclusion that this word "owners" was intended to cover the ownership of the barge, and, at any rate, that oral evidence may be heard to establish that fact. Murdock's evidence is that he stated, when the policy was negotiated to the Company, that the policy was to protect himself and Hare, the owner of the barge. He was the charterer or bailee of the barge, and acted herein as agent of Hare. The opinion in Hooper v. Robinson, supra, lays down the proposition that "the agent, factor, bailee, carrier, trustee, consignee, mortgagee and every other lienholder may insure to the extent of his own interest in that to which such interest relates; and by the clause 'on account of whom it may concern,' for all others, to the extent of their respective interests, where there is previous authority or subsequent ratification."

The syllabus announces that a policy to A "on account of whom it may concern, or with other equivalent terms, will insure to the interest of the party for whom it was intended by A."

It seems to us the word "owners" in this policy meets this requirement, and thus includes Hare's interest, as we do not think it was intended to refer to owners of steamboats. The words "on account of owners" mean anyone intended, who is an owner of the thing insured. 1 Parsons, Marine Ins. 47.

But, outside of the principle that there must be words like "or whom it may concern," or any aid from the word "owners," in this policy, this court has gone further in Sheppard v. Peabody Ins. Co., 21 W. Va. 368, holding that, "if a party has the care and custody of property, he may insure it in his own name, even though he be not responsible for its safety, if he really insured it for the owner, though this be not expressed on the face of the policy, for, in such case, he has an insurable interest; and, in general, to give a party an insurable interest in property, it is not necessary that he should have any actual right of property, either legal or equitable, in the subject insured, but it is sufficient if he, or those whom he represents, will suffer any sort of loss by its destruction."

And in Deitz v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 81 W. Va. 851, it is held that "where a contract, not under seal, is made by an agent in his own name, for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue upon it, and parol evidence is admissible to enable the principal to show that he is the real contracting party."

Hare ratified Murdock's act of insurance, and this policy was assigned to him.

The courts are justly liberal to the insured in these matters, because the company has insured the property against loss, and when loss comes it is only holding it to do what it contracted to do, and it cannot harm it beyond what it contemplated when it issued the policy, that the owner take the benefit, though not named, under one who acted for him. Appellant suggests that the declaration is in the name of Murdock, in his own right, and on a policy treated by the declaration as made to him, and averring the barge to be his also; whereas the evidence shows that the ownership of the barge was in Hare, and only a mere right and possession in Murdock as a charterer, and the loss proven is thus Hare's, not, as the declaration states, a loss to Murdock by destruction of his property.

It is settled by Deitz v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., supra, that an agent, upon a contract made in his name, for an unnamed principal, may sue in his own name. In declaring on such a contract, he is to follow its letter, treating himself as holding the legal title under it as payee or contractor. The fact that he may sue in his own name imports that, as the contract is in his own name, he may plead on it as such. If he may sue in his own name, why, in describing the property, may he not describe it as in the contract as his, and the loss as to his property?

The case of Deitz v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co. says that an agent may take an insurance in the name of himself for property not owned by him, and sue on the policy in his own name. Thus, in effect, it holds that an agent may insure another's property without the words "and owners" or other equivalent words, and sue in his own name for the use of another party. If so, must he not necessarily, in declaring upon the policy, allege the property and consequent loss as his? It will be said that in Deitz v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co. a statement, treated as part of the declaration, averred the property to belong to the true owner, but that such is not the case here. That statement prevented any variance between the allegation of property and proof of property, both showing the property to be in the wife; but it is not perceived that it altered the right, existing without it, of the agent to sue and declare in his own name. When, in this case, the evidence came, it showed that the absolute owner of the property was Hare, not, as the declaration alleged, Murdock; but with it was evidence that Murdock had lawful possession of the property, and as agent insured it,—facts which operated to nullify the variance, and made that no variance which without such facts would have been a variance.

"The agent's right to sue in his own name, where [as here] the instrument is in terms payable to him, is the same, whether it be a promissory note, bill of exchange, check, bill of lading, policy of insurance, bond and the like instances." 1 Wait, Act. and Def. 279.

In policies of insurance it is a common practice to bring your action either in the name of agent or principal. Sargent v. Morris, 3 Barn. & Ald. 277, cited, 8 Rob. Pr. (New) 35.

Again, Murdock was, as charterer of this barge, a bailee in actual possession, having thus a special or qualified property. As such bailee he could maintain trespass or trover for its injury or loss. 8 Rob. Pr. (New) 415, 416.

No proposition is better settled than that either bailor or bailee may maintain action in respect of it against a wrong-doer,—the latter by virtue of his possession; the former by reason of his property. 2 Rolle, Abr. 551; Com. Dig. Trespass; 8 Rob. Pr. (New) 416; 6 Wait, Act. and Def. 104; 2 Addison, Torts, § 520; 1 Hilliard, Torts, 494.

In criminal pleading property may be laid in the indictment as the property of bailee having special property. 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 721.

No matter that the recovery by the agent or bailee, when effected, will be for the use of another.

The court's opinion in Rhodes v. Blackiston, 106 Mass. 834: "It is a well-established rule of law that when a contract, not under seal, is made with an agent in his own name, for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue upon it. If the agent sues, it is no ground of defense that the beneficial interest is in another, or that the plaintiff, when he recovers, will be bound to account to another. There is an additional reason for giving this right to the agent when he has a special interest in the subject matter, or a lien upon it. But the rule prevails when the sole interest under the contract is in the principal. The agent's right is, of course, subordinate to and liable to the control of the principal, to the extent of his interest. He may supersede it by suing in his own name, or otherwise suspend or extinguish it, subject only to the special right or lien which the agent may have acquired." See Wood, Ins. § 279.

Again, if the word "owners" in this policy makes it an open policy, like the words "or whom it may concern" or "owners," as I have above held, Murdock might sue on it for the use of Hare. Wood, on Insurance, 818, lays it down that "where the policy is open, and payable 'to whom it may concern,' an action may be maintained in the name of any person having an insurable interest in the property, whose interest and relation to the property is such that he can be said to have been within the contemplation of the parties, and the declaration must show such interest and relation; or the person interested may maintain an action in the name of the assured, for his benefit and such is the better practice."

I presume, in the latter case, the declaration would be on the property as that of the assured.

Again, no objection was made or exception taken to the introduction of evidence that Hare was the owner of the absolute property in the barge. Had this objection been made in the trial court, it could have been remedied under our Statute of Amendment. Not having been there made, it is too late to raise it for the first time in this court. Harrison v. Farmers Bank, 6 W. Va. 1; Cook v. Hays, 9 Gratt. 142.

The policy treated and recognized Murdock as owner of the barge, and promised him payment of the policy. When a note is made to a corporation, this estops the denial of its existence. Here the policy must be held as recognizing his title for its purposes, and the fact that the evidence showed that he had a special property while Hare had the absolute property would not seem to produce a variance. If there had been an averment of this property in Hare, would it have defeated Murdock's recovery, the policy being payable to him? If not, why is such averment necessary? To prevent surprise? That would be a fact which would not be in law a surprise, for the special property in Murdock would prevent its so operating. Will not a recovery in this action of the whole loss bar Hare from another action for the same cause?

Appellant's counsel next insists that the damages ($1,244.85) were excessive, and for that cause the verdict should have been set aside. Not deciding whether the motion to set it aside, made March 2, 1887, was too late, or could be entertained, we cannot say that it was excessive. The policy fixes the valuation of the barge at $2,000, the sum insured at $1,000, and thus it was a valued policy, and there was total loss. Valued policies bind the insurer to pay the whole sum insured in case of total loss. Wood, Ins. § 41; Parsons, Marine Ins. 260, and note.

Murdock's evidence puts the barge's value at $1,500 to $2,000 at least, and Shipley's at $2,000 at least. Taking the view we do, that this policy covers, not merely Murdock's insurable interest, but also the property of Hare as owner, we cannot say the sum is excessive. "Agents, commission merchants or others having the custody of, and being responsible for, property, may insure in their own names; and they may, in their own names, recover of the insurer, not only a sum equal to their own interest, . . . but the full amount named in the policy, up to the value of the property." War-ning v. Indemnity F. Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 606.

The last point made by the brief of appellant's counsel is that the verdict having been rendered on May 25, 1873, and judgment on May 28, 1887, it was error to make the sum found by the verdict bear interest from date of verdict, as the judgment does. We concur in this view. At the date of the verdict it was provided by Code 1868, chap. 131, § 14, that the jury should find the amount of principal and interest due at the time of the trial, and judgment should be rendered for that amount, with interest from the date of the judgment. Chapter 120, Acts 1882, amending this section, provided that judgment should be rendered for the amount of the verdict, with interest from the date of the verdict. Thus, the law in force when this verdict was rendered did not impose the burden of interest from the verdict, if any time should elapse before judgment. The matter of interest upon a sum found by a verdict is of statute regulation, and the then law at once, upon the return of the verdict, attached to it, fixing the rights of the parties to it, and by that they must be governed.

The Act of 1882 does not expressly apply (if it effectually could) to verdicts rendered before it became a law, and we should not give it a retrospective operation, and thus place a burden on the defendant, which by the law in force at the date of the verdict he would not bear. Though the Legislature may have the power to make a law operate retrospectively, it must clearly appear that such was the intention, the presumption being that it was intended to operate on future transactions. Ducal v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24; Cooley, Const. Lim. 370; Wade, Retroactive Laws, § 84; McCance v. Taylor, 10 Gratt. 585.

The language and manifest intent of this fourteenth section, as re-enacted in 1882, bear evidence that it was designed for future verdicts. Though it be hard on the plaintiff to get no interest for the long space from the verdict and judgment, such is the right of the parties. It may be true, as contended by appellee's counsel, that a policy of insurance bears interest after loss; but that policy is so far merged by the verdict—by the proceedings in the court towards final judgment—that we cannot look to it, but must go by the Statute.

Being of opinion that in this matter of interest the Circuit Court erred, the judgment must be reversed, with costs to appellant in this court; and this court, proceeding to render such judgment as the Circuit Court should have rendered thereupon, it is considered that the plaintiff recover from the defendant $1,244.85, the damages by the jury in their verdict assessed, with interest thereon from the 28th day of May, 1887, until payment, and also his costs about his suit expended.

from setting up the suicide of an insured person as a defense to its liability on the policy insuring his life by a statute providing that "all companies, after having received three annual premiums on any policy, . . . are estopped from defending upon any other ground than fraud, against any claim arising upon such policy by reason of any errors, omissions or misstatements of the assured in any application made by such assured on which the policy was issued, except as to age."

(March 31, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for North Hampton County in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a policy of life insurance. Reversed. The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. Charles F. Walter for appellant. Mr. H. J. Steele for appellee.

Sterrett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In his statement plaintiff claimed $2,000, the full face value of the policy. The Company, in its affidavit of defense, averred that the insured, by reason of his having committed suicide, on July 27, 1889, violated the eighth condition of his policy and thereby rendered the same null and void, except as to the sum of $74.52, the "reserve value" of the policy which is protected by the ninth condition thereof. The eighth condition, above referred to, provides "that in case the insured shall die by his own hand, whether sane or insane . . . this policy shall become null and void."

The plaintiff having elected to take judgment for the reserve value, admitted to be due, and proceed for the residue, entered a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. The rule was afterwards made absolute and judgment entered accordingly. From that judgment this appeal was taken, and the only question for our consideration is whether the court below erred in construing the thirteenth condition of the policy, and holding that the Company was estopped by its provisions from insisting on the bar of the eighth condition above quoted. The thirteenth condition is as follows: "Whether the insured reside in Ohio or elsewhere, this policy is issued subject to the following named section of the Ohio Revised Statutes: section 8626. All companies after having received three annual premiums on any policy issued on the life of any person in this State are estopped from defending upon any other ground than fraud, against any claim arising upon such policy by reason of any errors, omissions or misstatements of the assured in any application made by such assured on which the policy was issued except as to age."

It was conceded that the three annual premiums were paid by plaintiff's intestate, and, if the learned president of the common pleas was right in his construction of the thirteenth condition, the Company was estopped from enforcing the bar of the eighth condition of the policy, in this case; but, we are of opinion that he was mistaken as to the scope and effect of the thirteenth condition. In our opinion it has no effect whatever on the eighth condition.

The condition in question is not as clearly expressed as it might have been, and its meaning is further obscured by the omission of a comma after the words "such policy." Formerly it was unusual to punctuate legislative Acts and deeds, but in construing them the courts always read them with such stops as gave effect to the whole. 4 L. R. 65. It is well settled that neither punctuation nor the absence of points is to be seriously regarded in the construction of statutes. It was intended, by the condition under consideration, that the Company, after having received three annual premiums, should be estopped from defending, etc., on the ground that errors, omissions or misstatements were made by the assured in the application on which the policy was issued, unless such errors, omission or misstatements were of such a character as to amount to actual fraud, excepting, however, misstatements as to age, whether fraudulently made or not. In other words the thirteenth condition relates solely to defenses based on errors, omissions or misstatements in the application; and, with the exception of errors or misstatements as to age, it debars the Company from defending on either ground in case the error, omission or misstatement was inadvertently or innocently made, but it does not prohibit the Company from defending on the ground that the errors, omissions or misstatements were fraudulently made, or on the ground that error or misstatement as to age was actually made, whether fraudulently or not.

We find nothing in any of the provisions of the policy that was intended to estop the Company, in any case of suicide, from setting up the bar of the eighth condition, except to the extent of the "reserve value" of the policy, to which reference has already been made.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Frederick WIESE, Resp't.,

v.

SAN FRANCISCO MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY, App't.

(22 Cal. 645.)

1. A judgment deciding that a mutual benefit society had no power to limit the amount of sick benefits is conclusive against the validity of such limitation as a defense in a subsequent action for new installments which have become due to the same plaintiff by the continuance of his sickness.

2. The fact that a judgment was rendered in a suit commenced in a justice's court makes no difference with its conclusiveness, when rendered in the exercise of jurisdiction.

(January 30, 1890.)

NOTE.—Doctrine of res judicata.

The doctrine of res judicata is plain and intelligible, and amounts simply to this, that a cause of action once finally determined, without appeal, between the parties, on the merits, by a competent tribunal, cannot afterwards be litigated by a new proceeding either before the same or any other tribunal. Foster v. The Richard Busted, 100 Mass. 409.

The doctrine applies to the decision of the referees

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, in an action to recover certain sick benefits alleged to be due plaintiff by reason of his membership in defendant Society. Affirmed.

Commissioner's opinion.

Plaintiff became a member of the defendant Society at a time when there was a by-law in force providing that in case a member not specially disqualified should become sick, he should receive the sum of $10 per week.

While this by-law was in force plaintiff became, by reason of sickness, entitled to the benefits, which he received for more than a year.

During that time the Society adopted a by-law which provided that if a member shall have received benefits continuously for six months the payment of benefits to such member shall thereafter cease.

Under this by-law payments to plaintiff were stopped and he afterwards sued in a justice's court to recover a certain amount alleged to be due and recovered judgment, which was affirmed upon appeal to the superior court.

In order that a judgment may constitute a bar to another suit, it must be rendered in a proceeding between the same parties or their privies, and the point of controversy must be the same in both cases, and must be determined on its merits. Hughes v. United States, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 232 (18 L. ed. 303).

Where, in a former case in the same court, between the same parties, it has been adjudged that an alleged contract relied on by defendant does not exist, it is proper to strike out an answer which sets up the same contract, and to exclude evidence offered to prove it. *Kates v. A judgment by an equally divided court, determining title to land, is conclusive upon a question of the same title in a subsequent case between different parties, where the state of facts is the same and in the absence of the showing of the former decision was manifestly erroneous. *Kolb v. Subsequently, further benefits accrued, and he brought this action in the superior court to recover the same.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. L. Barnes, for appellant:

The justice's court is not a court of concurrent jurisdiction with the superior court in respect of the subject matter of this action.

See Code Civ. Proc. § 114.

A judgment of a justice's court upon a cause of action within its jurisdiction should not be permitted to control the judgment of the superior and supreme courts and prevent the examination and trial, in these courts, of the questions involved in a cause of action which the justice's court could not originally have entertained at all.

The money demand sued upon in this action is not the same money demand sued upon in the justice's court. It was not, and could not have been, in litigation in that action.

Bigelow, Estop. 8d ed. pp. 87-39; Jones v. Petaluma, 86 Cal. 230; Hughes v. Alexander, 5 Duer, 493.

In the case of periodically recurring liability a former judgment cannot be a bar to an to another action for the same cause, in the State where rendered, is, by the Constitution of the United States (art. 4, § 1), and the Acts of Congress of May 26, 1790, equally conclusive in every other State in the Union. This is the declared doctrine of this court. North Bank v. Brown, 50 Me. 214; Sweet v. Brackley, 53 Me. 846. See Peters v. Sanford, 1 Denio, 224; Nicholl v. Mason, 21 Wend. 389.

The same doctrine is held by the Supreme Court of the United States. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 97 U. S. 331 (24 L. ed. 959).

A decree rendered in a court of one State is controlled by a prior decree rendered between the same parties and upon the same subject matter in another State, although the suit in which the former decree was rendered was instituted first. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Grayson (Ala.) 7 So. Rep. 122.

Previous adjudication of the state court upon the meaning of a statute, in a similar case between the same defendant and the State, where the constitutionality of the Act was not drawn in question,—that it constituted a contract between the defendant and the State,—did not estop the State from denying its constitutionality in a subsequent case, or conclude the court upon that question, although the point might have been raised and determined in the first instance. Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645 (24 L. ed. 302).

Where a prior judgment involved the construction of a statute, no different state of facts will authorize such construction to be subsequently changed as between the parties to it or their privies. Western Teleg. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 12 Cent. Rep. 373, 60 Md. 211.

While the judgment of the Vermont court, rendered under such circumstances, is of no force against the person of the debtor, it may be binding against his property, as a proceeding in rem, if his property came within the jurisdiction, and was disposed of by the judgment of the Vermont court, according to the laws of that State; and if such judgment is binding and conclusive in the State in which it is rendered, it is binding and conclusive everywhere. If once executed, that execution will be respected. Gray v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 5 Abb. N. C. 126; Cochran v. Fitch, 1 Sandf. Ch. 142; Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101; Burrows v. Miller, 5 How. Pr. 51; Donovan v. Hunt, 7 Abb. Pr. 22; Andrews v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 321; 1 Kent, Com. 260, 261, note b; 2 Kent, Com. 119.

Judgment must be final and on the merits.

A judgment, to be a bar to further litigation, must have been final and rendered as to all the merits of the cause. Garrett v. Greenwell, 10 West. Rep. 351, 92 Mo. 120.

Where the court has jurisdiction its judgment is final. Authorities cited in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 154, 120 Ill. 104.

A judgment of dismissal in pursuance of agreement, reciting a settlement and that nothing is due the plaintiff, is a bar to a subsequent action. United States v. Parker, 120 U. S. 89 (30 L. ed. 601).

An order dismissing a bill and amended bill of 7 L. R. A. complaint, with costs taxed and execution awarded, is a final decree, and disposes of the whole case. Campbell v. James, 31 Fed. Rep. 535.

A judgment of dismissal, if set up as a plea in bar to a new bill for the same cause, is conclusive, if the dismissal was upon the hearing and was not in direct terms "without prejudice." Lyon v. Perin & G. Mfg. Co. 125 U. S. 698 (31 L. ed. 889).

A decree in these words, "The plaintiff failing to prosecute his suit, it is ordered that the same be dismissed,"—is a final decree, and therefore, after the end of the term, can be set aside only on appeal or bill of review within the statutory period. Jones v. Turner, 31 Va. 709.

In an action for breach of contract before a justice, he cannot, after entering a judgment dismissing the suit for failure to prove execution of the contract, by adding the words, "without prejudice to a new suit," authorize a new suit for the same cause of action; but that matter is res judicata. Parsons v. Riley (W. Va.) 10 S. E. Rep. 808.

If the decree is final then its result is to merge the original cause of action, as was remarked in the case of Barnes v. Gibbs, 31 N. J. L. 319.

When not final.

A dismissal of a suit for want of parties does not make the subject of controversy res judicata. St. Romes v. Levee Steam Cotton-Press Co. 127 U. S. 614 (2 L. ed. 289).

A judgment of dismissal without prejudice to another action is no bar to another action upon the same cause. Gunn v. Peakes, 36 Minn. 177; Payne v. Grant, 31 Va. 164.

The dismissal of a party defendant, at the instance of plaintiff, before trial, where no counterclaim is made, is not a judgment upon the merits. James v. Lepore, 19 Nev. 174.

So where plaintiff failed in his first action from the omission of an essential allegation, the dismissal was not a trial on the merits. Gilmer v. Morris, 30 Fed. Rep. 476.

As to what matters conclusive.

When a matter in issue between the parties has once been judicially determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, it cannot again be the subject of controversy between such parties or those in privity with them, so long as such adjudication remains in force. Magnus v. Sleeper, 60 Wis. 219.

A fact which has been directly tried and decided cannot be contested again collaterally between the same parties in the same or any other court. Hopkins v. Lee, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 109 (5 L. ed. 218); Penhallow v. Doane, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 54 (1 L. ed. 507); Elliot v. Pierol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 323 (7 L. ed. 164); Ex parte Watkins, 26 U. S. 3 Pet. 193 (7 L. ed. 650); United States v. Nourse, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 8 (9 L. ed. 31); Bank of U. S. v. Beverly, 42 U. S. 1 How. 134 (11 L. ed. 75); Randall v. Howard, 67 U. S. 2 Black. 535 (17 L. ed. 269); Parrish v. Ferris, 37 U. S. 2 Black. 606 (17 L. ed. 317); Florentine v. Barton, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 210 (17 L. ed. 783); Cromwell v. Sac Co. 94 U. S. 351 (24 L. ed. 195); Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606 (24 L. ed. 214); action for a sum subsequently falling due, when the former judgment was for the plaintiff.

The estoppel, if any, extends only to questions of fact decided, and not to questions of law.

Bigelow, Estop. 3d ed. p. 57; Bernard v. Hoboken, 27 N. J. L. 412; Cromwell v. Sac Co. 94 U. S. 351 (24 L. ed. 195); Freem. Judgm. §§ 253, 256.

Messrs. O'Brien & Morrison, for respondent:

Hornbuckle v. Stafford, 111 U. S. 333 (28 L. ed. 408); Bryan v. Kennett, 113 U. S. 179 (28 L. ed. 908).

If the first judgment involved the whole claim or the whole subject matter, and settled the entire defense to a whole series of claims, then the first judgment operates as an estoppel to the whole. Kilander v. Hoover, 9 West. Rep. 244, 111 Ind. 10.

The rule is well settled that a former judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is final and conclusive between the parties, not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated and have decided as incident to or essentially connected with the subject matter of the litigation within the purview of the original action, either as matter of claim or defense. Pray v. Hegeman, 98 N. Y. 351; Jordan v. Van Epps, 85 N. Y. 438; Smith v. Smith, 79 N. Y. 634; Clemens v. Clemens, 37 N. Y. 74; Griffin v. Long Island R. Co. 3 Cent. Rep. 740, 102 N. Y. 449.

To ascertain what might have been determined in the former action, it is proper to look, beyond what appears on the face of the judgment, to every allegation which, having been made on one side and denied on the other, was at issue and determined in the course of the proceedings. Clemens v. Clemens, supra.

The fact that no proof was brought on a certain question, or that point actually ruled, does not prevent it from being res judicata if the precise matter was involved, or had of necessity to be decided in giving judgment. Faust v. Faust (S. C.) 10 S. E. Rep. 262.

To constitute an estoppel by judgment, matters in issue and points actually determined must have been identical with those presented as a defense to the second suit. Kilander v. Hoover, 9 West. Rep. 244, 111 Ind. 10.

That the cause of action in two cases is the same is the test by which it is determined that the judgment in one is a bar to the other. Brooke v. Logan, 11 West. Rep. 352, 112 Ind. 183; Williams v. Hay, 12 Cent. Rep. 602, 120 Pa. 435.

To ascertain what might have been determined it is proper to look beyond the terms of the judgment, and consider the allegation made and traversed. But the findings and the judgment generally show what was determined, and are conclusive on that subject. Griffin v. Long Island R. Co. supra.

A decree does not bar a suit for a different cause of action arising afterward. Chapman v. Goodnow, 123 U. S. 540 (31 L. ed. 235).

In such case the inquiry must always be as to the point or question collaterally litigated and determined in the original action. Authorities cited in Riverside Co. v. Townshend, 10 West. Rep. 581, 120 Ill. 9.

In a subsequent suit, parol evidence to show what was tried in the first suit is admissible, if the record leaves the matter in doubt. Campbell v. Rankin, 99 U. S. 231 (25 L. ed. 435); Washington, A. & G. Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 65 U. S. 24 How. 333 (16 L. ed. 650); Miles v. Caldwell, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 35 (17 L. ed. 755); Washington, A. & G. Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 529 (18 L. ed. 550); 7 L. R. A.

A judgment or final order in an action or special proceeding before a court or judge of this state, or of the United States, having jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment or order, is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1908.

The principle is the same whether the issue is one of law or fact.

Bouchaud v. Dias, 8 Denio, 238; Farrer's Case, 6 Coke, 7 a; Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 84 (19 L. ed. 42); Stewart v. Stebbins, 30 Miss. 66; Kingsland v. Spaulding, 3 Barb.

Cromwell v. Sac Co. 94 U. S. 351 (24 L. ed. 195); Davis v. Brown, 94 U. S. 423 (24 L. ed. 204); Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606 (24 L. ed. 214).

To constitute a bar, it must appear by legal evidence that the matter involved was determined by the former suit. Smith v. Brunswick, 6 New Eng. Rep. 417, 80 Me. 189.

It is not sufficient to show that it may have been determined by the former suit. Ibid.

Hence it is settled that a verdict and judgment of a court of record, or a decree in chancery, puts an end to all further controversy concerning the points thus decided between the parties to the suit. Hopkins v. Lea, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 109 (5 L. ed. 218); Pierson v. Catlin, 18 Vt. 77; Nations v. Johnson, 65 U. S. 24 How. 195 (16 L. ed. 623); Colt v. Tracy, 3 Conn. 238; Foster v. The Richard Busted, 100 Mass. 409; Winans v. Dunham, 5 Wend. 47; 3 Wharton, Ev. § 774; Freeman, Judgm. § 243.

Of what facts conclusive.

A judgment rendered, while it remains in force, is conclusive of all the facts properly pleaded by the plaintiffs. Washington, A. & G. Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 65 U. S. 24 How. 333 (16 L. ed. 650).

It is not necessary, as between parties and privies, that the record should show the question upon which the right of the plaintiff to recover or the validity of the defense depended, but only that the same matter in controversy might have been litigated. Ibid.

So far as the principal defendant is concerned, it is established that the judgment of a domestic court of record, proceeding according to the course of the common law, is conclusive evidence of all the facts decided in subsequent suits between the same parties; and that the only remedy of a party who has been injured by a judgment erroneously rendered is by review or by proceeding to reverse the same upon a writ of error. The party plaintiff is not allowed to treat a judgment, lawfully obtained by him, from a court of competent jurisdiction, as a nullity, nor to proceed upon his original demand as if it had not been rendered. While it exists he can only proceed by suit on his judgment or levy of execution. These principles apply to judgments rendered by courts such as the Second District Court of Bristol County. Loring v. Bridge, 9 Mass. 124; Cook v. Darling, 18 Pick. 383; Hendrick v. Whittemore, 105 Mass. 23; Wood v. Mann, 125 Mass. 319; Fogel v. Dussault, 2 New Eng. Rep. 331, 141 Mass. 154.

A recital in a judgment that notice has been given to all the persons interested is not conclusive of that fact. Gilman v. Healy, 46 Hun. 310.

A recital in a judgment that service was made on defendant is not conclusive as to such service, and defendant may show by extrinsic evidence that no service was made. Thorn v. Salmonson, 3 Kan. 441.

A decree reciting that defendants were duly notified by publication is conclusive that the order of publication was duly published in the designated newspaper, but is not conclusive that the order was sufficient or that affidavits for publication was

The judgments of the ordinary domestic courts of inferior jurisdiction are equally conclusive with the judgments of the superior courts, provided it appears from the record that the court had acquired jurisdiction of the cause.

Recitals in the record of a court of limited and special authority are prima facie evidence of the facts recited, to show the jurisdiction of the court. Comstock v. Crawford, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 306 (18 L. ed. 84).

If a justice's judgment recites the due service of process, or other facts necessary to give jurisdiction of the person, the general rule will apply that in a collateral proceeding such recital in the record imports absolute verity and cannot be contradicted. Heck v. Martin, 75 Tex. 469.

Where a record is perfect on its face, evidence cannot be let in to contradict and overthrow it in a collateral proceeding. Erwin v. Lowry, 43 U. S. 7 How. 172 (12 L. ed. 655).

To make a record of a former adjudication evidence in a subsequent case, not only the subject matter, but the parties, must be the same. Goodwin v. Snyder (Wis.) 44 N. W. Rep. 746.

It must appear, either upon the face of the record or by extrinsic evidence, that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. Russell v. Place, 94 U. If there is a total want of jurisdiction, the proceedings are not merely voidable, but void, and may be rejected when collaterally drawn in question. Roe v. Himely, 8 U. A judgment in form procured upon a mere feigned controversy is a nullity, and no writ of error will lie upon it. Lord v. Veazie, 49 U. S. 8 How. 251 (12 L. ed. 1067).

As to whom conclusive.

An estoppel by judgment is equally conclusive upon all the parties to the action and their privies, and may not be invoked or repudiated at the pleasure of one of them, as his interest may require. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. Nat. Bank of the Republic, 102 U. S. 14 (26 L. ed. 61); Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Scammon, 10 West. Rep. 340, 128 Ill. 364.

But the adjudication to have that effect requires that the questions be identical. Ibid.

Only parties and privies in blood or estate are estopped by a judgment. Orthwein v. Thomas, 11 West. Rep. 390, 127 Ill. 554.

Privies in blood or estate who are estopped by a judgment are those who derive title to the property by descent or purchase. Ibid.

Both parties, having consented to litigate, are bound by the judgment. Helck v. Reinheimer, 7 Cent. Rep. 743, 105 N. Y. 470.

The judgment of a state court declaring that a debt is null and void as against a certain party, and equally void as a contract to convey, is conclusive between the parties and those in privity with them in a suit in a circuit court. Minneapolis Agr. & M. Asso. v. Canfield, 121 U. S. 295 (30 L. ed. 932).

A judgment is conclusive against a person who was responsible over to defendant, if he had notice of the action and an opportunity to defend. Davis v. Smith, 4 New Eng. Rep. 663, 79 Me. 351.

The notice may be implied when he had knowledge of the suit and participated in its defense. Ibid.

Where one not named as a party is represented by one who is a party and under whom he claims, and puts in an answer in the name of such party, and pays part of the expenses of litigation, he is bound by a decree therein. Plumb v. Goodnow, 123 U. S. 560 (31 L. ed. 268).

The fact that the United States was party to a judgment in reference to a title to land will not make it binding upon a citizen whose connection with the case is not shown. Barton v. Long, 13 Cent. Rep. 818, 45 N. J. Eq. 645.

A judgment is only presumptively conclusive against parties in the character in which they sue or are sued. Authorities cited in Adair v. Mengenthelm, 13 West. Rep. 853, 114 Ind. 303; *McBurnie v. #### Who not bound.

A judgment is not a bar against a party sought to be defrauded thereby. Siddle v. Tomlinson, 7 Cent. Rep. 598, 115 Pa. 299.

But a judgment cannot be assailed on the ground of fraud, by one who was not a necessary party to the action, or a party in fact. Van Gorder v. Hanna, 72 Iowa, 572.

In general, judgments and decrees are evidence only in suits between parties and privies. Barr v. Gratz, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 213 (4 L. ed. 553); Tappan v. Beardsley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 427 (19 L. ed. 974); Litchfield v. Goodnow, 123 U. S. 549 (31 L. ed. 199); Plumb v. Goodnow, 123 U. S. 560 (31 L. ed. 268).

As to one not a party, a judgment is an absolute nullity, and casts no cloud on his title, and affords no ground for an action by him to set it aside. Fontaine v. Hudson, 11 West. Rep. 463, 93 Mo. 62.

A decree against one not named in the bill, and against whom no process of relief is prayed, and who is in no wise comprehended in its general allegations, is a nullity. Ogden v. Davidson, 81 Va. 767.

A judgment is not binding upon persons not cited or made parties to it. Gilman v. Healy, 46 Hun, 510.

One not a party, or privy to a party, to an action, cannot, as between himself and the plaintiff, be bound by the result, or claim that the plaintiff is bound by it, on the ground that he was the real defendant in interest and conducted the defense, unless he did so openly and to the knowledge of the plaintiff and for the defense of his own interests. Cannon River Mfra. Asso. v. Rogers (Minn.) 42 N. W. Rep. 792.

Strangers to a judgment by confession are not concluded by its date or by its recitals. They may, upon a complaint setting forth specific averments of fraud, introduce oral, as well as documentary and record, evidence. Schuster v. Rader (Colo.) 22 Pac. Rep. 606.

Judgments bind parties and privies, but they do not bind strangers. Sessions v. Johnson, 35 U. S. 247 (24 L. ed. 506); W. B. v. Latimer, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. Appx. 1 (Ct. Err. & App. Del.) A judgment is no evidence as against a stranger to it. Hartman v. Welland, 36 Minn. 223.

Those who are neither parties, privies nor purchasers pendente lite are not bound by a former decree. Kerr v. Watts, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 550 (5 L. ed. 228).

A decree making void an agreement and a judgment operates only between the parties to the action, and does not make the agreement and judgment void as to other parties or bar the latter in another action. Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 704 (18 L. ed. 247).

Judgments, though erroneous, binding till reversed.

Where the court has jurisdiction both of the cause and the parties, and proceeds erroneously, the judgment, notwithstanding the error, is binding, until it is vacated or reversed. Rodgers v. Evans, 8 Ga. 143, 52 Am. Dec. 391; Gorrill v. Whittier, 3 N. H. 299; The Case of the Marshalsea, 10 Coke, 7; Elliot v. Peirson, 28 U. S. 1 Pet. 340 (7 L. ed. 164); *Smith v. like those in Stohr v. San Francisco M. Fund Society, 82 Cal. 557 (filed January 22, 1890), which is against the same defendant. After the passage of the by-law limiting the amount of benefits, and the payments in accordance therewith, the defendant refused to pay anything further; and within a few months thereafter the plaintiff commenced an action in the justice's court to recover the installments then claimed to be due. Judgment was given in his favor, and the Society appealed to the superior court, where, after a trial on the merits, a similar judgment was rendered. The court below held this judgment to estop the defendant from maintaining the defense presented here, and we think that this ruling was correct. It affirmatively appears that the matters which are presented here were litigated and decided in the former action. There, as here, the main defense was that the by-law of 1883 limited the amount of benefits to be paid to the plaintiff. The court decided that the defendant had no power to impose such a limitation. The only difference between the

A judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is conclusive until reversed upon appeal. Authorities cited in People v. New York Catholic Protectors, 9 Cent. Rep. 412, 106 N. Y. 604.

So a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction in a suit between proper parties is valid and conclusive until reversed on some proper proceedings in the same suit and in the same court, or on appeal, unless there be some sufficient ground of fraud or surprise to entitle the injured party to relief in some other suit. Fox v. Cottage Bldg. Fund Asso. 51 Va. 677.

The fact of being a party to a judgment or decree does not estop a person from obtaining, in a court of equity, relief against fraud in obtaining it. Johnson v. Waters, 111 U. S. 640 (28 L. ed. 547); League v. De Young, 52 U. S. 11 How. 185 (13 L. ed. 657); Webster v. Reid, 52 U. S. 11 How. 427 (13 L. ed. 761).

A determination in a statutory proceeding for the adjustment of an encroachment upon a public road is, until set aside, a bar to a subsequent investigation before the same tribunal. State v. Briggs, 10 Cent. Rep. 178, 50 N. J. L. 114.

A summary conviction by a magistrate is conclusive until reversed on appeal. People v. New York Catholic Protectors, 9 Cent. Rep. 417, 106 N. Y. 604.

The appointment of an under tutor is proof of his capacity, and is binding upon third persons until set aside by appeal or in an action of nullity. Keller's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 579.

When the record shows that the under tutor was appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction, an adjudicatee cannot, on the ground of the alleged illegality of the appointment of such tutor, set up the nullity of the proceedings leading to the sale. Ibid.

Benefit and benevolent associations. See Marsh v. Supreme Council, Am. L. of H. 4 L. R. A. 382, and cases referred to in note, 149 Mass. 512; Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Knight, 3 L. R. A. 409, and note, 117 Ind. 439.

two cases is that, by mere lapse of time and the continuance of the plaintiff's sickness, new installments have become due.

It is quite true, as stated by Chief Justice De Grey in the Duchess of Kingston's Case [8 Smith, Lead. Cas. *574, 7th Am. ed. 610], that a judgment is not conclusive "of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment." But here the invalidity of the by-law was the ultimate point involved, and it was actually litigated and decided, which circumstance distinguishes the case from Cromwell v. Sac Co. 94 U. S. 351 [24 L. ed. 195], cited for the appellant. The preponderance of authority is in favor of the respondent's position that in such a case the judgment is conclusive in an action for subsequent installments. Robinson v. Howart, 5 Cal. 428; Loos v. Walte, 7 Cal. 250; Outram v. Morewood, 8 East, 846; Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 96 [19 L. ed. 47]; Bissell v. Spring Valley Twp. 124 U. S. 225 [31 L. ed. 411]; Smith v. Ontario, 18 Blatchf. 454, 4 Fed. Rep. 386; Laird v. De Soto, 82 Fed. Rep. 652; Oregonian R. Co. v. Oregon

The fact that the former case was commenced in the justice's court makes no difference. That court had jurisdiction; and, when a court which has jurisdiction renders a valid judgment, such judgment is as binding as any other. But, however this may be, the case was retried on its merits in the superior court, and the judgment relied upon was entered there, and is a judgment of that court. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: Van Clief, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

William REESE, Appt.,

v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(.....Ind. ....)

1. The complaint in an action to recover the penalty provided by statute for the failure of a telegraph company to deliver a message sent to a person residing within a certain distance of its office is fatally defective if it does not state that the person to whom the telegram was addressed resided within the prescribed distance from the office.

2. Mental anguish caused by the failure to reach the bedside of a person sick unto death be-

NOTE.—Telegraph company; damages for neglect to deliver message.

Delay in delivering a telegram stating the death and time of burial of a person referred to merely as "Willie," without notice of his relation to the person addressed, will not subject the company to an action for damages based solely on injury to fraternal feelings from inability to attend the funeral. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 2 L. R. A. 766, 71 Tex. 723.

Telegraph companies are required to take notice of whatever the dispatch suggests, and if fuller information is needed they must seek it, or be held to possess all the knowledge such inquiries could have elicited. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Edeall, 74 Tex. 329.

A telegraph message as follows, "Come on first train. Bring Ferdinand. His father very low," is not sufficient to suggest a near relationship between the sick man and the person addressed, and will not authorize damages for the mental suffering of the latter's wife, in an action for delay in delivering the message whereby she was unable to reach her father before his death. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Kirkpatrick (Tex.) 13 S. W. Rep. 70.

Failure to disclose the relationship of the parties to a telegraph company when sending a message stating that a person named is dying, and saying, "Come quick," will not prevent a recovery of damages for suffering on account of the inability of the receiver to be with a dying brother because of delay in delivering the message. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 6 L. R. A. 844, 75 Tex. 581.

A telegraph message delivered for transmission, saying, "Billie is very low; come at once," is sufficient to reasonably apprise the company of the consequences of a failure to deliver the message. 7 L. R. A.

and to render it liable for damages for mental suffering in consequence of such failure. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Moore (Tex.) 12 S. W. Rep. 948.

Measure of damages for neglect.

Where, by a telegraph company's negligent delay in transmission and delivery to a sister of messages informing her of the serious illness, and, later, of the death, of her brother, she is denied the opportunity of attending him and making preparations for his funeral, the damages may include such sum as will compensate for the grief, disappointment and other injury to her feelings. Wadsworth v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695.

In case of breach of contract to deliver a message the company is liable for damages for both mental and physical suffering caused thereby. Stuart v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 66 Tex. 580.

In the entire absence of gross or willful negligence in delaying the transmission of a telegram as the result of which a husband is deprived of seeing his wife before death, no punitive damages can be recovered. Beasley v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 89 Fed. Rep. 181.

Grief occasioned by the death of plaintiff's wife is no element of damages for neglect to send a telegram, whereby plaintiff is prevented from seeing his wife; but he can only recover for the disappointment and mental anguish occasioned by the fault or negligence of the company. Ibid.

In an action against a telegraph company for a failure promptly to deliver a message, damages for mere continued anxiety caused by such failure are not recoverable. Rowell v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 75 Tex. 28.

A verdict for $1,000 damages will not be held excessive on appeal, in an action against a telegraph company for a mistake in a message sent by a wo-fore death takes place, on account of the negligence of a telegraph company in not delivering a message promptly according to its contract, is a ground for the recovery of substantial damages against the company.

3. A message reading, "My wife is very ill; not expected to live," is sufficient to inform the company that mental anguish will probably result from its failure to deliver the message promptly.

(March 14, 1890.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in his favor but for a less amount than claimed in an action to recover damages for the failure of defendant to promptly deliver a message. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. E. Clodfelter and J. A. Lindsey, for appellant:

man who was far from home with the dead body of her husband, calling for a remittance of money, in consequence of which mistake she was delayed for two days before receiving the money to enable her to leave that place with his body. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Simpson, 73 Tex. 422.

Statutory penalty for neglect.

The Indiana Act of 1835 prescribing a penalty for the refusal of a telegraph company to receive and transmit messages without discrimination does not make the company liable to a penalty for the mere negligent breach of duty. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Jones, 116 Ind. 361.

Under Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4176, providing a penalty when a telegraph company fails to transmit a message "with impartiality and in good faith," recovery sustained where the message written was "Send seventieth Illinois," and transmitted "seventh," although the message was not repeated, and was written on a blank requiring repetition to avoid mistakes. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Huff, 3 West. Rep. 376, 102 Ind. 535.

The Mississippi Act of March 18, 1886 (Miss. Acts 1886, p. 91), providing that any telegraph company failing to transmit and deliver within a reasonable time any message shall pay $25 in addition to other damages to the person injured, gives the right to recover such sum to one to whom the message is addressed, although he paid nothing for its transmission and sustained no pecuniary injury. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Allen, 66 Miss. 549.

The company may stipulate that the claim for penalty shall be presented within a reasonable time. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 6 West. Rep. 543, 106 Ind. 308.

Pleadings in action to recover penalty.

The penalty for failure of a telegraph company to transmit a message is not incurred unless the omission is alleged to be within reasonable office hours, both at the place of reception and the place of transmission. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Harding, 3 West. Rep. 206, 108 Ind. 505.

An answer stating that the delay in delivery was caused by its not reaching the point of delivery until after the close of office hours is good on demurrer. Ibid.

The complaint to recover a statutory penalty for failing to transmit a message must aver facts which bring the case within both the letter and the spirit of the statute. W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Kinney, 4 West. Rep. 512, 106 Ind. 463.

A complaint which shows a mere neglect of duty in transmitting a message is not sufficient. W. U. 7 L. R. A.

Section 4178, Rev. Stat. 1881, was repealed by the later Act of 1885.

W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Steele, 108 Ind. 183; W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, Id. 308; W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Swain, 109 Ind. 405.

The Telegraph Company was bound to know that wounded feelings and anxiety of mind were likely to result from the failure to properly transmit and deliver the message. This was apparent from the message itself, and damages occasioned from failure to transmit or deliver the same promptly can be recovered.

W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Fenton, 52 Ind. 1; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4176; W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Mack, 49 Ind. 53.

Such damages may be recovered as naturally flow from the breach of duty complained of, or such as may fairly be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties as a possible result at the time the dispatch was sent. In determining what was fairly within the con-

Berkshire, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint is in two paragraphs. The substance of the first paragraph is that, on the 27th day of February, 1887, the appellant delivered to the appellee's agent, at its office in Jamestown, Indiana, the following message:

February 21st, 1887. Jamestown, Indiana.
To A. S. Clements:

My wife is very ill; not expected to live.
Wm. Reese.

—and paid to the appellee the sum of twenty-five cents, the usual charge for the transmission of like messages to the City of Crawfordsville, and the full amount demanded for transmitting said message, and at the same time the appellant guaranteed the payment of all expenses incurred by the appellee in the delivery of said message to the person to whom it was addressed; that the appellee undertook and agreed to transmit and deliver said message promptly; that the appellee acted in bad faith and with partiality and discrimination, in that it did not transmit and deliver said message in the order of time in which it was received, but willfully and purposely postponed the transmission of said message out of its order for more than twenty days; that after the transmission of said message from the appellee's office in Jamestown, the appellee acted in bad faith, partiality and discrimination in this, that it willfully and purposely postponed the delivery of said message out of the order of time in which it was received, and did not deliver the same for more than twenty days after it was so received, and never did deliver it until called for by the said Clements, at the appellee's office in said City of Crawfordsville; that during all the time said message lay in the appellee's office in Crawfordsville, the appellee transmitted messages for sundry and divers other persons, and knowingly, purposely and willfully gave preference to others and to the delivery of messages to others; that the said messages so transmitted to the said sundry and divers persons did not contain intelligence of general or public interest, and were not communications for or from officers of justice; that the said Clements then had business rooms rented in said City of Crawfordsville, and was preparing to go into business only a few doors from appellee's office; that he had a post-office box rented in the postoffice of said city through which he received his mail during the time the said message lay in the appellee's said office (the said postoffice being but a few doors therefrom); that the said Clements was well known to the postmaster and the employés in said postoffice; that it was the appellee's custom to deliver messages promptly anywhere within five miles of said city, payment of charges being first guaranteed.

Then follows a demand for $100, the statutory penalty, which it is claimed the appellant is entitled to recover.

The second paragraph rests upon a breach of duty because of a failure to deliver the message. It is averred that when the contract was made to send and deliver the message with the appellee, the appellant's wife was dangerously ill, in fact at the point of death; that the said A. S. Clements, to whom the telegram was sent, was a brother-in-law of this appellant, having married his sister, and that the families were on the most intimate terms of friendship; that appellant greatly desired the prompt delivery of said message, and relied on and expected that the same would be promptly transmitted and delivered in accordance with the agreement stated; that the appellee and its agents were fully informed of said facts, and well knew the importance of the immediate delivery at the time it received the message and the said guarantee.

It is averred that the said Clements resided during said time not less than one nor more than two miles from said City of Crawfordsville; received his mail at the postoffice in said city, and had a box in said office through which he received his mail; that he had resided in and within said city for several years before said date, and was well known in said city; that he had then arranged to engage in business there; that the wife of the appellant died in a few days after the said message was transmitted; that if said message had been promptly delivered, the said Clements and wife would have been present during the last sickness of appellant's wife, and in time to have conversed with her before her death, and been present until her death and burial; that by reason of their absence and of the great desire the appellant's wife had expressed to see them before her death, the appellant suffered great uneasiness, anguish and anxiety of mind.

The court at first overruled a demurrer to each of the paragraphs, and the appellee filed an answer in three paragraphs, the first of which was a general denial. The second paragraph applied to the first paragraph of the complaint, and the third paragraph to the second paragraph of the complaint.

The court having afterwards sustained the demurrer to the first paragraph of the complaint, this carried out of the record the second paragraph of answer.

The appellant demurred to the third paragraph of answer, which the court overruled, and he saved an exception; he then filed a reply in general denial. The issues joined were submitted to the court without a jury, and, after hearing the evidence, a finding was made for the appellant, assessing his damages at fifty cents. The appellee then moved for a judgment against the plaintiff for costs; this motion was sustained, to which ruling the appellant reserved an exception. The court then rendered a judgment against the appellee for fifty cents, and against the appellant for costs.

At the time the court reversed its ruling, and sustained the demurrer to the first paragraph of the complaint, the appellant saved an exception.

The errors assigned are that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the first paragraph of the complaint, in overruling the demurrer to the third paragraph of answer, and in sustaining the motion of the appellee for a judgment against the appellant for costs.

There is not much to be said in reference to the demurrer to the first paragraph of the complaint. We are of the opinion that the averments in the said paragraph did not make a case within §§ 1179 and 1172, Elliott's Supplement (Acts 1885), when construed with § 4178, Rev. Stat. 1881, and the three sections must be construed together.

It is claimed that the Act of 1885 repealed by implication said section 4178. We do not think so. The repealing clause only repeals such laws as are in conflict with the said Act. In its scope it does not cover the subject matter to which said section 4178 relates. There is nothing in the Act of 1885 regulating the distance or prescribing the limits within which telegraph companies shall deliver messages. Repeals by implication are not favored, and if a reasonable construction can be found which will enable both the old and the new laws to stand, that construction will be applied. Bush v. Hamilton Co. Comrs. (Ind.) 23 N. E. Rep. 275.

It is not alleged that the person to whom the telegram was addressed resided in or within one-mile of the City of Crawfordsville.

Penal statutes are to have a strict construction, and to recover a penalty the facts stated in the pleading must clearly show a right to the penalty claimed, notwithstanding such strict construction. Hadley v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 115 Ind. 191.

The third paragraph of the answer was pleaded as a partial answer, but it was in bar of all damages except nominal damages. This paragraph, in substance, is that the appellee was not informed, when it undertook to send the message (by what appeared in the face of it or otherwise), that the appellant would suffer pecuniary loss or be damaged because of mental suffering in case of a failure to deliver the message.

We think the answer was bad, and that the demurrer should have been sustained. The second paragraph of complaint showed a good cause of action, and the court so held. Under it the appellant was entitled to more than nominal damages, and more than the sum of 50 cents, which the court allowed.

If the facts alleged in the complaint were true, the appellant was entitled to substantial damages, and the facts set up in the answer did not avoid the appellant's right to recover substantial damages under the allegations of the second paragraph of the complaint.

The message was one of more than ordinary importance. Of its important character the agents of the Company at Jamestown and Crawfordsville had knowledge, for the reason that this information appeared on the face of the telegram. It was a message which denoted urgency for its delivery to the person to whom addressed, and of this fact the appellee had notice, and contracted with reference to it. It therefore became the duty of the appellee to make a prompt and reasonable effort to deliver the message to the person to whom it was addressed, and especially so, as the expense of delivery was guaranteed in advance. This obligation the appellee wholly and entirely failed to perform, and in such failure was guilty of negligence.

Although the telegram had no relation to any business transaction which would have involved dollars and cents merely, this did not justify the appellee in neglecting its duty. It had undertaken, for a valuable consideration, to deliver the message promptly, and its failure so to do, or to make reasonable effort in that direction, was negligence and a violation of its undertaking.

The diligence which a telegraph company is required to use in the delivery of a message will be determined, to some extent, from the character and importance of the message. Upon humane grounds messages like the one here involved should be promptly delivered, and should be regarded as of more importance to the parties concerned than mere business messages, and in promptness of delivery should have preference over messages of the latter class. It is true there was nothing in the telegram to indicate the kinship that existed between the appellant and the person to whom the message was addressed, nor did it request the presence of Mr. Clements or his wife at the bedside of the dangerously sick sister-in-law, but this affords no excuse to the appellee for its failure to deliver the telegram. The appellee was bound to know that the message pertained in some way to the serious illness of the appellant's wife, and, therefore, that prompt communication with the person to whom the message was addressed was much desired, and especially so in view of the additional fact that the appellant undertook to communicate by a telegraphic dispatch.

From the information it had before it when it entered into the undertaking the appellee was bound to know that mental anguish might and most probably would come to some person in case it failed to act promptly in transmitting and delivering the dispatch, and therefore such a result was contemplated when the message was delivered by the appellant to the appellee's agent at Jamestown, and is within the undertaking.

Whether such mental suffering would be caused by the failure of a brother-in-law and his wife to go at once to the bedside of a dying sister-in-law, or from the failure of a physician to reach his patient while there was still hope that something might be done to bring relief and possibly a restoration of health, or for some other cause, is unimportant. It was not the particular cause but the effect which might be produced, that was contemplated by the parties, and which is to be looked to in determining the question of liability.

In W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Sheffield, 71 Tex. 570, a telegram was delivered to the company's operator to be forwarded, in the following language: "You had better come and attend to your business at once."

The court said that the message indicated with reasonable certainty to the telegraph operator the following facts:

1. That the plaintiffs had a claim of some pecuniary nature.
2. That the claim should be attended to at Jefferson, from whence the telegram was sent.
3. That the matter was urgent "at once."
4. Loss would probably follow the want of such attention which might be prevented by obeying the call made in the dispatch.

This was sufficient to disclose that the object was to enable the plaintiffs to attend to a claim due them, and that loss might result from a failure to transmit the message with promptness.

In Hadley v. W. U. Teleg. Co., 115 Ind. 200, the court said, by Niblack, J., with reference to the following telegram:

North Salem, Ind. Oct. 14, 1886.

To Henry Hadley, Danville, Indiana.

Want your cattle in the morning; meet me at your pasture.

S. C. Clay.

"In this case the terms or contents of the dispatch sent by Clay to Hadley fairly indicated the necessity of its prompt delivery, as well as a transmission, and were such as to authorize the inference that a delay until the day following would result in confusion and possible, if not probable, injury to one or both parties to the dispatch."

In Manville v. W. U. Teleg. Co., 87 Iowa, 214, Miller, J., said: "The message was 'Ship your hogs at once.' The obvious reason of this is evident on its face. It clearly imports that to meet a good market the hogs must be shipped promptly, and that by delay a good market will be lost. It is equivalent to saying, 'If you ship at once you will obtain gains on the purchase and sale of your hogs. If you delay these gains will be lost by the market price declining.' It is most obvious, therefore, that the parties contemplated this very thing."

As we have already said, the message clearly indicated its importance and the urgency for its prompt delivery. There were no pecuniary benefits contemplated as the result of the telegram, as it had no reference to any business transaction, and therefore pecuniary loss because of its non-delivery was not within the appellee's undertaking. But the appellant having suffered great mental anguish because, as he alleges, of the failure to promptly deliver the message, it would be a harsh rule which would deny to him all redress except the mere pittance which he paid to have the telegram transmitted and delivered.

Some of the authorities seek to draw a distinction as to the right to recover damages for mental suffering between cases where there may be a recovery for pecuniary loss and cases where there is or can be no pecuniary loss, to which class the present action belongs. With this distinction we have no sympathy, and confess we can see no good reason for it to rest upon. If a telegraph company undertakes to transmit and deliver promptly a message wherein dollars and cents are alone involved, and its negligence occasions loss, it is conceded by all the authorities that it may be compelled to respond in damages. Why? Because it has negligently broken its agreement, or, as is sometimes said, failed to perform a duty which it owed to the sender of the message or the person to whom it is addressed, as the case may be. For the same pecuniary consideration it undertakes to transmit and deliver a message informing a husband of the dangerous illness of his wife, the wife of her husband, the parent of the child, the child of the parent, and it negligently fails to deliver the telegram, and as the result the sick relation dies without having the comforting presence of the husband, wife, father, mother, son or daughter, with all the benefit, physical and mental, which would follow. Is it to be said that under such circumstances the most that the telegraph company is liable for is nominal damages because of great mental anguish suffered by the sender of the telegram, who may be the father, mother, husband, wife or child? In our judgment, no such rule can or should prevail. In failing to promptly deliver a telegram the telegraph company negligently fails to perform a duty which it owes to the sender of the telegram, and should be held liable for whatever injury follows as the proximate result of its negligent conduct.

It is not a mere breach of contract, but a failure to perform a duty which rests upon it as a servant of the public.

In our opinion, upon the fact stated in the second paragraph of complaint, the appellant is entitled to recover damages for the mental suffering which he endured, and his measure of damages is the amount paid for the transmission of the message, and, in addition, what would seem to be just as a compensation for his mental anguish.

We have examined the case of W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Hamilton, 50 Ind. 181. That was an action to recover a statutory penalty, and what is said as to the measure of damages in an action like the one under consideration is mere dicta, as no such question was before the court. See W. U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 507, 1 L. R. A. 728, 10 Am. St. Rep. 772, and note; Wadsworth v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695, 6 Am. St. Rep. 864, and note; Beasley v. W. U. Teleg. Co. 89 Fed. Rep. 188.

Judgment reversed, with costs. Court below directed to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

TERRE HAUTE & INDIANAPOLIS R. CO., Appt.,
v.

Alfred CLEM.

(....Ind.....)

1. The presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company, which prevails in case of an injury to its passenger, does not obtain in case of injuries to the horse of a traveler upon a highway, which are received while the traveler is attempting to cross the railroad track.
2. A railroad company is not required to use extraordinary care or vigilance in respect to the safety of its highway crossings.
3. Permitting incompetent evidence tending to support a finding to go to the jury over objection will cause a reversal of the judgment, where the other evidence in support of such finding is not of a satisfactory character.
4. Evidence of repairs made after an injury has been sustained is incompetent to show antecedent negligence.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Carroll County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for injuries to a horse, alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. John G. Williams and S. O. Bayless, with Messrs. W. H. Russell and F. F. Moore, for appellant:

The court erred in allowing appellee to prove that long after the accident and after this case had once been tried, the appellant had rebuilt the crossing in question and put down planks with square edges next the rail.

Elliot, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee recovered a judgment for damages for an injury to a horse which he was driving. The theory of the appellee is that the appellant was negligent in constructing a crossing at a point where its railroad crossed a public road, and that the injury to his horse was caused by the appellant's negligent breach of duty.

It is quite well settled that it is the duty of a railroad corporation to so construct and maintain its crossings that they may be safely used by persons traveling the highway, and that, for a negligent breach of this duty, it must answer in damages to one who exercises ordinary care and sustains an injury from the breach of duty by the company. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Crist, 116 Ind. 446; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Carpenter, 118 Ind. 51; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stout, 53 Ind. 143.

The appellee's counsel are in error in assuming that the same rule applies to actions for the recovery of injuries received at a crossing that applies in cases where passengers are injured while on the trains of the carrier. The presumption of negligence which prevails in such cases does not obtain in such a case as this; and the cases of Verelund, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Newell, 104 Ind. 284, and Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 847, are not in point.

The evidence upon the question of negligence in this instance is not of that satisfactory character which authorizes us to declare that the judgment should be affirmed although incompetent evidence was admitted. If, therefore, we find that incompetent evidence was permitted to go to the jury over the objection of the defendant, we must reverse the judgment.

The appellee was permitted to prove that after the accident occurred the appellant changed and repaired the crossing. This was error. Evidence of repairs made after an injury has been sustained is incompetent to show antecedent negligence.

This question was carefully considered by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 80 Minn. 465, and three of the earlier decisions of that court were overruled. In the course of the opinion in that case it was said: "But, on mature reflection, we have concluded that evidence of this kind ought not to be admitted under any circumstances and that the rule heretofore adopted by this court on principle is wrong, not for the reason given by some of the courts that the acts of the employees in making such repairs are not admissible against their principals, but upon the broader ground that such acts afford no legitimate basis for construing such an act as an admission of a previous neglect of duty. A person may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, in the light of the new experience, after an unexpected accident has occurred, and as a measure of extreme caution, he may adopt additional safeguards. The more careful a person is, the more regard he has for the lives of others, the more likely he would be to do so, and it would seem to be unjust that he could not do so without being liable to have such acts construed as an admission of prior negligence. We think such a rule puts an unfair interpretation upon human conduct, and virtually holds out an inducement for continued negligence."

The authorities are collected and discussed in the case of Malley v. Hartford Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 524, and it was there said: "The fact that an accident has happened and a person has been injured immediately puts a person on a higher plane of diligence and duty from which he acts with a view of preventing the possibility of a similar accident, which should operate to commend rather than condemn the person so acting. If the subsequent act is made to reflect back upon the prior one, although it is done upon the theory that it is a mere admission, yet it virtually introduces into the transaction a new element and test of negligence which has no business there, not being in existence at the time."

The question received consideration in the very recent case of Hodges v. Percival (Ill.) 23 N. E. Rep. 423, and in the course of the discussion the court said: "The happening of an accident may inspire a party with greater diligence to prevent a repetition of a similar occurrence, but the exercise of such increased diligence ought not, necessarily, to be regarded as tantamount to a confession of past neglect."

The rule asserted in the cases from which we have quoted is declared in many other cases. Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co. 56 N. Y. 1; Baird v. Daly, 68 N. Y. 547; Dale v. Delaware L. & W. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 471; Salter v. Delaware & E. Canal Co. 3 Hun, 838; Payne v. Troy & B. R. Co. 9 Hun, 526; Cramer v. Burlington, 45 Iowa, 627; Hudson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 581; Ely v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 84.

The rule stated and enforced in the cases referred to is the only one that can be defended on principle. To declare the evidence competent is to offer an inducement to omit the use of such care as the new information may suggest, and to deter persons from doing what the new experience informs them may be done to prevent the possibility of future accidents. The effect of declaring such evidence competent is to inform a defendant that if he makes changes or repairs he does it under penalty, for, if the evidence is competent, it operates as a confession that he was guilty of a prior wrong. If it is competent, then it would be the duty of the court to charge the jury that they must regard the making of subsequent repairs as evidence of antecedent negligence, and this, certainly, would violate settled principles, for it is what occurs prior to the action, and not what happens afterwards, that determines whether there has or has not been a culpable breach of duty. If, for example, the owner of a mill or factory repairs or improves after an accident has happened, so as to prevent the possibility of future accidents, the just inference is, not that he was previously guilty of negligence, but that, prompted by humane motives and influenced by the new information supplied by the fact that an accident has happened, he has exerted extraordinary care and taken such precautionary measures as render it impossible that anyone should be injured in the future. It is unjustly reversing the presumption to hold that such an owner improves or repairs because he was at some time anterior to the time of making the improvements or repairs guilty of an actionable wrong. True policy and sound reason require that men should be encouraged to improve or repair, and not be deterred from it by the fear that if they do so, their acts will be construed into an admission that they had been wrong-doers. A rule which so operates as to deter men from profiting by experience and availing themselves of new information has nothing to commend it, for it is neither expedient nor just.

Accidents do happen despite the utmost care and diligence, but, with very rare exceptions, the happening of an accident does not of itself supply grounds for inferring negligence. It is common knowledge that accidents occur which even the highest degree of care can neither anticipate nor prevent; but in cases where an extraordinary accident happens which ordinary prudence could not have foreseen or anticipated, neither a natural nor an artificial person is liable for a failure to exercise extraordinary care. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke, 112 Ind. 404.

The law does not, as a general rule, require anyone to exercise extraordinary care or vigilance. The question in this case, and in all others like it, is whether the defendant prior to the accident used due care; and whether due care was or was not used must be determined by the precedent facts and attendant circumstances, not from what subsequently occurs. If a person does all that is reasonable under the facts as they exist and are known at the time of the injury, or at some antecedent time, he is not a wrong-doer, for no one is bound to anticipate and provide against unusual and unexpected accidents.

In Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 186, it was said: "The test is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated, not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which arise." Events may cast their shadows before so as to render an act wrong, but they cannot cast them backward over an act not wrong when it was performed, and make it a tortious one.

The fact that the happening of an accident may convey information producing a conviction or belief that had extraordinary precaution been taken the injury would have been prevented does not legitimately tend to prove that ordinary care and vigilance were not exercised. All may be done that ordinary care requires, and yet a person satisfied by experience that a higher degree of care may insure absolute safety may employ extraordinary means to prevent accidents in the future. In doing this he does what is commendable, and, certainly, he ought not to be restrained or checked by the fear that if he does resort to unusual means to insure safety, he may be treated as one who confesses that he was a wrong-doer when the accident occurred. It is unjustly burdening one who, influenced by the light supplied by events, resorts to greater precautions to insure the safety of others.

The incidental remark made in the case of Goshen v. England, 119 Ind. 868, cannot be considered as an authoritative affirmation of the right to adduce evidence of subsequent repairs to prove precedent negligence.

Messrs. George W. Funk and Dudley H. Chase for appellee.

Mitchell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The special finding of the court shows that James McCloskey, late of Cass County, died in the year 1870, leaving a widow and children. He was indebted to the appellant, Dick, in an amount exceeding $500, for which sum the latter held two notes, which remained unpaid at the time McCloskey died. Subsequently Rebecca McCloskey, widow of the decedent, no administrator having been appointed, paid $175 on the indebtedness, and, at the request of the appellant, and to prevent the latter from enforcing payment from the estate, executed her note, in which she agreed to pay the amount remaining unpaid, with an enhanced rate of interest, and also executed a mortgage on real estate as security for the debt. Nothing was said at the time about taking the note of Mrs. McCloskey in payment of the debt due from the estate, but the old notes were surrendered up to her; and subsequently judgment was taken against her for the amount of the note and interest, and a decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage. Mrs. McCloskey afterwards died, leaving the judgment unpaid; and the old notes, which the appellant surrendered up to her, were found in her possession, with the name of the payor torn off. The appellant instituted this proceeding against the estate of James McCloskey to recover the amount remaining unpaid on the original debt. Upon the facts found the court stated conclusions of law adverse to the appellant.

It is undoubtedly true that taking the note of a third person for a pre-existing debt is no payment, in the absence of an express agreement that it shall be taken as payment. Godfrey v. Orsler (Ind.) 22 N. E. Rep. 999 (present term); Bristol Mill & Mfg. Co. v. Probasco, 64 Ind. 406.

The books all agree that there must be a clear and special agreement that the creditor shall take the paper absolutely as payment, or it will be no payment if it afterwards turns out to be of no value. Johnson v. Weed, 9 Johns. 311; Ontario Bank v. Lightbody, 13 Wend. 103.

These principles are not, however, controlling in the present case. There is nothing in the special finding, nor in the evidence, to indicate that the note taken was worthless. After taking the note, the appellant elected to pursue his remedy upon the new securities which he had taken. He recovered a judgment upon the note, and foreclosed the mortgage which he took as security; and it does not appear but that his security was ample and abundant. Where the note of a third person is taken for a pre-existing debt, which is surrendered up, and the holder of the note thus taken elects to sue, and merge the note into a judgment, he will be estopped to say that he did not take the new note in substitution for, and in extinguishment of, the old debt, especially while the judgment so taken remains, so far as appears, a valid, enforceable security. After one has taken a second or substituted note, and surrendered up the original, and has cut off all defenses to the note so taken, either by transferring it to an innocent holder, or by himself putting it into a judgment, he will be estopped from taking another judgment against the original debtor on the obligation theretofore surrendered up. Hooker v. Hubbard, 97 Mass. 175; Dewey v. Bell, 5 Allen, 165; Bigelow, Estop. 5th ed. 681.

Where a new note and mortgage are taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, the new securities, in the absence of an express agreement, will not extinguish the prior debt, but if the new securities are merged into a general judgment the legal effect is to merge the original debt, and all prior securities, into the judgment, which becomes the higher security; and unless it is necessary, in order to preserve some superior equity, the original security cannot be resorted to as a cause of action. Cisna v. Huines, 18 Ind. 496; Ault v. Zehring, 38 Ind. 429. Brown v. Darrah, 95 Ind. 86; Ward v. Haugard, 75 Ind. 381.

If the appellant had been permitted to establish his claim against the estate of James McCloskey, he would have had two valid, enforceable judgments for the same debt, against two different estates. This cannot be done without showing some valid legal or equitable ground for it. There was no error.

The agreement of one who signs articles of association for the formation of a corporation to take stock therein does not become enforceable until he has acknowledged the articles as required by § 3851, Rev. Stat.

(April 12, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of defendant in an action to recover the amount due upon an alleged stock subscription. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Kennedy & Kennedy and Ristine & Ristine for appellant.

Messrs. Wright & Sellar for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant sues as the receiver of an insolvent corporation, and seeks to recover a subscription which he alleges the appellee made to the capital stock of the corporation. It is alleged that the appellee, with others, signed articles of association and that he agreed to take two shares of the capital stock, and pay therefor $100.

The introductory clause of the articles of association reads thus: "We, the undersigned, agree to take the stock in the amount set opposite our names, in a company to be organized for manufacturing and selling the Williamson Straw Stacker." There were eighty-three signers and seven of them acknowledged the execution of the articles of association before a notary public and the instrument was duly recorded. It is also alleged that $8,000 of stock was subscribed; that the company was duly organized and board of directors elected.

There can be no doubt, under the authorities, that a valid subscription to the capital stock of a corporation may be made by signing the preliminary articles. Such a subscription becomes enforceable upon the perfection of the corporate organization according to law, under the articles of association. Miller v. Wild Cat Gravel Road Co. 52 Ind. 51; Multon v. Clayton, 54 Iowa, 425; Phoenix Warehousing Co. v. Budger, 67 N. Y. 294; Cravens v. Eagle Cotton Mills Co. 120 Ind. 6.

If the promise of the appellee is not binding it must be for some other reason than that it was made before the organization of the corporation was fully effected.

The Statute requires that the persons who desire to organize a corporation shall "make, sign and acknowledge before some officer capable to take acknowledgment of deeds, a certificate in writing," setting forth therein certain enumerated things. Rev. Stat. § 8851.

The contention of the appellee is that the promise is not effective because the complaint shows that only seven of the eighty-three signers acknowledged the certificate. It seems quite clear under the decision of this court in Indianapolis Furnace & Min. Co. v. Herkimer, 46 Ind. 142, that the mere signing of the paper was not sufficient to complete the obligation, and that, in order to make valid and effective articles of association against all who sign, all must acknowledge them as the Statute requires. Here it affirmatively appears that seven only of the signers acknowledged the execution of the instrument, and it cannot be inferred that those who did not acknowledge it remained bound by its terms. As to them, the instrument was incomplete, and it is quite well settled that an incomplete subscription cannot be enforced. Dutchess & C. O. R. Co. v. Mabbett, 58 N. Y. 397; Reed v. Richmond Street R. Co. 50 Ind. 842; Richmond Street R. Co. v. Reed, 83 Ind. 9; Williamson v. Kokomo Bldg. & L. F. Assn. 89 Ind. 389.

It is, however, argued by appellant's counsel that the complaint does affirmatively show that the corporation was organized, but this does not meet the question, for it may well be that it was organized with the appellee as a stockholder. The fact that he did not acknowledge the instrument as the law requires, implies that he did not become a stockholder, and there is nothing in the complaint which rebuts or opposes this implication. It devolved upon the plaintiff to remove the inference if he could. As the appellee did not acknowledge the instrument as the law requires, he did not become a stockholder, and if he were insisting that he was entitled to the number of shares set opposite his name, it is quite clear that the corporation might successfully resist his claim; since it is obvious that only those who acknowledged the articles of association as the law requires can successfully insist upon their right to stock. If the appellee cannot be regarded as a stockholder, then it seems quite clear that he did not bind himself by simply signing the articles of association.

Whether a good complaint can be framed is not the question before us, for the only question presented by the record is as to the sufficiency of the complaint as it is written.

NOTE.—Creation of corporation.

The mere signing of articles of association does not create a corporation. The subscribers must also sign and acknowledge the certificate of incorporation and cause it to be recorded. Indianapolis Furnace & Min. Co. v. Herkimer, 46 Ind. 142.

A corporation has no existence until the date of the filing of its charter; and persons named therein as directors for the first year assume or incur no obligations until it is filed. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Tierman, 37 Kan. 603.

The omission to file with the circuit clerk the certificate of organization of a special company by the holders of the special stock of the company incorporated under a special Act authorizing the same can be taken advantage of by the State alone; and a suit cannot be maintained against a stockholder, as partner, upon a corporate liability of the company. Mo. Gen. Stat. 1865, and Rev. Stat. 1885, chap. 24, § 7, do not apply to such corporation. Granby M. & S. Co. v. Richards, 14 West. Rep. 750, 95 Mo. 103.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

John DANAHER, Admr., etc., of Thomas
P. Danaher, Deceased, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF BROOKLYN, Resp't.

(....N. Y.....)

1. A city is not liable for injuries caused by the drinking of water from free public wells where neither failure on its part to keep the wells properly cleaned out nor notice to it that the water therein had become impure is shown, and there were no circumstances to cause suspicion as to the purity of the water, and a sufficient supply of pure water was furnished from other sources for the use of its inhabitants.
2. A city is not bound to make a chemical examination of the water of free public wells for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it is pure and wholesome where it has no notice that the water is unwholesome and furnishes a public supply of running water in addition to the wells.

(February 25, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of the King's Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have resulted from the use of unwholesome water negligently furnished by defendant. Affirmed. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Franklin M. Danaher and Roger A. Pryor, for appellant:

The City of Brooklyn furnishes drinking water to its inhabitants in its private as distinguished from its public capacity, and is liable for a failure to use its power well or for an injury caused by using it badly, and for negligence, the same as an individual under similar circumstances.

Mr. Almet F. Jenks for respondent.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We entertain no doubt that this well in De Kalb Avenue was a public well, belonging to the defendant, and under its control, and that the water of the well was in August, 1882, unwholesome, and dangerous to the health of such persons as should drink thereof; and we will assume, although we would hold so with some hesitation, that the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by drinking of the water; and yet, we think, the plaintiff was properly nonsuited at the trial. There is no claim that the well or pump was improperly constructed, or out of repair, or that the water became unwholesome from any defect in the well or pump, or from any external exposure which could by any reasonable care have been avoided. It does not appear that the City, or any of its officers, or, in fact, that any person, did anything to render the water impure. Nor does it appear that anything could have been done to purify it, or prevent its impurity. The theory of the plaintiff, as developed upon the trial, was that this well was supplied by water which fell upon the surface of the surrounding earth, and, by percolation through the soil, reached the bottom of the well, and that the water, upon the earth, or in passing through the earth, came in contact with the unclean and deleterious substances which rendered it impure and unwholesome. The water was limpid, cold and agreeable to the taste. Its impurity could not be detected by drinking it, and its dangerous character could only be discerned by a careful chemical analysis. This water was not furnished for a compensation paid for its use, and so there was no contract relation between the City and those who used it. The well was for public, gratuitous use; and hence nothing that was said or intimated in Milnes v. Huddersfield, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 124, and L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 443, has any pertinency here.

The City was not an insurer of the quality of the water, and bound, under all circumstances, to keep it pure and wholesome. This is not claimed. It owned this well as it owned its other property kept for public use, such as streets, parks and public buildings, and owed the duty of reasonable diligence to care for it as it was bound to care for such other property. Its liability for unwholesome water in any of its public wells must rest upon negligence, and hence we are brought to the question, Was there any proof of negligence imputable to the City? It is not claimed that the City had any notice of the unwholesome character of this water prior to the death of plaintiff's intestate; but the claim is that by reasonable diligence it could have had notice, and hence that notice must be imputed to it. This well had existed for many years, and its water had been extensively used by persons in the neighborhood; and there is no proof whatever that prior to the month of August, 1882, it had caused injury to anyone, or that there was the least suspicion by anyone that it was unwholesome.

Several persons were called as witnesses by the plaintiff, who testified that they became sick from drinking the water of this well in the early part of August, 1882. It is inferable from the evidence that the same persons drank the water previously with impunity. The plaintiff had four sons. Three of them drank the water in the early part of August and became very sick, two of them dying. They had previously, for years, drank it without injury. The fourth son drank it down to about the 1st of August, and then, in consequence of his absence from the City, he ceased to drink it; and he did not become sick. The inference therefore is, so far as there is any proof upon which to base it, that the water was wholesome—at least not dangerous, and not so impure as to cause sickness—down to the 1st of August. In view of these facts, it certainly cannot be said that there is any proof that the water was dangerous before the time it is shown to have caused any injury. The plaintiff, claiming that the water of this well had for a long time been impure and dangerous, should have given some proof to maintain his claim; and, if it were well founded, it cannot be doubted that the proof would have been readily obtainable, as many persons must have used the water for many years. So, while there is no proof that, during any considerable time prior to the drinking of this water by the plaintiff's intestate, it had been impure, unwholesome or dangerous, there is no proof that any reasonable diligence on the part of the defendant would have discovered its impure or dangerous quality, if it existed. The plain inference is that there was some cause of contamination which had not long existed. There must have been some unobserved deposit of deleterious matter at some distance from the well, upon or under the surface of the soil, or some new vein opened in the soil, through which impure water, for the first time, percolated into the well in the early part of August. There is no proof or claim that any improper or poisonous substance had been thrown into the well, or that the well was unclean, or needed cleaning out. Assuming that the defendant was bound to make a chemical analysis of the water of its wells from time to time, how often should such analysis be made? It appears that there were 296 wells within the city limits belonging to the City. To analyze the waters of all these wells would take a long time. If the defendant were required to do it even once a quarter, it would probably take the whole time of a single chemist. But, if the chemical analysis of the water of this well had been made in June, or even early in July, there is no proof, and there can be no legal inference, that it would have been found unwholesome; and how, then, can it be said that at the precise time the deceased drank of this water, in August, the City was bound to have discovered and known that it was unwholesome and dangerous? For aught that appears in the case, the City may, from time to time, during previous months or years, have examined and tested the waters of these wells. It appears that the department of public health, about the 1st of June, 1882, ordered the chemist of that department to make an examination of the waters of the wells of the City, and he proceeded with such examination, but did not reach the water of the well in question until the last of August. Here there was a well in perfect order, clean, free from filth and debris, the water of which had been used with impunity and satisfaction by those living in the neighborhood for many years; and no complaint had been made of it, and no suspicion had been raised that it was in any way unwholesome or dangerous. Under such circumstances, what was there to suggest to the City the duty of analyzing and testing this water prior to the 1st day of August, 1882? We find nothing.

We have thus far assumed that the City was bound, from time to time, to make a chemical examination of the waters of the public wells, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were pure and wholesome. But we are of opinion that such assumption is not well founded, and that no such burden rests upon the City. The City has its public water supply by running water in addition to these wells. The wells are furnished and kept for public use by the City. It was undoubtedly the duty of the City to keep the wells and pumps in good order, and to keep the wells properly cleaned out, so they would not become contaminated by anything that might be thrown into them. But these wells were to be supplied by water percolating through the earth; and was the City bound to anticipate that such water would become impure and dangerous in the wells? There was no proof that it was the necessary, or even the natural, consequence that water in city wells, however they may be located, will become poisonous and deleterious. On the contrary, the proof showed that the waters of such wells have been used for years with impunity. These wells were furnished for the accommodation of the public. They were not obliged to use them; and most people have sufficient knowledge to know that their waters may not be as pure as water brought from pure streams, far away from the city limits, and from exposure to contamination. The public may use them; and when they are found unwholesome or deleterious, and the City has notice thereof, it is bound to protect the public health by purifying the waters, or filling up the wells. The burden upon the City is sufficient if it is held to the responsibility of keeping the wells and pumps in order, and clean, and if it is made liable for any injury resulting from the use of impure water from the wells after it has had notice of their dangerous qualities, and an opportunity to remove the danger. The higher degree of diligence as to water apparently pure and wholesome, agreeable to the taste, and in common use by the public without complaint, would be unreasonable.

These views are not in conflict with any of the authorities to which our attention has been called.

In McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 194, it was held that, when the duty was imposed by law upon a public officer or municipal corporation of keeping a structure in repair, it involves the exercise of a reasonable degree of watchfulness in ascertaining the condition of such structure from time to time, and that where this is omitted such officer or corporation is liable for damages resulting from a dilapidation of the structure which is an ordinary result of its use, and which would have been disclosed by an examination, and that no notice of the defect is necessary, in such a case, to fix the liability. There the damage complained of resulted from a defective sewer, and the City was under obligation to use reasonable diligence to keep it in repair; and it could not escape responsibility simply because it had no notice that the sewer was out of repair. Here it was the duty of the City to use reasonable diligence to keep this well and pump in repair, and to guard against any dilapidation or danger resulting from use of the well; but as we have shown, there was no evidence which would justify a finding of culpable negligence as to the well on the part of the City.

In Hunt v. New York, 109 N. Y. 134, 12 Cent. Rep. 60, the plaintiff was injured by an explosion at one of the man-holes of a steam-heating company in one of the streets of the City of New York. He was defeated in his action for damages. Andrews, J., writing the opinion in this court, said: "The language of the cases expressing the measure of duty resting upon municipal corporations in respect to their streets, sewers, etc., has not always been carefully guarded; but the doctrine has been frequently reiterated in this court that there is no absolute guaranty of undertaking on the part of a municipal corporation that its streets or other constructions shall at all times, and under all circumstances, be in a safe and proper condition, and that its obligations and duty extend only to the exercise of reasonable care and vigilance. . . There must be willful misconduct or culpable neglect to create liability."

Here there was no willful misconduct or culpable neglect on the part of the City as to this well. Trees, bridges and other wooden structures will necessarily decay, and become unsafe; and, where they may thus become dangerous to human life, the duty devolves upon the municipality to make tests and examinations, using reasonable diligence to ascertain whether they are safe or not. Vesper v. New York, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. [17 Jones & S.] 298; Howard Co. v. Ledy, 110 Ind. 479, 9 West. Rep. 212; Jones v. New Haven, 84 Conn. 18; Norristown v. Moyer, 67 Pa. 355.

But this case is not analogous to those. Here there is no proof justifying the inference that the water of this well was constantly and inevitably exposed to impurities which would render it dangerous to human life. On the contrary, the evidence shows that up to about the 1st of August its waters were wholesome, and free from dangerous impurities. This is not like the cases where a city creates or permits a nuisance, or turns a stream of mud or water upon the premises of private individuals. In such cases it is held responsible for the nuisance which it creates or permits, and for its wrongful acts. People v. Albany, 11 Wend. 539; Nevins v. Peoria, 41 Ill. 502; Shawneetown v. Mason, 82 Ill. 337.

There was no proof in this case that the City in any way polluted or poisoned the water of this well, or permitted others to do so; and hence the cases of Rez v. Medley, 6 Car. & P. 292; Goldsmid v. Tunbridge Wells Imp. Comrs. L. R. 1 Eq. 161; Charles v. Finchley Local Board, 48 L. T. N. S. 569; Brown v. Illius, 27 Conn. 84; Ballard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 115, —are not in point.

Without commenting upon or referring to other authorities found in the interesting and learned brief submitted on behalf of the appellant, it is sufficient to say that we have examined and considered all of them, and that we are not able to bring ourselves to the conclusion that there is any principle of law which, upon the facts appearing upon this case, imposes any liability upon the defendant for the damages claimed.

The judgment of the General Term should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

GOSHEN NATIONAL BANK, Appt.

1. The purchaser of a check, made payable to the drawer's own order, the certification of which has been procured by fraud, who by mistake of both himself and the payee takes it without the latter's indorsement, holds it subject to all defenses which the bank would have against it in the hands of the payee, even although he pays full value for it without notice of the fraud; and a subsequent indorsement made after the purchaser has received such notice will not render the check valid in his hands, at least in the absence of an express agreement to indorse made at the time of the transfer.

A check is an appropriation or assignment of the specific money called for in the check. Stoller v. Coates, 4 West. Rep. 602, 88 Mo. 514.

It is the essential characteristic of a check that it is payable on demand. Harrison v. Nicollet Nat. Bank (Minn.) 5 L. R. A. 744.

Whether or not a check or draft on a bank be an equitable assignment of the fund, it cannot bind the fund in the hands of the bank until notice of the check or draft is given by presentation for payment or otherwise. Laclede Bank v. Schuler, 120 U. S. 511 (30 L. ed. 704).

Until then other checks drawn afterward may be paid, or other assignments of the fund or part of it may secure priority by giving prior notice. Ibid.

It may be revoked by the drawer before presentment (Kuhn v. Warren Sav. Bank (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 620, 20 W. N. C. 230), unless the bank on which it is drawn has accepted or certified it, or otherwise committed itself to its payment. Kahn v. Walton, 46 Ohio St. 195.

Statement by Parker, J.:

Appeals from judgments rendered by the General Term of the Supreme Court of the First Department, affirming judgments entered upon the reports of a referee.

On November 27, 1884, Benjamin D. Brown applied to the cashier of the Goshen National Bank, at Goshen, N. Y., to cash a sight draft for $17,000, drawn by him upon the firm of William Bingham & Co. of New York, accompanied by a quantity of the bonds of the West Point Manufacturing Company, of the face value of $17,000. Brown represented that he had negotiated a sale of these bonds at their face value with William Bingham & Co.; that they had directed him to draw upon them at sight for $17,000, the draft to be accompanied by the bonds, and that the draft would be paid upon presentation. Such representations were absolutely false. The bonds had no market value. Brown was a bankrupt, and had no funds in the Bank, except such as resulted from the credit given him upon the faith of the draft on Bingham & Co., accompanied by the bonds. The cashier of the Goshen National Bank, relying upon such representations, cashed the draft of $17,000, and placed the proceeds to the credit of Brown, upon the books of the Bank. He gave Brown sight drafts on New York for $12,000, and certified a check drawn by Brown to his own order, dated November 28, 1884, for $5,000. On the morning of November 28, Brown called at the office of William Bingham & Co., and stated that he wanted to get some currency. Mr. Bingham passed the check to the firm's cashier, directing him to give Brown currency for the amount. The cashier gave him a check drawn on the Corn Exchange Bank for $5,000. Brown had the check cashed at the Corn Exchange Bank. He also had the New York drafts cashed, amounting to $12,000, which he had obtained from the Goshen National Bank. After procuring the checks and drafts to be cashed, he fled to Canada, where he remained at the time of the trial of these actions. When Bingham & Co. took from Brown the check certified by the Goshen National Bank, it was not indorsed. The referee found that, "at the time of the transfer of the said certified check by Brown to the plaintiffs, it was intended both by Brown and the plaintiffs that said certified check should be indorsed by Brown, and it was supposed by both parties that he had so indorsed it; and if the plaintiffs had known that it was not indorsed, they would not have paid the consideration therefor." He further found "that Brown made no statement to the defendants, or either of them, at the time of the transfer of the check, . . . that such check was indorsed;" and "prior to the commencement of the action of replevin, the defendants never requested Brown to indorse said check." While Bingham & Co. held the check in question unindorsed, a demand for its return to the Bank, accompanied by a full explanation of the circumstances under which the certification was obtained, was made upon Bingham & Co. in behalf of the Bank; and, upon their refusal to return it, an action to recover its possession without notice. Lagonda Nat. Bank v. Portner, 21 Ohio L. J. 383.

The negotiability of a check is not affected by the fact that it is payable "in current funds." Bull v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

This was refused, and thereupon the action secondly above entitled was commenced by Bingham & Co. to recover the amount of the check.

Freund v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 76 N. Y. 352.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As against Brown, to whose order the check was payable, the Bank had a good defense. But it could not defeat a recovery by a bona fide holder, to whom the check had been indorsed for value. By an oversight on the part of both Brown and Bingham & Co., the check was accepted and cashed without the indorsement of the payee. Before the authority to indorse the name of the payee upon the check was procured, and its subsequent indorsement thereon, Bingham & Co. had notice of the fraud, which constituted a defense for the Bank as against Brown. Can the recovery had be sustained? It is too well settled by authority, both in England and in this country, to permit of questioning, that the purchaser of a draft or check who obtains title without an indorsement by the payee holds it subject to all equities and defenses existing between the original parties, even though he has paid full consideration, without notice of the existence of such equities and defenses. Harrop v. Fisher, 80 L. J. N. S. (C. P.) 283; Whistler v. Forster, 14 C. B. N. S. 244; Savage v. King, 17 Me. 301; Clark v. Callison, 7 Ill. App. 263; Haskell v. Mitchell, 53 Me. 463; *Clark v. S. 68 (25 L. ed. 876); Osgood v. Artt, 17 Fed. Rep. 575.

The reasoning on which this doctrine is founded may be briefly stated as follows: The general rule is that no one can transfer a better title than he possesses. An exception arises out of the rule of the law-merchant as to negotiable instruments. It is founded on the commercial policy of sustaining the credit of commercial paper. Being treated as currency in commercial transactions, such instruments are subject to the same rule as money. If transferred by indorsement, for value, in good faith and before maturity; they become available in the hands of the holder, notwithstanding the existence of equities and defenses which would have rendered them unavailable in the hands of a prior holder. This rule is only applicable to negotiable instruments which are negotiable according to the law-merchant. When, as in this case, such an instrument is transferred, but without an indorsement, it is treated as a chose in action assigned to the purchaser. The assignee acquires all the title of the assignor, and may maintain an action thereon in his own name; and, like other choses in action, it is subject to all the equities and defenses existing in favor of the maker or acceptor against the previous holder. Prior to the indorsement of this check, therefore, Bingham & Co. were subject to the defense existing in favor of the Bank as against Brown and the payee. Evidence of an intention on the part of the transferee to indorse does not aid the plaintiff. It is the act of indorsement, not the intention, which negotiates the instrument; and it cannot be said that the intent constitutes the act.

The effect of the indorsement made after notice to Bingham & Co. of the Bank's defense must now be considered. Did it relate back to the time of the transfer, so as to constitute the plaintiffs holders by indorsement as of that time? While the referee finds that it was intended both by Brown and the plaintiff that the check should be indorsed, and it was supposed that he had so indorsed it, he also finds that Brown made no statement to the effect that the check was indorsed; neither did the defendants request Brown to indorse it. There was therefore no agreement to indorse. Nothing whatever was said upon the subject. Before Brown did agree to indorse, the plaintiff had notice of the Bank's defense. Indeed, it had commenced an action to recover possession of the check. It would seem, therefore, that, having taken title by assignment,—for such was the legal effect of the transaction, by reason of which the defense of the Bank against Brown became effectual as a defense against a recovery on the check in the hands of the plaintiffs as well,—Brown and Bingham & Co. could not by any subsequent agreement or act so change the legal character of the transfer as to affect the equities and rights which had accrued to the Bank; that the subsequent act of indorsement could not relate back so as to destroy the intervening rights and remedies of a third party. This position is supported by authority. Harrop v. Fisher, Whistler v. Forster, Savage v. King, Haskell v. Mitchell, Clark v. Whitaker, Clark v. Callison, Lancaster Nat. Bank v. Taylor, Gilbert v. Sharp, cited supra. Watkins v. Maule, 2 Jac. & W. 243, and Hughes v. Nelson, 29 N. J. Eq. 547, are cited by the plaintiff in opposition to the view we have expressed.

In Watkins v. Maule the holder of a note obtained without indorsement collected it from the makers. Subsequently the makers complained that the note was only given as a guaranty to the payee, who had become bankrupt. Thereupon the holder refunded the money and took up the note, upon the express agreement that the makers would pay any amount which the holders should fail to make out of the bankrupt payee's property. The makers were held liable for the deficiency.

Hughes v. Nelson did not involve the precise question here presented. The views expressed, however, are in conflict with some of the cases cited; but we regard it, in such respect, as against the weight of authority.

Freund v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, supra, does not aid the plaintiff. In that case it was held that the certification by the bank of a check in the hands of a holder who had purchased it for value from the payee, but which had not been indorsed by him, rendered the bank liable to such holder for the amount thereof. By accepting the check the bank took, as it had the right to do, the risk of the title which the holder claimed to have acquired from the payee. In such case the bank enters into contract with the holder by which it accepts the check and promises to pay it to the holder, notwithstanding it lacks the indorsement provided for; and it was accordingly held that it was liable upon such acceptance, upon the same principles that control the liabilities of other acceptors of commercial paper. Lynch v. First Nat. Bank, 107 N. Y. 183, 9 Cent. Rep. 564.

But one question remains. The learned referee held, and in that respect he was sustained by the general term, that the Bank by its certification represented to everyone that Brown had on deposit with it $5,000; that such amount had been set apart for the satisfaction of the check, and that it should be so applied whenever the check should be presented for payment; and that, Bingham & Co. having acted upon the faith of these representations, and having parted with $5,000 on the strength thereof, the Bank is estopped from asserting its defense. The referee omitted an important feature of the contract of certification. The Bank did certify that it had the money, would retain it and apply it in payment, provided the check should be indorsed by the payee. Lynch v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

If the check had been transferred to plaintiffs by indorsement, the defendant would have had no defense, not because of the doctrine of estoppel, but upon principles especially applicable to negotiable instruments. Mechanics Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 639.

If the maker or acceptor could ever be held to be estopped by reason of representations contained in a negotiable instrument, he certainly could not be in the absence of a compliance with the provisions upon which he had represented that his liability should depend. But it is well settled that the maker or acceptor of a negotiable instrument is not estopped from contesting its validity because of representations contained in the instrument. In such cases an estoppel can only be founded upon some separate and distinct writing or statement. Clark v. Sisson, 22 N. Y. 812; Rush v. Lathrop, Id. 535; Moore v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 55 N. Y. 41; Fairbanks v. Sargent, 104 N. Y. 108, 5 Cent. Rep. 919; Mechanics Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. supra.

The views expressed especially relate to the action of Bingham & Co. against the Bank, and call for a reversal of the judgment.

We are of the opinion that the action brought by the Bank against Bingham & Co. to recover possession of the check cannot be maintained, and in that case the judgment should be affirmed.

All concur, except Haight, J., not sitting.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

YELLOWSTONE KIT, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ALABAMA.

(....Ala.....)

1. The word "lottery," within the meaning of statutes against carrying on

NOTE.—Lottery defined.

A lottery is a scheme by which a result is reached by some action or means taken, in which result man's choice or will has no part, and which human reason, foresight, sagacity or design cannot enable him to know or determine until the same has been accomplished. See note to People v. Elliott (Mich.) 3 L. R. A. 403, for a full discussion of the offense.

Where for a pecuniary consideration it is determined by lot or chance, according to some scheme, what and how much he who pays the money is to have for it, it is a lottery. Hull v. Ruggles, 66 N. Y. 424; State v. Clarke, 83 N. H. 335; Wilkinson v. Gill, 74 N. Y. 63.

It is a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance (Conn. v. Manderfeld, 8 Phila. 459; State v. Lovell, 99 N. J. L. 461; Randle v. State, 42 Tex. 835), a valuable consideration being given for the chance to draw the prize. United States v. Olney, 1 Dedy, 484, 1 Abb. U. S. 275. See Anderson, Law Dict. Lottery, to which we are indebted. 7 L. R. A.

lotteries, embraces only schemes in which a valuable consideration of some kind is paid directly or indirectly for the chance to draw a prize.

2. Distributing prizes by lot or chance to holders of tickets given away is not carrying on a lottery, although it may be done with the view of drawing a large crowd together in the hope of profit from such of them as may choose to buy

A game in which a prize is paid for the chance of a prize is a lottery. Com. v. Sullivan, 5 New Eng. Rep. 713, 146 Mass. 142; Com. v. Wright, 137 Mass. 250.

The sale of "polioles" entitling the purchaser to receive money on the drawing of numbers in a lottery is the sale of a lottery ticket. Smith v. State, 10 Cent. Rep. 627, 68 Md. 163.

What constitutes a "lottery."

The word "lottery" imports a game of hazard. France v. State, 6 Baxt. 478.

"Auction pools," "French pools" and "combination pools" upon horse races are "lotteries," within the New Jersey statutes. State v. Lovell, 39 N. J. L. 453.

Where chances are sold and the distribution of prizes is awarded by lot, it constitutes a "lottery." Buckalew v. State, 62 Ala. 324; Bell v. State, 5 Sneed, 507.

It is not necessary that the lot should be actually cast or drawn by the managers, or that the party medicines from the distributor, or tickets to performances given by him, or to pay for seats in the tent where the prizes are selected, where no payment for any purpose is necessary as a condition of receiving a prize.

(January 31, 1890.)

APPEAL, by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Mobile rendered against him after trial of an indictment charging him with the offense of setting up or being concerned in setting up or carrying on a lottery. Reversed.

After the evidence was all in defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they must find him not guilty. The court refused to give such charge and defendant excepted.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Meurs, McCrrow & Lewis and B. M. Allen, for appellant:

paying should personally participate in the drawing. Fleming v. Bile, 3 Or. 283.

The distribution of prizes by lot to the holders of tickets given to subscribers to a newspaper is a "lottery" scheme. State v. Mumford, 73 Mo. 647.

A scheme of a benevolent association, to provide for the care and maintenance of the state insane, to distribute among ticket-holders to a public entertainment prize by raffle or other similar schemes, is a "lottery." State v. Overton, 16 Nev. 136.

A sale of envelopes containing, with other things, a card indicating an article to be purchased for a sum of money is a violation of the Statute against sale of lottery tickets. Dunn v. People, 40 Ill. 465.

The issue of bonds by a foreign government to obtain a loan, the government obliging itself to pay any additional sum over the principal and interest, and the premium named, in case the number of the bond purchased should draw a prize, is not an "illegal lottery," within the New York statutes. Kohr v. Koehler, 96 N. Y. 362.

A sale of certificates of subscription to a scientific and art association, which entitles holders to any articles which may be awarded to them by lot, is not a "lottery." Boyd v. State, 61 Ala. 177. See Tuscaloosa Scientific & Art Assn. v. State, 58 Ala. 54.

Keno, although a game of chance, and therefore unlawful, is not a "lottery." Eslava v. State, 44 Ala. 406; United States v. Hornbrook, 2 Dill. 229.

A raffle is not a "lottery" in the sense of the South Carolina statute. State v. Pinchback, 2 Mill. Const. Rep. (S. C.) 128.

For earlier decisions, see Com. v. Thacher, 97 Mass. 583; Den v. Shotwell, 23 N. J. L. 465, 24 N. J. L. 780; Boile v. Delmar, 7 Robt. 30.

Gift enterprise, a lottery.

A gift enterprise is a lottery. State v. Bryant, 74 N. C. 207; State v. Shorts, 32 N. J. L. 398.

A ticket to admit to a grand concert and to whatever gift may be awarded to its number is a lottery ticket. Nexley v. Devlin, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 210; Ex parte Blanchard, 9 Nev. 101.

A ticket given for $5 in payment for a steel engraving and admission to entertainments at the close of which money in presents was to be distributed to the purchasers, is a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance. Thomas v. People, 69 Ill. 160; Almshouse v. American Art Union, 22 How. Pr. 341, 7 N. Y. 228; People v. American Art Union, 7 N. Y. 240; People v. American Art Union, 18 Barb. 577; Beaune v. American Art Union, 5 Sandf. 614.

Every scheme for the distribution of prizes by 7 L. R. A.

Defendant distributed articles of value by lot or chance, but holders of tickets paid no consideration of any kind for their tickets; in other words, no consideration of any kind was paid for the right of participating in the distribution of prizes. Such a scheme is not a lottery within the letter or spirit of § 4008 of the Code of 1886.

United States v. Olney, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 275.

To constitute a lottery, there must be two elements: first, there must be something paid for the ticket or chance to draw a prize; and second, there must be a distribution of prizes by lot or chance.

Almshouse v. American Art Union, 7 N. Y. 238; Bishop, Stat. Cr. § 952; State v. Shorts, 32 N. J. L. 398; Boyd v. State, 61 Ala. 177; Luckless v. State, 63 Ala. 334; Eslava v. State, 44 Ala. 406; Salomon v. State, 28 Ala. 83; Kohn v. Koehler, 96 N. Y. 362, 48 Am. Rep. 628; Com. v. Wright, 137 Mass. 250, 50 Am.

chance is a lottery. Randle v. State, 43 Tex. 589. See Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424; Swain v. Bussell, 10 Ind. 483.

A scheme for the disposal of two lots where the chance of obtaining a reserved or prize lot forms part of the inducement of the purchase is a lottery. United States v. Olney, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 275.

Selling candy in boxes, each box represented as containing a prize, the purchaser to select his box, is in the nature of a lottery. Holoman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 610; Rubanks v. State, 3 Heisk. 488; Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424.

The sale of packages of candy, in some of which coupons were placed payable at the counter on presentation, is a distribution of prizes by chance, and hence a lottery. Com. v. Sheriff (Pa.) 10 Phila. 203; State v. Lumsden, 59 N. C. 572.

Mailing circulars an offense under U. S. Rev. Stat.

The mailing of circulars describing a scheme for drawing prizes by chance or by lot, by which a city or foreign government induces the purchase of its bonds, is a mailing of lottery circulars, and as such unlawful. United States v. Zeisler, 30 Fed. Rep. 499.

The offense is complete though the circulars are sent in reply to a detective's decoy letter. United States v. Moore, 19 Fed. Rep. 39.

But § 3894, U. S. Rev. Stat., does not apply to the naked sending to the postoffice (United States v. Dauphin, 20 Fed. Rep. 625); for before the custody of the letter by the postoffice or its agents, and after their voluntary termination of such custody, the rights of the proprietor are under the protection of the local law. Ibid.

A letter addressed to a fictitious name is within the statute prohibiting the deposit in the mail of a lottery circular. United States v. Duff, 19 Blatchf. 3.

As to distinction between letter and circular, see United States v. Noelke, 17 Blatchf. 554.

The provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat., giving to the Postmaster-General power to return registered letters and suspend payment of money orders addressed to those conducting lotteries, are constitutional. Dauphin v. Key, MacArth. & Mack. 203.

An indictment for sending "500 circulars" charges but one offense. United States v. Patty, 9 Biss. 429.

But where it charges them as delivered on different days, it is bad for duplicity. Ibid.

Legislation on the subject of lotteries.

There is no law in Michigan which prohibits or punishes the receiving of a prize drawn in a lottery, if it is voluntarily paid. People v. Watson, 75 Mich. 682.

Rep. 806; Don v. Shotwell, 23 N. J. L. 465; Johnson v. State, 88 Ala. 65.

Messrs. William L. Martin and Leslie B. Sheldon for the State.

Somerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of the offense of carrying on a lottery in this State. The case turns largely on what is to be taken as a proper definition of the word "lottery," within the meaning of the Statute and the Constitution of Alabama. Code 1886, §§ 4003, 4069; Const. 1875, art. 4, § 26. The word cannot be regarded as having any technical or legal signification different from the popular one. It is defined by Webster as "a distribution of prizes by lot or chance." This definition is substantially adopted by Bouvier and Rapalje in their Law Dictionaries. Worcester defines it as "a distribution of prizes and blankets by chance; a game of hazard in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger value."

So the American Cyclopaedia thus defines a lottery: "A sort of gaming contract, by which, for a valuable consideration, one may, by favor of the lot, obtain a prize of a value superior to the amount of value of that which he risks."

In Buckalew v. State, 62 Ala. 834, it was said, after citing Webster's definition, that "wherever chances are sold, and the distribution of prizes determined by lot, this, it would seem, is a lottery. This, we think, is the popular acceptance of the term."

In Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 952, it is said: "A lottery may be defined to be any scheme whereby one, in paying money or other valuable thing to another, becomes entitled to receive from him such a return in value, or nothing, as some formula of chance may determine."

But, under How. Stat. (Mich.), § 931, setting up and promoting a lottery for money is prohibited. People v. Elliott, 3 L. R. A. 408, and note.

The Louisiana Constitution of 1879, expressly recognizing as a contract, except as to its monopoly clause, the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company which had been previously repealed, revived that charter as therein modified. New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265 (30 L. ed. 411).

The clause in the charter, limiting taxation upon it to $40,000 per annum, is thus by constitutional provision made a contract which the Legislature cannot impair, although the subject matter would be otherwise within the police power of the State. Ibid.

Where the Legislature grants a lottery franchise, and authorizes its sale, the purchaser may for a valuable consideration permit others to enjoy a part of the profits, but cannot assign the franchise so as to enable each assignee to conduct a separate lottery. Lawrence v. Simmons (Ky.) 1 L. R. A. 172.

See, as to the history of legislation on this subject, Anderson, Law Dict. Lottery, 640.

Lotteries, being injurious to the public morals, cannot be made the subject of a contract; and hence a lottery franchise is not under the protection of the Federal Constitution (Moore v. State, 48 Miss. 147; nor the State Constitution. Mississippi Society of Arts and Sciences v. Musgrove, 44 Miss. 520).

The charter of a lottery company is not within the constitutional protection as to the impairment of the obligation of contracts. Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814 (25 L. ed. 1079).

The right to suppress lotteries is governmental, to be exercised at all times in the discretion of the government. Ibid; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645 (24 L. ed. 302).

The contracts which the Constitution protects are such as relate to property rights, not governmental rights. Boyd v. Alabama, supra.

An Act granting to commissioners the right to sell lottery tickets to raise a fund for the repair of a turnpike is not illimitable as to time. Phalen v. Virginia, 49 U. S. 8 How. 163 (15 L. ed. 1000).

Constitutional and statutory prohibition.

A constitutional provision inhibiting lotteries or the sale of lottery tickets is prohibitive on those subjects. State v. Woodward, 39 Ind. 110.

Such prohibition is within the exercise of the police power, in the interest of public morals, and is constitutional. Ibid., following Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814 (25 L. ed. 1079), and overruling Kellum v. State, 66 Ind. 568. See Whitney v. State, 10 Ind. 7 L. R. A.

404; Riggs v. Adams, 13 Ind. 190; Lucas v. McHair, 12 Gill & J. 1.

A scheme to aid a benevolent association in so far as it authorized a lottery or allowed the sale of lottery tickets is unconstitutional. Ex parte Blanchard, 9 Nev. 101. See State v. Phalen, 3 Harr. (Del.) 441.

In Texas the Constitution prohibits the authorization of a lottery by the State, and the sale of lottery tickets within the State, and renders nugatory legislation as to a gift enterprise and the license tax imposed on such business. Randle v. State, 43 Tex. 580.

Under the Tennessee Code the vending or attempt to vend a lottery ticket is made a misdemeanor, and a due bill given by an agent to his principal on account of money received for sale of tickets cannot be enforced. Lanahan v. Pattison, 1 Filpp. 410.

Early ones construing statutory prohibitions of lotteries and sale of lottery tickets. Terry v. Oleott, 4 Conn. 442; Williams v. Woodman, 8 Pick. 78; Com. v. Lottery Tickets, 5 Cush. 369; Com. v. Harris, 13 Allen, 534; Freleigh v. State, 8 Mo. 606; State v. Sterling, 8 Mo. 697; Ridgeway v. Underwood, 4 Wash. C. C. 129; Van Doren v. Staats, 3 N. J. L. 887; Hunt v. Knickerbocker, 5 Johns. 337; Mount v. Walte, 7 Johns. 434; Butler v. Kent, 19 Johns. 223; McLaughlin v. Walte, 9 Cow. 670; People v. Warner, 4 Barb. 314; Phalen v. Com. 1 Rob. (Va.) 713.

Authorization of lotteries, and regulation by statute.

No uncertain or doubtful terms or provisions in a charter will be construed to authorize a lottery scheme. Boyd v. State, 53 Ala. 601.

An express authorization by a constitutional law to maintain a lottery may be exercised although the general laws prohibit lotteries. Broadbent v. Tuscaloosa Scientific & Art. Asso. 45 Ala. 170.

A lottery franchise expires when the amount to be raised is provided for by contract, whether the whole amount has been paid to the beneficiary or not. State v. France, 72 Mo. 41. See Phalen v. State, 12 Gill & J. 18.

In such an association the designation of things which may be distributed by lot excludes other things not comprehended in the franchise; hence money cannot be substituted for the award drawn. Marks v. State, 45 Ala. 38.

The punitive section of the Louisiana Act as to sale of lottery tickets was not abrogated by the Constitution of that State declaring void all laws

In Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424, the New York Court of Appeals adopts the following as the result of the accepted definitions: "Where a pecuniary consideration is paid, and it is to be determined by lot or chance, according to some scheme held out to the public, what and how much he who pays the money is to receive for it, that is a lottery." This definition is approved in Wilkinson v. Gill, 74 N. Y. 63, as the popular meaning of the word, and one proper to be adopted with a view of remedying the mischief intended to be prevented by the Statutes prohibiting lotteries, and it is said: "Every lottery has the characteristics of a wager or bet, although every bet is not a lottery."

It may be safely asserted, as the result of the adjudged cases, that the species of lottery, the carrying on of which is intended to be prohibited as criminal by the various laws of this country, embraces only schemes in which a valuable consideration of some kind is paid, directly or indirectly, for the chance to draw a prize. United States v. Olney, 1 Dedy, 461, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 273; Almshouse v. American Art

Union, 7 N. Y. 228; Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 204, 48 Am. Rep. 622; Bell v. State, 5 Sneed, 507; Com. v. Thacher, 97 Mass. 583.

There is no law which prohibits the gratuitous distribution of one's property by lot or chance. If the distribution is a pure gift or bounty, and not in name or pretense merely, which is designed to evade the law,—if it be entirely unsupported by any valuable consideration moving from the taker,—there is nothing in this mode of conferring it which is violative of the policy of our Statutes condemning lotteries or gaming. We may go further, and say that there would seem to be nothing contrary to public policy, or per se morally wrong, in the determination of rights by lot. A member of the College of Christian Apostles, as sacred history informs us, was once chosen by lot. And under the law of this State a tie vote on a contested election of any state officer is required to be settled in the same mode. So our statutes authorize a distribution of property owned by joint tenants to be made by lot under the direction of the judge of probate. These are not the evils against which contrary to its provisions. State v. First Dist. Judge, 32 La. Ann. 719.

An Act passed by a Territorial Legislature authorizing money to be raised by lottery to procure a library and apparatus for the university has never been repealed and is valid. Kellum v. State, 66 Ind. 568.

An Act of Congress empowering the corporation of Washington to authorize lotteries does not authorize it to force the sale of the tickets in States where such sales are prohibited. Cobens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 284 (5 L. ed. 257).

Such power cannot be exercised so as to discharge the corporation from its liability in any manner whatever. Clark v. Washington, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 40 (6 L. ed. 544).

Where the conduct of the managers is bona fide a mere irregularity in the drawing will not vitiate it. Brent v. Davis, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 305 (6 L. ed. 350).

The corporation having promised to pay the whole prize on whole tickets was not liable for a prize drawn on a half ticket. A party cannot by his own act split a contract and make the promisor liable to holders for fragments of a share. Shankland v. Washington, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 360 (6 L. ed. 166).

The person entitled to a prize has no recourse against the bond given by the manager for a true and impartial execution of his duty. Washington v. Young, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 406 (6 L. ed. 352).

Where a party fraudulently draws his own ticket he cannot defend his fraud on the ground that the lottery was unlawful. Catts v. Phalen, 43 U. S. 2 How. 376 (11 L. ed. 306).

A law imposing a special tax for selling lottery tickets, and, for nonpayment, liability to indictment, is constitutional. License Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 463 (18 L. ed. 497).

Action for recovery back of money paid and for the penalty.

The statute authorizing the purchaser to recover back double the sum paid and double cost, it is not necessary to show that the money paid was remitted to the proprietors (Grover v. Morris, 78 N.Y. 472;

the law is directed. The gratuitous distribution of money or property by lot has never prevailed to such extent as to require police regulation at the hands of the State, nor, so long as human nature remains as it is now is and has been for so many thousand years, is it likely ever to be otherwise. The history of lotteries for the past three centuries in England, and for nearly a hundred years in America, shows that they have been schemes for the distribution of money or property by lot in which chances were sold for money, either directly, or through some cunning device. The evil flowing from them has been the cultivation of the gambling spirit,—the hazarding of money with the hope by chance of obtaining a larger sum,—often stimulating an inordinate love of gain, arousing the most violent passions of one's baser nature, sometimes tempting the gambler to risk all he possesses on the turn of a single card or cast of a single die, and "tending, as centuries of human experience now fully attest, to mendacity and idleness on the one hand, and moral profligacy and debauchery on the other." Johnson v. State, 88 Ala. 65.

Gray v. Roberts, 2 A. K. Marsh. 208; and the fact that the lottery was authorized by the law of another State will not make it other than an illegal lottery here. Grover v. Morris, 73 N. Y. 473. See early cases: Day v. State, 7 Gill, 82; People v. Gilbert, Anth. (N. Y.) 191.

A sale of slips of paper with numbers on them, which if drawn would entitle the holder to a prize, is in fact a sale of an interest in or "portion of an illegal lottery" within the statute. Wilkinson v. Gill, 10 Hun, 156.

To establish the illegality of the lotteries at the time of the sale, it may be shown that previous and subsequent thereto defendants had engaged in an unlawful business of which the acts complained of are a part. Roediger v. Simmons, 14 Abb. Pr. 256.

The complaint must set forth the particular dates and purchases. Ibid.

A lottery not for the purpose of disposing of property is not illegal. People v. Payne, 3 Denio, 88.

For sale of lottery tickets.

The sale of a lottery ticket is illegal under the Constitution and statutes of Missouri, although the ticket had already drawn the prize. The contract is both malum prohibitum and against public policy, and equity will not interfere. Kitchen v. Greenbaum, 61 Mo. 110.

In this case it is not denied that the defendant has distributed presents or prizes to the holders of tickets given to the public,—eight prizes among some 8,000 ticket-holders. It is also uncontroverted that this distribution has been made by lot or chance. This was done by two children chosen from the audience, who selected by lot eight tickets from a large number of duplicates which were thrown by the defendant at random on the stage or platform. These tickets were numbered, and the persons holding the corresponding numbers were entitled to these prizes, or presents, according to their number. But we can see nothing in the evidence from which it can be inferred that anyone, present or absent, paid any valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, for these tickets, or for the chance of getting a prize. It is true that, on the day of the drawing, the defendant had held one of his customary performances, consisting of acrobatic contortions, exhibitions of a magic lantern, and of music, dancing and song, and the like; and between the acts he always sold his medicines for which he claimed great curative virtues. These exhibitions were in a tent which would seat between 900 and 1,000 people, and would furnish standing room for about 2,500 persons. For tickets of admission to see this performance, the closing one of the season, advertised as a "Jubilee" performance, a charge of ten cents was made. But these tickets had no connection whatever with those entitling the holders to a chance for the eight prizes. For these latter tickets or chances nothing was charged. They had been distributed, free, to any and all persons present at his previous performances, and for admission to these exhibitions no charge was made. The only fee charged was for the occupancy of a seat; there was none for entrance. Nor was it necessary that a holder of a successful ticket should be present to get his prize in case he drew one. It would be delivered as well at the defendant's private house. This fact was advertised in a Mobile paper, and one of the prizes was actually delivered there. The suspicion, even though well founded, that these presents may have been given away in order to induce a larger

To convict for the sale of a lottery ticket it must be proved that the paper offered for sale represented a chance in the lottery. State v. Russell, 17 Mo. App. 16; State v. Bruner, 17 Mo. App. 274. See Dunn v. People, 40 Ill. 465.

Evidence that defendant sold a slip of paper bearing certain numbers which might be drawn in a lottery, then intended to be drawn, is sufficient. State v. Rothschild, 19 Mo. App. 137.

The character of the ticket and intent of the parties may be proved by similar sales shown to have implied a lottery venture. State v. Ochsner, 9 Mo. App. 216.

Conviction.

The jury has the undoubted right, in a prosecution for selling lottery tickets, to disregard the name and indorsement printed on them, and find that they really are lottery tickets, and not what they profess to be,—tickets upon a horse combination. Boylard v. State, 69 Md. 511.

crowd to assemble at the defendant's performances, with the expectation that they would buy medicines, or pay a fee for occupying a seat in the tent, would be too remote to constitute a legal consideration for the tickets. So with the expectation that it would increase the attendance at the so-called "Jubilee" performance. The holders of thousands of these tickets given away as gratuitous were not present, and yet stood an equal chance in the distribution with those who were. And the doors were thrown open for free admission when the distribution took place, this event occurring just after the close of the exhibition or performance proper.

The element of gaming which is wanting to constitute this transaction a lottery is the fact that no money was paid, directly or indirectly, for the chance of receiving a prize, or of participating in the distribution by lot. Nor would a jury be authorized to make a contrary inference, reasonably, from any evidence contained in the bill of exceptions. Many rulings of the court are directly opposed to these views.

It follows from what we have said that the city court erred in not giving the general affirmative charge requested by the defendant.

The judgment of conviction is reversed, and a judgment will be rendered in this court discharging the defendant from further prosecution under the present indictment.

1. A railroad company, which has acquired a majority of the stock of another railroad company, will not be allowed, in the absence of express statutory authority, to vote such stock, either by itself or by other persons acting in its interest, in the election of officers, or in matters pertaining to the management and control of the latter company; at least where the two roads are rivals, having substantially the same field of operation, where a conflict of interest may arise in the matter of expenditures, or in the division of patronage or of earnings, or where the profits of one company may be enhanced by a diminution of those of the other.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was commenced October 27, 1887, and is prosecuted by stockholders of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, representing a minority of the stock. The case was submitted in the court below on a demurrer to the bill, and on a motion to dismiss it for want of equity. From the chancellor's decree overruling the demurrer, and refusing to dismiss the bill, or to dissolve the injunction, the present appeal is prosecuted. Coming before us in this form, we must treat as true all the averments of the bill which are well pleaded, and in the further progress of this opinion they will be stated as facts.

The Memphis & Charleston Railroad was constructed under charters obtained from the States of Tennessee and Alabama, and extends from Memphis, in Tennessee, to Stevenson, in Alabama, running partly through Mississippi. One hundred and fifty miles of the track are in Alabama. The entire length of the road is not shown. The capital stock is $5,312,725, divided into 212,509 shares, of $25 each. Of these shares, 106,261, being a majority of the whole number, stand on the books in the name of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company, another corporation, which does not connect with or touch the Memphis & Charleston Railroad at any point. The complainants hold 8,800 of the shares, representing $220,000 of the capital stock; and they sue in their names, and in the names of such other of the stockholders as may join in the suit.

The Memphis & Charleston Railroad has been in operation for a third of a century. The profits of the corporation, if any, prior to the time of its passing under the control of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company, hereafter shown, we have no certain means of ascertaining, further than that from June, 1858, two years after the completion of the road, to June, 1861, the net earnings were never less than 10, and once as high as 16, per cent. We have no account of any earning during the civil war, from 1861 to 1865, and suppose not only that there were no net profits, but the cessation of hostilities left the road very much out of repair. Extraordinary expenditures became necessary to repair and equip the road, and up to June 30, 1867, the expenditures exceeded the receipts. Between the years ending June, 1868, and June, 1874, surplus profits, amounts not shown, were earned by the road each year, except the two years 1871 and 1872. The sum of the deficiency for these two years was about $150,000.

The East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company obtained its charters from the States of Tennessee and Alabama, and had been many years in operation. It extended easterly far beyond Knoxville, Tenn.; and having absorbed, or otherwise obtained control of, the Selma, Rome & Dalton Railroad, an Alabama corporation, extended, in a southwesterly direction, 150 miles or more into Alabama, terminating at Selma, in this State. It also operated a line which touched at Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, eastward from Stevenson, and distant from it 25 or more miles. There was, however, a connecting line between the respective termini, but it belonged to another railroad corporation. The East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company had probably many other extensions and connections, not necessary to be noticed here. The extent, distances and connections of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company are stated partly on general knowledge. About 1874, one Wilson was elected president of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, and was continued in the office until 1881. His election was procured through the instrumentality of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company, and, although not exactly coterminous, the two railroads have been operated substantially under one management ever since. In the first instance, the Memphis & Charleston Railroad was let by lease to the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, the rent agreed on being the net income of the former road above expenses. In a suit instituted for the purpose of testing the legality of that lease, it was set aside as being ultra vires. Another suit, between the Knoxville & Ohio Railroad Company and the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, to which the Memphis & Charleston Company was not a party, resulted in the acquisition by the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company of a large volume, nearly one half, of the shares of stock in the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company. Later acquisitions placed a majority—a bare majority—of the entire stock of the latter Company in the name and asserted ownership of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company.

The bill insinuates that each of the two suits named above was collusive, at least in part; and facts averred point in that direction. It is also averred that certain shares of the stock which were held by the Memphis & Charleston Company in its own right were transferred by the common president of the two companies to the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, without any authority therefor. Marked bias and partiality in favor of the latter company are charged to have prevailed in these transactions; and it is also charged that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company was without the power to acquire and own stock in another railroad company. It is expressly charged that the intent and purpose of the said purchase of stock was to give to the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company a controlling vote in the management of the Memphis & Charleston Company; and the exhibit taken from the record of the suit with the Knoxville & Ohio Railroad Company, if correctly set forth, proves this charge to be true. The bill further charges that after the agreement of lease noted above, which was in 1877, the two railroads have been operated under one and the same president, and under one and the same management. Inequality and fraud are charged in the combined management of the two roads, greatly to the profit of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, and to the equal detriment of the Memphis & Charleston Company. The bill makes specific charges of partiality and maladministration, as follows: First. When the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company acquired controlling power over the Memphis & Charleston Railroad, the repair-shops of the latter had been partially destroyed, but could have been rebuilt at a small expenditure. They were not rebuilt. The rolling stock of the Memphis & Charleston Company was carried to the shops of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, at Knoxville, Tenn., "where the repairing was done at extravagant prices, and mileage was charged for all the distance the rolling stock was carried over the road of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company." Second. "The rolling stock [of the Memphis & Charleston Company] was unnecessarily increased, at exorbitant cost, [$300,000 at one time,] and was used by the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company upon its own road, without any compensation" to the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company for such use. Third. "The Memphis & Charleston Railroad was renewed with steel rails, iron bridges and ballast, in advance of the needs of the railroad, to keep down the apparent net earnings." Fourth. Less than the pro rata mileage share of through passenger and freight receipts from passengers and goods passing over both roads was allowed to the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company.

The bill then proceeded to show, by tabulated statement and otherwise, that the percentage of net earnings, compared with the gross income of the Memphis & Charleston Company, was much less than that of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, while the former was more favorably circumstanced for cheap operation than the latter. The bill charged that at the election of officers of the Memphis & Charleston Company, held in November, 1886, the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company succeeded in electing seven of its own directors to be directors of the Memphis & Charleston Company, seven being a majority of the board. The directors then elected Thomas to be president of their board, he being at the same time president of the board of directors of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company. The two railroads were thus placed substantially under one and the same government.

As we have said, the bill in this case was filed on the 27th day of October, 1887; and it charges that another election of directors would be held on the 17th day of November then next ensuing—twenty-one days after the filing of the bill. It charges, further, that “if said East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, its directors, or any person on its behalf, shall be permitted to participate, or take any part, in said election, or any meeting of the stockholders of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, the baneful control of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company over its affairs will be continued for another year, and its legitimate earnings will be diverted from its stockholders, and, under various devices, absorbed by the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company.” The prayer for injunction is two fold: first, that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company be enjoined from voting the stock standing in its name, either in the election of directors of the Memphis & Charleston Company or in any other meeting of the stockholders; and, second, that it be enjoined from disposing of its stock except with the knowledge and approval of the chancery court. The reason urged in favor of the second of the above prayers is that without such restraining order the stock might, and probably would, be transferred to some other name, and still held, and its voting power exercised in the interest of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company. Under some reorganization, the present corporate name of the latter company is “The East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company.”

Under the Statutes of this State (Code 1886, §§ 1583, 1586, 1587) a general power is conferred to consolidate two or more railroads which, when completed, “may admit the passage of burden or passenger cars over any two or more of such roads continuously, without break or interruption.” Section 1583. A railroad corporation “may at any time, by means of subscription to the capital stock of any other corporation or company, or other wise, aid such corporation or company in the construction of its railroad, for the purpose of forming a connection with the road owned by such corporation or company furnishing aid; or any railroad corporation organized in pursuance of law may lease or purchase any part or all of any railroad constructed by any other corporation or company, if the lines of such roads are continuous or connected.” Section 1586. “A corporation now existing, or which may hereafter be organized, for the building, constructing and operating a railroad, has authority, for the purpose of extending its line or forming a connection, to acquire, hold and operate a railroad without the State; or, within the State, may extend its road, or may build, construct and operate branch roads from any point or points on its line.” Section 1587.

It is not contended that any of these sections, or all of them combined, confer in terms the powers which the bill alleges that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company claims and exercises in the management and control of the Memphis & Charleston Company. The conduct charged and complained of was not the consolidation of two or more roads; for consolidation was neither effected nor attempted, nor were any of the steps taken which the Statute prescribes as conditions precedent to lawful consolidation. Nor was it the connecting of two roads over which cars could pass “continuously without break or interruption.” It was not giving aid by one corporation to another “in the construction of its railroad, for the purpose of forming a connection with” it. Neither the aid nor the purpose existed in this case, if the averments of the bill be true. It was not a lease or purchase of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad, or any part of it; and if such lease, or purchase or other arrangement had been attempted, the lines of the two roads are not connected. And the averments of the bill negative the idea that any of these arrangements, connected operation or consolidation, if claimed to be such, were agreed to or consummated by the corporations, acting as such. Nor was there any agreement, or attempted arrangement, either expressed or implied, that the one railroad should acquire, hold and operate the other. Nor is the Memphis & Charleston Railroad, in any sense, a branch road from any point on the line of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company. It is not a branch road, according to the averments of the bill.

We repeat, the sections of the Code we have been commenting on do not expressly confer the powers which the complainants complain of as abuses, nor does the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company contend that they do. It could not so contend. Its precise contention is that those Statutes “evidence a settled policy of the State to encourage consolidations or combinations of connecting lines.” It is manifestly true that long connecting lines of railroad are a benefaction. They economize time and labor, and thereby lessen expense. Common observation, and the simplest processes of reasoning, show this to be too clear to require argument in support of it. But does the conduct complained of in this case encourage or promote the consolidation of connecting lines? Is it a legitimate means of accomplishing that end? Private corporations can exercise only such powers as are conferred upon them, and such as are necessary and proper to carry the granted powers into effect. In this, however, is included the inherent incidental power of doing and performing such acts as are necessarily implied in the line of trade or business of the corporation, as shown by the charter or law of its creation. Wilks v. Georgia Pac. R. Co. 79 Ala. 180; 8 Brick. 159.

Based on this principle, it is contended for appellee that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company had no power to acquire and hold shares of stock in the Memphis & Charleston Company; that its purchase of the stock was ultra vires and void, and that, as a consequence, it should not be allowed to exercise the powers which the rightful ownership alone confers. In other words, that, to authorize the exercise of the privileges of a stockholder, the stock must have been lawfully acquired. On this ground it is contended that the ruling of the chancellor in continuing the injunction is free from error. May it not be answered to this contention: First, that, conceding the purchase of the stock by the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company to have been ultra vires, are the complainants in this suit in any position to raise that question? They are not stockholders in the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, and can they be heard to complain that a corporation to which they are strangers has misapplied its funds? Second, Does not the bill show on its face that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company purchased the stock, not as an investment of its funds, but in the collection of a debt due to it from another railroad corporation? The power of a corporation to acquire property, real or personal, as a means of collecting a debt otherwise doubtful, stands on a very different principle from that which determines its power to purchase such property as an investment of its funds or capital. Charlotte First Nat. Bank v. Nat. Exchange Bank, 92 U. S. 123 [28 L. ed. 679]; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 431.

We come, then, to the naked inquiry, Can one corporation acquire a majority of the stock of another corporation, and, by the exercise of the voting power the majority of stock confers, govern and control the management of such corporation? This question, in its naked form, has rarely been presented to the courts, although it is generally known that such transactions are not infrequent.

In 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp., § 431, it is said: "The right of a corporation to invest in shares of another company cannot be implied merely because both companies are engaged in a similar kind of business. A corporation must carry on its business by its own agents, and not through the agency of another corporation." And this doctrine is stated without dissent in 4 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 249, note 2.

In Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, will be found a very full, and somewhat pioneer, discussion of the power and right of a railroad company to acquire and hold a majority of the stock of another railroad corporation, with a view of controlling its management. It is an able discussion, and, although not presented precisely in the form in which the present bill raises it, it enunciates principles which bear on the question in hand. Among many other wise and conservative principles declared in that opinion, we transcribe and approve the following: "I am strongly impressed with the conviction that much of their [the railroads'] success in developing the resources of the country is due to the very jealousy which has ever held them strictly to their charters, and has constantly been careful to prevent an undue accumulation of interest under one management. The certainty that each stockholder has that his funds will be applied to known and declared purposes has made them favorite investments for prudent men, while the rivalry which opposing interests engender begets an energy, economy, skill and enterprise that have had much to do with the remarkable progress which such enterprises have made. A colossal enterprise, assured of handsome dividends by the possession of a monopoly, may well rest upon its position, knowing that, however the country may suffer from its exactions, its own profits are secure. It is the rivalry of opposing interests, the struggle for success, nay, even for life, with dangerous opposition, that gives life, enterprise and success to railroad, as to other human undertakings. It has been the conflict with thirty state lines, each with its opposing interests, and with numerous seaboard cities, each seeking to attract the rich outpourings from the great interior, that has begotten the mighty network of iron which interlaces our extensive territory; and I am convinced that there is no public policy more striking than that which, while it fosters every such undertaking, is yet careful ever to keep in view the danger of a monopoly, and the good effect of rivalry and conflict between different companies. The Central Railroad is, and has long been, the pride of Georgia. The skill, energy and prudence with which its affairs have been managed reflect great credit upon the men who have had these affairs in their control; and the State may well be grateful for the success that has followed. Yet we cannot but think it would be a measure fraught with great public evil to give to that company permission to control and manage its great rival, the Atlantic & Gulf Road."

In the case of Hazlehurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co., 43 Ga. 13, the principles of the foregoing case are reaffirmed.

The case of Milbank v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 64 How. Pr. 20, was like the present one in most of its bearings. In that case, as in this, one railroad corporation had purchased a majority of the capital stock of another, and proposed to vote the stock so purchased in the election of directors. Certain stockholders of the latter company, owning a small minority of its capital stock, filed a bill to enjoin the purchasing company from voting the stock it had acquired, being a majority of the shares. The court, in delivering its opinion, said: "In the case under consideration, the New York, Lake Erie & Western Company have acquired by purchase the majority of all the stock issued by the Buffalo, New York & Erie Railroad. If its officers are permitted to vote thereon, they can elect a board of directors of their own choosing. It would then be for the interests of the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company to have the Buffalo, New York & Erie Company managed and controlled in the interests of the former company. This would be liable to result in injury to these plaintiffs and their fellow-stockholders; and, if so, they have a right to complain. My conclusions, therefore, are that, while the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company is the owner of the stock in question, and has the right, while it remains the owner, to collect and receive the dividends thereon, and has the right to sell and dispose of the same, it has not the right to vote thereon, and that the stockholders of the Buffalo, New York & Erie Railroad Company have the right to have it enjoined from so voting, in case it threatened to do so. Judgment should be ordered for the plaintiffs in accordance with the views herein expressed, with costs."

It is true that this was not a decision by the court of last resort. It was by the supreme court, an intermediate court in that State. It appears to have been acquiesced in, for no appeal is shown to have been taken. See also Franklin Co. v. Leviston Sav. Inst. 68 Me. 43; Sumner v. Marcy, 8 Woodb. & M. 105; Mechanics & W. M. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Meriden Agency Co. 24 Conn. 159.

Corporations aggregate are governed, and must be governed, and made efficient through the instrumentality of agents. These agents, in cases of pecuniary corporations, are called "directors," who are elected at stated intervals by the stockholders, for such term as the charter or regulations may prescribe. They may not be "trustees" in the technical sense; but their functions are largely and essentially fiduciary. Hoyle v. Plattsburgh & M. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 828.

Says Mr. Morawetz (1 Priv. Corp. § 517): The directors "impliedly undertake to give the company the benefit of their best care and judgment, and to use the powers conferred upon them solely in the interest of the corporation. They have no right, under any circumstances, to use their official positions for their own benefit, or the benefit of anyone except the corporation itself. It is for this reason that the directors have no authority to represent the corporation in any transaction in which they are personally interested in obtaining an advantage at the expense of the company. The corporation would not have the benefit of their disinterested judgment, under these circumstances, as self-interest would prompt them to prefer their own advantage to that of the company."

A director "falls within the great rule by which equity requires that confidence shall not be abused by the party in whom it is reposed, and which it enforces by imposing a disability, either partial or complete, upon the party intrusted to deal on his own behalf in respect to any matter involved in such confidence." Hoyle v. Plattsburgh & M. R. Co. supra, and authorities cited.

So, in 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp., § 523, is this language: "A person who is agent for two parties cannot, in the absence of express authority from each, represent them both in a transaction in which they have contrary interests. . . . It follows, therefore, that the directors or other agents of a corporation have no implied authority to bind the company by making a contract with another corporation, which they also represent."

Section 529: "It is well settled that, if the same persons are appointed to act as directors of different companies, they have no authority to represent both companies in transactions in which their interests are opposed. It matters not that the acts of the directors are in the interest of a majority of the shareholders in each company, and have received their approval, nothing can be more unjustifiable and dishonorable than an attempt on the part of those holding a majority of the shares in a corporation to place their nominees in control of the company, and then to use their control for the purpose of obtaining advantage to themselves at the expense of the minority. It would be a conspiracy to commit a breach of trust. The directors of a corporation are bound to administer its affairs with strict impartiality, in the interest of all the shareholders alike; and the inability of the minority to protect themselves against unauthorized acts, performed with the connivance of the majority, renders their right to the protection of the courts the clearer." State v. Concord R. Corp. 13 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 94; Pearson v. Concord R. Corp. Id. 102, and numerous cases cited; Marsh v. Whitmore, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 178 [22 L. ed. 483]; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 530, and note 3; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, §§ 614, 615.

Although, as we have said, directors of a pecuniary corporation may not be "trustees," in the technical sense of that term, they are under the same restraints, and labor under the same disabilities, which rest on trustees proper, so far as questions raised by the present bill are concerned. When personal interest antagonizes the disinterestedness and impartiality which the law, as well as morality, exacts in the exercise of fiduciary trusts, this is, per se, a disqualification, not by reason of any abuse committed, but in fear that weak human nature will yield to temptation. Justice Field, speaking of the conflict between duty and interest, says: "Constituted as humanity is, in the majority of cases, duty would be overborne in the struggle." Marsh v. Whitmore, supra; Nathan v. Tompkins, 82 Ala. 43; Great Luxembourg R. Co. v. Magnay, 25 Beav. 536.

The averments of the bill in this case show great wrongs done to the Memphis & Charleston Company by reason of the control exercised in its management by the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company. It also charges that it is the intention of the latter company to so vote its stock as to maintain its control of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad. Whether the charges of past abuses be true or false, they bring prominently to the notice of the court the character and extent of wrong and oppression which one corporation may inflict on another, when circumstanced as these are. It is scarcely necessary that we should specify in what manner the oppression may be inflicted. The board of directors elected by and for the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, we must suppose, owe their election to all the stockholders, representing all the stock in that company. The duties of fidelity and impartiality in administering the affairs of that company, implied in the relation they sustain to it, we have stated above. They require severe disinterestedness, as between the several shareholders, and unbiased fidelity to the prosperity and success of the corporation. Now, when the directors of the Memphis & Charleston Company, or a controlling majority of them, owe their election to the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, and to that company alone, it is manifest that questions may and will arise on which there will be a conflict of interest between the two companies. It is but human nature that in such conflict directors thus chosen will give their votes and influence in favor of the company they represent in full, and in whose entire income and emoluments they participate, rather than to the company they represent only to the extent of a trifle above a moiety of its stock,—an integer against a fraction. Both law and reason force the implication that, in the governing body of a corporation, duty and interest shall not point in opposite directions. We hold that it is equally against public policy, and against that sound rule which disables trustees, or quasi trustees, to act when their duty and interest conflict, that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company should be allowed to vote its majority stock in matters pertaining to the management and control of the Memphis & Charleston Company. We confine our ruling, however, for the present, to cases like this one, where a conflict of interest may arise in the matter of expenditures and their apportionment, in the division of patronage or of earnings, and to rivalships between different companies, having substantially the same field of operation, or where the profits of one enterprise may be enhanced by the diminution of those of the other. There may be other cases to which the rule will apply, but we decline to consider them now.

This case has been very ably argued; and we are not unmindful of the grave consequences that may, and probably will, ensue from our decision, not alone to the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, but to many other corporations similarly circumstanced. We have not declared that the law does not authorize that company to acquire and hold stock, or shares of stock, in another railroad corporation. Its charters not being before us, we have no means of ascertaining what its corporate powers are, further than the implications which naturally arise from its name and its lines of business inform us. We have not declared that if the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company is without power to acquire and hold shares of stock in another railroad corporation, the complainants in this suit have shown any right to controvert the question of its rightful ownership. Hence we have not decided that the Knoxville & Ohio Railroad Company were not the rightful, lawful owners of the stock which the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company acquired from it, nor that the latter company did not acquire a good title by its purchase. We have not attempted to set aside, or to declare invalid, either of these sales. We do not controvert the general inherent right, resulting from the ownership of stock in a corporation, to exercise the elective power such ownership confers, and to exercise it wisely or unwisely, alone, or pursuant to an agreement with other stockholders; and that no one save the former owner can question the right to vote such stock, even when obtained by fraud, or other illegal means. Moses v. Scott, 84 Ala. 608.

This, we repeat, is the general rule; and less than this, in an ordinary case, would be an unauthorized abridgement of the stockholder's property rights.

Enjoyment and the right of disposition are general attributes of property ownership. Property rights, however, cannot be classed as absolutely independent of social and municipal regulation. "So use your own as not to invade the equal rights of others," is a maxim as sound in law as it is in the conduct of social intercourse. Its observation and preservation are the end and aim of much wise legislation, of much judicial administration. But men must be dealt with, not as faultless, but as frail, and subject to temptation too strong for their powers of resistance. Civil liberty is but natural liberty shorn of its power to transgress the boundary which separates meum and tuum, in its comprehensive sense. Hence it is that the law, with inflexible purpose, has placed restraints on transactions in which duty and interest conflict. Hence it is that, when any relation of trust or confidence subsists, the law scrutinizes with earnest, if not severe, vigilance any pecuniary transaction that may be had between parties thus circumstanced. Hence it is that, when one man stands in a fiduciary relation to another, any contract or bargain and sale had with the beneficiary is invalid at the mere option of the latter, if seasonably expressed. The danger of abuse in such conditions dominates the power of disposition; and the power to make binding contracts, which we have classed as among the general attributes of property ownership, must submit to reasonable restraints. Thompson v. Lee, 31 Ala. 292; Moses v. Micou, 79 Ala. 561; Luganin v. Bassey, 14 Ves. Jr. 273.

It is contended for appellants that if a majority of the capital stock of the Memphis & Charleston Company had belonged to an individual, or to a combination of individuals, instead of being the property of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company, the same power of control could have been exerted as is complained of in this case. It is possible that there might be an exceptional, extreme case, in which it would advance the interest of the owner or owners of a majority of the stock in a corporation to diminish its income, that the emoluments of another enterprise, in which he or they are more largely interested, may be thereby enhanced. Such case, however, is extremely improbable, and, if found to exist, might possibly present a case of wrong for which injunction could furnish no preventive relief. This is a question we need not decide. As a rule, stockholders, in voting, as in other acts which they are called to perform, attempt to promote the welfare of the corporation; for on its success depend their profits. Whether they act wisely or not, no one can be heard to complain of their conduct; for the success of the enterprise and their individual interests are presumed to be identical. In ordinary elections by stockholders, the presumption is that men will act as their interests prompt them to act, and that their aim is to benefit the corporation in which they are stockholders. Should a case arise in which there is bad faith in the management, and consequent loss to the stockholders, there would seem to be no doubt that redress could be obtained from the faithless governing body.

The case in which the votes are cast by individual stockholders, and the one in hand, are, presumptively at least, essentially different. In that, duty and interest are in complete accord. In this, if the averments of the bill be true, they are in palpable antagonism. In the one, the presumption is that the vote will be cast solely in the interest of the corporation holding the election. In the other, that the greater opposing interest will prevail over the lesser, as it is so apt to do in all human conduct. We think it is no answer to the relief prayed in this case that in another possibly supposable case a wrong very like the one here complained of might be inflicted, and yet the same measure of redress could not be accorded.

It is contended that if relief be granted in this case it will greatly embarrass railroad corporations in the matter of maintaining continuous, connecting lines, so conducive to public convenience and to economy in transportation. It cannot be denied that steam has, in many respects, revolutionized the world, and that railroads are among the more potent instrumentalities which have effected that revolution. The nations of the earth have been brought into closer neighborhood and better acquaintance, while Christian civilization has been much more speedily and widely diffused. So, commerce and the industrial enterprises have received a new impetus and expansion, theretofore unknown in the world's history. An instrumentality possessing such vast capabilities should be cherished and protected in the enjoyment and exercise of all its rights and privileges. The groveling or agrarian spirit which would hinder or embarrass this mighty agency in the full enjoyment of its rightful powers should receive no encouragement or countenance from right-thinking people. On the other hand, the tremendous power that may be wielded by aggregated or incorporated wealth should be kept within due bounds, and restricted to legitimate methods. The pernicious ends to which concentrated wealth may be perverted need not be mentioned here. The virtuous and patriotic utterances of many of the courts of supreme jurisdiction, re-echoed from the highest officials in the federal government, show all too plainly that the public is awakened to the wrongs inflicted through the instrumentality of combined capital. Let us accord to corporations all their rights, and restrain them in the abuse of their powers, should such be attempted.

The principle we have declared in a former part of this opinion will apply with equal force to all employes, agents and all other persons or corporations who may be acting in the interest or for the benefit of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company. Nothing less than an absolute sale of the stock to some person or persons authorized to vote it will relieve it of the infirmity of its present ownership, or authorize the present or any pretended owner to be heard in the government of the Memphis & Charleston Company.

The bill does not charge that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company contemplates a sale, or pretended sale, of the stock, and does not charge that the company, by any indirect means, will attempt to have its stock voted in its interest. The charge is that "if said East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Company is permitted to transfer said stock it will conceal its interest in the same under the name of some other party, and through such party reacquire the control it now has, with said stock standing in its own name." If such attempt be made without an actual sale of the stock, it will be a violation of the order made in this case, and can be punished as such. Moreover, an election of directors thus procured would be a fraud perpetrated in defiance of the order of the court; and such election would be annulled on proper application. We hold, however, that in the present stage of this case, and under the averments of the bill, all of which that is pertinent we have copied, there is not enough shown to authorize an injunction against a sale of the stock. That question can be properly raised when an attempt is made, should it ever be made, to violate or evade the principles of the injunction granted in this cause. 1 Brick. Dig. p. 704, § 980; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 377, §§ 154, 155, 158.

The bill in this case avers that before filing the bill the complainants "requested the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, by a request addressed to its officers, to take appropriate legal proceedings to prevent the stock standing in the name of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company from being voted upon," etc., "but said corporation has neglected to comply with said request." This averment is sufficient to authorize the stockholders to sue in their own names, if any previous request was necessary to give them that right. Circumstanced as this case is charged to have been, it would seem any previous request would obviously have been denied, and therefore it was not necessary to prefer it. Tuscaloosa Mfg. Co. v. Cox, 68 Ala. 71; Nathan v. Tompkins, 83 Ala. 487; Merchants & P. Line v. Wagoner, 71 Ala. 581; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 673, note a; Dodge v. Wholsey, 59 U. S. 18 How. 831 [15 L. ed. 401]; Haves v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450 [28 L. ed. 827].

We have stated above that the complainants' bill makes a case for an injunction, restraining the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company, its agents, directors and all other persons representing it and in its interest, from voting the shares of stock held by that company. We have forbore to state one imperfection in the bill until this time. Many of the essential averments of the bill are stated in this form: Complainants are "informed and believe," or are "advised and believe," without any allegation or charge that the information or advice is true. This form of allegation has always been held in this court to be insufficient. It is not an averment that the information or advice is true, but that the pleader believes it to be true. A full denial of such averment would be, either that complainants had not received such information or advice, or if they received it, they did not believe it. This would not present the issue sought to be raised. 1 Brick. Dig. p. 702, §§ 907, 908. We will not, however, dissolve the injunction for this imperfection in pleading. Should it not be remedied within a reasonable time, it will become the duty of the chancellor to act upon the bill as if the imperfect averments pointed out had not been made.

The decree of the chancellor is modified, and the cause remanded. Let the appellees pay the cost of appeal.

Modified and remanded.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Levi L. WHITNEY
v.
WHEELER COTTON MILLS.

John RHODES v. SAME.

Mowry LAPHAM v. SAME.

(....Mass....)

1. The grant to a lower riparian proprietor of the right to have a quantity of water come down the stream sufficient to run two paper engines as used in the grantor's paper mill does not include a right to the amount required to run the entire mill including all the other machinery therein, although it is only such as is necessary for a mill running two engines, where the engines were run by a separate water wheel with which no other machinery was connected.
2. A provision in a deed granting lower riparian rights requiring the grantees to contribute towards the expense of maintaining the dam, flume and gate at the outlet of the reservoir does not alone give him the right to have the water held back for his benefit.
3. Although an upper riparian proprietor cannot be compelled to hold back water for the benefit of the owners below him, yet he cannot unreasonably interfere with the natural flow of the stream, and send down a great deal more than the usual quantity at times, and by so doing leave none for a long time afterwards to maintain the stream in its usual condition.
4. A grant to a riparian proprietor of the right to draw a certain quantity of water from the grantor's pond each day, and no more, confers no right to have the water held back so that there may at all times be enough in the pond to supply the given amount. The grantor, however, will not be permitted to unreasonably let down the water for his own convenience and thereby render nugatory the right of his grantees to obtain water.

5. An estate granted by deed cannot be expanded by recitals or statements of the grantor made in a later deed to the injury of an intervening title.

6. Riparian rights are not lost by nonuser.

RESERVATION from the Supreme Judicial Court for Worcester County for the opinion of the full court, upon a master's report and exceptions thereto, of a suit to establish certain alleged riparian rights and to enjoin an interference therewith. Judgment for plaintiffs.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rice, King & Rice and John Hopkins for plaintiffs.

Messrs. F. P. Goulding and D. B. Hubbard for defendant.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The several plaintiffs and the defendant are respectively the owners of mill sites and privileges upon Mill Brook, a stream which flows from Singletary Pond to Blackstone River. The defendant corporation owns the first or upper privilege. The plaintiffs own respectively as follows: The plaintiff Whitney owns the second privilege, the plaintiff Lapham the third, and the plaintiff Rhodes the fourth and the seventh. The owners of the fifth and sixth privileges are not before us. The plaintiffs complain of the manner in which the defendant regulates and manages the flow of water from Single-

NOTE.—Riparian rights.

A riparian proprietor upon a natural stream should use the water in such a manner that every riparian proprietor further down the stream should have the use and enjoyment of it substantially according to its natural flow, subject to such interruption as is necessary and unavoidable by the reasonable and proper use of the water in the stream above. Chandler v. Howland, 7 Gray, 348; Ware v. Allen, 1 New Eng. Rep. 733, 140 Mass. 513. See Burk v. Simonson, 1 West. Rep. 190, 104 Ind. 173.

Each riparian owner is entitled to a reasonable use of the water for domestic, agricultural and manufacturing purposes, so far as it is reasonable, conformable to the usages and wants of the community. Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co., 4 L. R. A. 572, 80 Ala. 567.

The reasonableness of a use of land which obstructs the flow of surface water over it is determined by its operation upon the interests of all parties affected by it. Rindge v. Sargent, 4 New Eng. Rep. 523, 64 N. H. 294.

Every riparian owner has a private property right to the reasonable use of running water, qualified, however, by the requirement that it must be enjoyed with reference to the similar rights of other riparian owners. Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co. supra.

The accustomed course of a natural stream which a riparian owner is entitled to have preserved is the natural and apparently permanent course existing when the right is asserted or called in question. 7 L. R. A.

tion. Withers v. Purchase, 60 L. T. N. S. 819, 40 Alb. L. J. 214.

The owner of higher land has the right to have surface water pass off through natural drains through servient lands. Anderson v. Henderson, 14 West. Rep. 109, 124 Ill. 154.

But he cannot remove natural barriers and let upon the lower land water that would not naturally flow in that direction. Ibid.

When two tracts of land are adjacent, and one is lower than the other, the owner of the upper tract has an easement of the lower land to the extent of the water naturally flowing from the upper land at and upon the lower tract, and any damage that may be occasioned to the lower land thereby is damnum absque injuria. Boynton v. Longley, 19 Nev. 69.

It is only when the flow of water on one person's land is identified with that on his neighbor's by being traceable to it along a distinct and defined course that the two proprietors can have natural relations with each other in respect of it, considered as the subject of separate existence. Jones v. Weitershausen (Pa.), 25 W. N. C. 209.

When two mill owners whose mills are on the same stream, one below the other, have a mutual interest in the upper dam, used as a reservoir for storing water to propel the machinery of both mills, they are, in the absence of any contract, under a mutual duty to maintain the dam; and a court of equity will compel each to contribute to its maintenance in proportion to his relative interest, so long as he exercises his right to the water. Webb v. Laird, 3 New Eng. Rep. 533, 59 Vt. 103.

tary Pond, and allege that at times the defendant wrongfully keeps back the water, and at other times wrongfully sends down too much; and they pray for an injunction, and also for a decree establishing the respective rights of the parties in Singletary Pond, and in Mill Brook, and also for damages.

The cases come before us upon a master's report and numerous exceptions taken by the defendant thereto, with such portions of the evidence as the parties deemed important. We shall not be able to do much more than to declare the general rights of the parties, upon the cases as presented, leaving them to make before a single justice such further application for the settlement of the decrees, or otherwise, as may be necessary.

Many things heretofore controverted may now be briefly disposed of as conceded, or as immaterial, in the view we take of the principal questions respecting which the parties are at issue. It may now be assumed that Caleb Burbank was the owner of all the mill-sites and privileges in 1825, when he began to make conveyances, together with all the right which anybody had, by means of a dam, gate, etc., at the outlet, to regulate and control the flow of water from the pond. This is not now controverted by either party. The upper site had upon it a paper mill operated by Burbank. There has been some question which of the two outlets of the pond was the original one; but as both outlets come together before passing the first privilege, it is not material to determine which was the original one. It is also now admitted that the foreclosure of the mortgage from Burbank to Waldo, which is the foundation of the defendant's title, was valid.

It will be convenient to consider, in the first place, what rights the parties respectively acquired under their deeds; and afterwards to see if these rights were varied by any adverse user or prescription, on one side or the other.

The first deed in the order of time was a conveyance which included the fourth privilege, now owned by the plaintiff Rhodes. This was a deed from Caleb Burbank to Benedict and Braman, dated January 8, 1825, of a described parcel of land on Mill Brook, with a right to erect mills at such place on the premises as to command a certain defined and limited head and fall of water; also with the right to the grantees, their heirs and assigns (when necessary to drive their works), to hoist the gate at said Crooked Pond [which was another name for Singletary Pond] so as to let as much water run as shall be equivalent to carrying two engines in the grantor's paper mill, when the grantor does not suffer so much to pass at his paper mill; but when the grantor, his heirs or assigns permit that quantity to pass the paper mill, the grantees, their heirs and assigns are not to meddle with said gate or draw any more water, nor are they to draw said quantity at any time except from six of the clock in the forenoon to six in the afternoon of each working day, and the grantees, their heirs and assigns are to be at their just proportion of the expense of maintaining the gate, flume, dam, etc., at Crooked Pond, and of making improvements upon the same when necessary for the common benefit.

The second deed in the order of time was a conveyance which included the seventh privilege, which is also now owned by Rhodes. This was a deed from Burbank to Timothy H. Longley, dated May 1, 1825, of a described parcel on Mill Brook, with a certain right of flowing the land above: "I also give and grant to the said Longley, his heirs and assigns, the privilege, when it may be necessary for the purpose of keeping in operation mills which

The upper owner cannot vary the flow of the stream so as to cause injury to the lower owner by any alteration in the conformation of his land, as by removing a ledge of rock. Grant v. Kuglar, 3 L. R. A. 606, 81 Ga. 637.

A riparian owner may grant a part of his estate, not abutting on the stream, and, as appurtenant thereto, a right to draw water from the stream through his remaining land; and for any diversion of the natural flow of the stream disturbing such right, the grantee may maintain an action. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. Minneapolis (Minn.) 43 N. W. Rep. 56.

But he cannot authorize, as against a lower proprietor, a company to take water from the stream, to be conducted to a distance and sold. Heilbron v. Fowler Switch Canal Co. 75 Cal. 428.

The riparian owner on a non-tidal navigable stream has all the rights of a riparian owner, not inconsistent with the public easement. Ibid.

Upper and lower mill owners.

The owner or occupant of a water-power may lawfully pass through his dam the entire volume of water naturally flowing in the stream, but must not increase such volume to the injury of adjoining lands. Boyington v. Squires, 71 Wis. 276.

Where an upper mill owner detains water in his reservoir long enough to operate his mill for five hours in dry seasons, which occur for three months of the year, and thereby causes lower mills to lie idle for five days at a time, such use of the water is 7 L. R. A.

unreasonable and should be enjoined. Mason v. Hoyle, 6 New Eng. Rep. 629, 56 Conn. 256.

But he has the right to stop the natural flow long enough to fill up the pond or reservoir created by his dam, and keep it full for the use of his mill; and will be liable to the lower owner only when the use and detention of the water is unreasonable. Caldwell v. Sanderson, 69 Wis. 52.

So long as his dam stands, he must vent the waters for mill owners below, so that each shall have the natural flow of the stream, except so far as the flow is modified by successive riparian proprietors. Stevens v. Kelley (Me.) 5 New Eng. Rep. 871.

One owning a suitable place for a mill site cannot be deprived of it because someone else has wrongfully interfered with the stream above him, unless the interference has continued for such length of time as to bar a suit or indicate acquiescence. Koopman v. Blodgett, 14 West. Rep. 309, 70 Mich. 616.

A lower proprietor may set back the water in its natural state to the boundary of the upper proprietor, but he cannot by a dam or log jams so as to impede the running of his mills. Richards v. Peters, 14 West. Rep. 623, 70 Mich. 236.

An upper proprietor cannot, merely because at times the lower proprietor partially obstructs the operation of his mills, entirely abandon their use, and claim damages therefor, unless the obstruction renders their operation impossible with profit. Ibid.

the grantee may have upon the premises, of raising the gate of the grantor, which is situated in the great canal, so called, at the outlet of the pond known by the name of Crooked Pond, so as to let so much water run as shall be equivalent to carrying two engines in the grantor's paper mill by means of a breast-wheel, whenever the grantor does not suffer so much to pass to the works which shall be erected upon the premises: but when the grantor, his heirs or assigns shall permit so much water to pass to the premises aforesaid, the grantee, his heirs or assigns are not to meddle with said gate, nor draw any more water, nor are they to draw said quantity at any time except from six o'clock in the morning to six o'clock in the evening of each working day, and the grantee, his heirs or assigns are to be at their joint proportion of the expense of maintaining the gate, flume, dam, etc., at Crooked Pond, and of making improvements upon the same, when necessary for the common benefit."

The third deed in the order of time was a conveyance which included the second privilege, now owned by the plaintiff Whitney. This was a deed from Burbank to Hervey Waters, dated September 1, 1828, of three lots, with a certain right of flowing the land above. "Furthermore, if the said Burbank, his heirs or assigns shall neglect to draw water from Singletary Pond sufficient to carry two engines, as now running in the grantor's mill from five A. M. to seven P. M. on each working day, said Waters, his heirs or assigns shall have a lawful right to draw so much water, at any time so neglected by the grantor or his assigns, and no more, and said Waters, his heirs or assigns shall be at equal expense in erecting, making or repairing the dam, flume or gates at Singletary Pond with the other owner of privileges from said pond."

The fourth deed in the order of time was a mortgage, which included the third mill-site, now owned by the plaintiff Lapham. This mortgage was given by Burbank to Stephen Salisbury, dated March 23, 1829, and included various other parcels of land besides the mill-site, but it contained no specific grant of rights of water in the pond or stream. This mortgage was duly foreclosed.

The titles under the above deeds all came by mesne conveyance to the several plaintiffs.

The title of the defendant is derived from Burbank, through a mortgage given by him to Sarah Waldo, dated April 16, 1820, of various parcels of land, one of which included the first or upper privilege, situated "immediately below the outlet of Crooked Pond, so called, with the mills and privileges thereon and thereto belonging." This mortgage was duly foreclosed, possession for breach of condition having been given in 1843.

In order to determine what was the extent of the rights granted by the first three of the deeds above mentioned, it is, of course, proper to read the deeds in the light of the facts which existed and were known to both parties at the time when the deeds were given; and having done this, the extent of the grant must depend upon the meaning of the word used.

Apparently having this rule in mind, the master has made a finding as follows: "I find that Caleb Burbank, when he made these grants of water rights in said deeds of the plaintiffs' and defendant's privileges, in 1825 and thereafter, as above recited, had adapted his paper mill, as a water mill, to the capacity of the stream, so regulated in its flow from Singletary Pond as a reservoir, as to produce a constant and uniform volume of water during each working day of the year, and not being then familiar with the use of the term 'horse power,' as the measure of motive power in the operation of mills, he adopted the requirements of his paper mills, as then run, to wit, 'two paper engines' and the machinery then necessarily used therewith in making paper, as the measure of the rights of the grantees, their heirs and assigns, in their respective grants, as aforesaid, from him, in the waters of said reservoir and stream therefrom, retaining for the owner of the upper privilege the care and management of the reservoir gate, subject to the rights of the owners below, under the grants, to hoist said gate when necessary to give a regular and uniform flow of said stream in quantity or volume, so measured by the use and requirements of said paper mill—all owners of privileges on said stream to contribute equally in the expense of maintaining said reservoir for their common benefit."

Two questions arise upon this finding: (1) whether, assuming the facts to be as thus stated, the language of the deeds can be so stretched as to give to the several grantees a right to enforce such a regulation of the water as to produce a constant and uniform volume of water during each working day of the year; and (2) whether the evidence warrants a finding that such was the intention of the grantor in giving the deeds. We are unable to agree with the finding of the master in either particular.

The language of the deeds does not permit the construction put upon them by the master. It is of no consequence how Burbank operated his own mill or managed or regulated the water for his own convenience and benefit. What he conveyed to these grantees was the ordinary right of riparian owners, except that they were only entitled to have a certain specified and limited quantity of water sent down the stream during certain hours of every working day. If that quantity should come, it was expressly stipulated in the first two deeds that the grantees should not meddle with the gate, or draw any more water; while in the third deed it was specified that if the grantor should neglect to draw that quantity, the grantees might draw so much, and no more. In any event their right was expressly limited to that quantity of water, which in each deed was described as being what would be sufficient to carry or equivalent to carrying two engines in the grantor's mill, for so many hours a day, the number of hours being greater in the last deed; and thus in respect to the quantity of water which they were entitled to have flow in the stream, their right was not quite that of ordinary riparian owners. There is not in either deed anything giving to the grantee a right to have the water held back for his benefit. The only provision that looks at all like an understanding between the parties that the water should be held back for the benefit of the grantees is that which subjects the grantees to a part of the expense of maintaining the dam, flume and gate at the outlet of the pond. If there were any other words going to indicate such a right on their part, this provision would certainly lend support to that construction. But this provision of itself alone by no means contains so much. The accumulation of water in Singletary Pond by means of a dam would naturally and almost necessarily be of some benefit to the various mill owners on the stream. The three deeds all include a recognition that the grantor in the first instance was to have the care of the gate. The matter that was stipulated for was the quantity of water that should be sent down; not the duty of the grantor in holding back water. It is possible that if the present methods of using water had been foreseen the parties might have stipulated for having the water held back, as well as for sending it down; but they did not do so. Even if it could be made to appear that they intended to do so, we are unable to find in the words which they used anything which imposes that duty upon the grantor.

But, moreover, the evidence is not sufficient, in our opinion, to warrant a finding that the grantor so intended, or that, in the words of the master's report, he "adopted the requirement of his paper mill, as then run, with two paper engines, and the machinery then necessarily used therewith in making paper, as the measure of the rights of the grantees," both as to letting down and holding back water. The paper engines, which, as we understand it, were machines for beating up pulp, were operated by water coming through a separate aperture and to a separate wheel, which did not carry other machinery. We cannot accept the conclusion that when the grantor specified two paper engines he meant to include all the other machinery in his paper mill. Nor are we able to find any sufficient evidence that he intended to be bound for all time to regulate the water for the benefit of the grantees as he was then regulating it for his own benefit. If such had been the intention, it would most likely have been expressly stated. The grantees might well expect in the natural course of things to get a benefit from the maintenance of the dam and gate; not necessarily by having the water held back and delivered with reference to their special convenience, but because the water would be so accumulated that a less proportion would run to waste. In the absence of any stipulation or acquired right to the contrary, the owner of an upper privilege may make a reasonable use of the water and obstruct and accumulate it in a reasonable way for the benefit of his own mill, whatever may be the effect upon the owners below. Springfield v. Harris, 4 Allen, 494; Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216, 219.

But he must not withhold or let down the water in an unreasonable manner. Clapp v. Herrick, 129 Mass. 292.

And the grantee of a lower privilege gets no right to the use of a reservoir owned by the grantor, unless it is so specified in the deed, even although necessary for the beneficial use of his mill. Brace v. Yale, 4 Allen, 393.

The grantor had a going mill, with certain machinery. As a measure of power granted, he selected a certain portion of that machinery and agreed that if at any time he should not be sending down enough water to carry the specified portion of his machinery, the grantees might come up and raise his gate and draw that quantity of water, and he bound them to bear a proportion of the expense of maintaining the gate, flume and dam, not of managing them. There is no occasion for inferring that the grantor intended to grant any greater right in respect to the use of the water than what is according to the plain and natural meaning of the words used.

But since a riparian proprietor has a right to insist that the water shall not be unreasonably withheld or let down by an owner above, an owner of a stream at the outlet of a great pond, who by digging out the channel and erecting a dam at the edge of the pond can hold back all the water or quickly draw it down nearly to low water mark, has no right by virtue of his position unreasonably to interfere with the natural flow of the stream, so as to give the riparian proprietors below a great deal more than the usual quantity of water during a part of the year, and little or none during the remainder of the year. While he is not obliged to hold back the water for the benefit of the owners below, he cannot lawfully let it down in such a way as to leave none for a long time afterwards to maintain the stream in its usual condition.

Three of the deeds above mentioned recognize the existence of a dam, flume and gates at the outlet of the pond by which the discharge of water is to be regulated, and they give to the grantees a right to raise the gate and let down the stipulated quantity of water whenever the grantor does not suffer so much to pass at that point. While we hold that these provisions do not require the grantor to maintain the dam and gate and regulate the flow of water for the grantees and their successors, nor limit his right reasonably to use the water, even though the quantity used may exceed that required by them, and may leave in the pond too little to supply the amount mentioned in the deeds, it is at the same time manifest that he cannot under these contracts unreasonably let down the water for his own convenience, and thereby render nugatory the right of his grantees to open the gates and obtain water for their mills. If he assumes for his own purposes to regulate the discharge of water from the pond, he must do it with a reasonable regard to the rights of the owners below, having reference to the size and nature of the stream, and the uses to which it is adapted. Clapp v. Herrick, supra.

The plaintiffs introduced in evidence a deed from Caleb Burbank to Goddard and Mills, dated September 12, 1833, of the upper privilege; granting "also a right to draw water from Singletary Pond, so called, sufficient to carry two engines in the paper mill as now used, or all water that naturally runs in the stream together with all privileges."

The plaintiffs contend that, although the title conveyed by this deed has been cut off by the foreclosure of the Waldo mortgage, yet this deed may be referred to in aid of the construction to be given to the deeds under which they claim title, and that it shows that the grantor considered the quantity of water which was sufficient to carry the two engines as equivalent to all the water that naturally ran in the stream. For some purposes, no doubt, the recitals in ancient deeds are competent evidence, as, for example, to show the position of a natural boundary (Drury v. Midland R. Co. 127 Mass. 571, 581); or to show pedigree. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 104.

This doctrine, however, does not extend so far as to allow the estate granted in a prior deed to be expanded by recitals or statements of the grantor in a later deed, to the injury of an intervening title. After making the mortgage to Waldo in 1889, the grantor could not impair the rights thereby conveyed by statements in a subsequent deed, or otherwise, to the effect that by grants made prior thereto he had intended to convey more than those grants of themselves would include. Moreover, it is at least open to question whether the true meaning of the words in the deed to Goddard and Mills is not that Burbank thereby grants the right to draw water sufficient to carry the two engines, in any event, or all the water that naturally runs in the stream in case such natural flow should be greater than would be sufficient for that purpose.

We are therefore of the opinion that the water rights granted by the first three deeds in the order of time were the ordinary rights of riparian owners, except that the right of each grantee to draw water was limited to a certain quantity during the specified hours of each working day, and that the grantor had no right to hold back the water so that less than that limited quantity would flow down. And if he did so the grantees might themselves raise the gate of the outlet of the pond and let down water in that quantity; but that the grantees acquired thereby no right to have the water in the pond held back for their benefit.

The plaintiff Lapham, the owner of the third privilege, derives his title under a mortgage which made no special mention of water rights, and therefore the grantee took, as riparian proprietor, a right to the whole natural flow of the stream, subject to such reasonable use of the water by upper owners as the common law allows. Tourtillot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370.

This right, as has already been stated, does not include the right to have the water held back for his benefit by means of the reservoir and dam above, which the owner of the upper privilege may have a right of using reasonably and properly for his own benefit; but it does include the right to a larger quantity of water than the owners of the other privileges had, provided the natural flow of the stream would furnish it.

The master finds that the plaintiffs have lost by nonuser and abandonment the right to have the water come down in excess of ten hours for each working day. The defendant, however, concedes in its brief that there is no evidence to support his finding, and we discover none. Moreover, the rights of riparian owners are not lost in this way. Johnson v. Jordan, 2 Met. 234, 239.

Lapham was merely a riparian owner, and the other plaintiffs had the rights of riparian owners, subject to the qualifications contained in their respective deeds.

The defendant, as the owner of the upper privilege, and of the dam, flume and gate at the outlet of the pond, acquired by the conveyance the right to control the gate and manage and regulate the flow of the water, except that it must not thereby interfere with the rights of the owners below. To Lapham, the defendant was bound to send the whole natural flow of the stream, subject to such reasonable obstructions and accumulations and prior uses as might properly be made for the defendant's own benefit. To the other plaintiffs, the defendant was bound to send down the quantity of water called for by their several deeds, without reference to the convenience of operating its own mills; though this duty would probably be suspended in case a temporary stoppage should become necessary for repairs, or other emergency, outside of the usual course of the operation of the mill. Hankey v. Clark, 110 Mass. 262; Gould v. Boston Duck Co. 13 Gray, 442; Pitts v. Lancaster Mills, 18 Met. 156; Drake v. Hamilton Woolen Co. 99 Mass. 580.

Having reached these conclusions as to the rights of the respective parties under their deeds, it is further to be considered if these rights have been varied by any adverse user or prescription, on one side or the other.

The master having found that the grantees in the first three deeds in the order of time, by the true construction of their grants, were entitled to have the flow of water regulated for their benefit, did not find that they had gained any right by prescription, nor is it contended in the argument that either of the plaintiffs has gained in this manner any greater right than his deed conveyed. Nor do we see any evidence to warrant such a claim. But the defendant earnestly contends that it had gained a right by prescription to manage the flow of water from the pond for its own benefit, in the manner in which it has of late years been accustomed to do; that is, by retarding the natural flow at times, and at other times letting down more than the natural flow, as suited its own advantage. The master has found to the contrary, and an examination of the evidence fails to satisfy us that this claim of right on the part of the defendant is made out. The importance of clear evidence to sustain a claim of this description was remarked upon by Judge Story, in Tyler v. Wilkinson, 4 Mason, 397, 404.

It appears to us that the acts of the defendant in this direction have been gradual, and that the right now contended for has never been openly asserted till it was done by Redding, the defendant's superintendent, within a few years. The defendant has not suggested any particular time or manner in which it or its predecessors in title acquired by purchase, grant or release any additional right to that conveyed by the mortgage to Waldo. In 1836, when the depositions in perpetuum were taken, there was no intimation of such a claim. In 1861 and 1864, when the owners of lower privileges assert that they contributed money towards the expense of repairs, as they were bound to do under their deeds, we find no intimation of any claim by the owner of the upper privilege that their rights under their deeds had been impaired. In short, looking at the testimony which is reported, all of which has been examined with reference to this point, though it is not necessary to refer to it here in detail, we are satisfied with the finding of the master that the defendant has not acquired the right by prescription to control the reservoir and the flow of the stream therefrom; and therefore the rights of the defendant must depend upon the deeds.

It appears by the evidence that Redding, the defendant's superintendent, while acting within the scope of his authority, has practically denied the plaintiffs' rights, and exercised in behalf of the defendant in recent years a larger authority than it rightfully possesses to control the flow of the water. The defendant's answers contain a similar claim. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to maintain their bills for relief, but the scheme proposed by the master for regulating and apportioning the flow of the water of the stream will have to be given up, and his various findings which are inconsistent with the conclusions above expressed must be disregarded.

Ordered accordingly.

Messa Gammage & Gammage for appellee.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case presented by the petition in this suit being novel, we were in doubt whether the facts alleged showed a cause of action, and for that reason set aside the submission at the last term, and requested counsel to submit arguments upon that question. The question has been argued, and the cause again submitted for determination. The defendant below, the appellee here, interposed an exception to the petition on the ground that he was not sued in the county of his residence, and the exception was sustained by the court. The correctness of that ruling depends upon the nature of the suit. The petition alleges, in substance, that plaintiffs were husband and wife, and were in possession under a lease of a dwelling-house and land belonging to defendant; that the wife was well advanced in pregnancy, and that defendant knew the fact, and that he was also aware that any undue excitement to a lady in that condition was likely to produce a serious injury to her health; that, notwithstanding these facts, he came to plaintiff's house, and in the yard, and in the immediate presence of the wife, he assaulted two negroes in a boisterous and violent manner, and that the assault was accompanied with profane language, and resulted in drawing blood. It was also alleged that defendant's conduct frightened Mrs. Hill, and brought on the pains of labor, and eventually produced a miscarriage, and otherwise seriously impaired her health.

After a very careful consideration of the petition, we are of opinion that its allegations show a cause of action. We have found no exact precedent for such an action, but that is no sufficient reason why an action should not be sustained. That a physical personal injury may be produced through a strong emotion of the mind there can be no doubt. The fact that it is more difficult to produce such an injury through the operation of the mind than by direct physical means affords no sufficient ground for refusing compensation, in an action at law, when the injury is intentionally or negligently inflicted. It may be more difficult to prove the connection between the alleged cause and the injury, but if it be proved, and the injury be the proximate result of the cause, we cannot say that a recovery should not be had. Probably an action will not lie when there is no injury except the suffering of the fright itself, but such is not the present case. Here, according to the allegations in the petition, the defendant has produced a bodily injury by means of that emotion, and it is for that injury that the recovery is sought. If, in his assault upon the negroes, he had discharged a missile at one of them, and it had missed its aim, and had struck Mrs. Hill, and produced a miscarriage, there is no doubt that he would be liable to an action; and it seems to us he should be equally held liable for the same result, produced by the same conduct, except that in the one case the means of the injury is a material substance, and in the other a mental emotion. Of course, since there is no intent to injure Mrs. Hill alleged, it will be a question for the jury to determine whether his conduct, so far as she was concerned, was negligent or not; that is to say, whether, under the circumstances, and with the lights before him, a reasonably prudent man would have anticipated the danger to her or not. We have been cited by counsel for appellee to the case of Renner v. Canfield, 83 Minn. 90. In that case the defendant shot a dog near the residence of the plaintiff, and thereby frightened his wife and caused a miscarriage. The court says, in effect, that the charge to the jury was erroneous because the jury could, and would probably, infer from it that the defendant was liable in the action if the killing of the dog was unlawful; and for this error the judgment was reversed. In the opinion the court says: "If the acts of defendant amounted to any tort which, in any possible view of the case, could be held to be the proximate cause of the injuries complained of, the gist of it must be negligence in shooting in such proximity to a human residence as might naturally and reasonably be anticipated to be liable to injure the inmates by fright or otherwise. We are by no means prepared to say that upon the evidence a verdict for plaintiff could be sustained even upon that ground. But it is enough, here, to say that the case was not submitted to the jury upon any such theory."

It is evident that the court did not decide that no action would lie even under the peculiar facts of that case. Besides, it appeared in that case that the defendant was not aware of the proximity of the plaintiff's wife at the time he discharged the gun.

We think the petition in this case discloses a cause of action, and this conclusion brings us to the question originally presented in appellant's brief. The petition alleged the residence of defendant to be in Leon County, and that the injury was inflicted in Freestone County, in which the suit was brought. The defendant excepted to the petition because the action was not brought in the county of his residence. The ruling of the court in sustaining the petition is assigned as error.

Our Statute provides that no person who is an inhabitant of the State shall be sued out of the county of his domicile except in certain cases. Rev. Stat. art. 1198.

Among the exceptions is the following: "Where the foundation of the suit is some crime or offense or trespass for which a civil action in damages may lie, in which case the suit may be brought in the county where such crime or offense or trespass was committed, or in the county where the defendant has his domicile." Rev. Stat. art. 1198 (ex. 8).

It is clear that, unless the action in this case can be classed as a trespass within the meaning of that term in the provision quoted, the suit was improperly brought in Freestone County, and the determination of that point depends upon the further question whether the word is used in that Statute in its most restricted, or in a more enlarged, legal sense. In its widest signification, it means any violation of law. In its most restricted sense, it signifies an injury intentionally inflicted by force either upon the person or property of another. But it still has a signification in law much more narrow than the first, and more enlarged than the second, meaning given, and embraces all cases where injury is done to the person or to property, and is the indirect result of wrongful force. Abb. Law Dict. Trespass.

In this last sense the word would include injuries to persons or property which are the result of the negligence of the wrong-doer, and it seems to us more in consonance with the purpose and spirit of the exception to hold that it was in this sense that it intended that the word should be understood. We presume the exception was made in the interest of the injured party, and not of the wrong-doer; and we see no good reason why a distinction should be made between an injury resulting from intentional violence and one resulting from negligence. It occurs to us the consideration which induced the exception was that one who had been injured in his person or his property by the willful or negligent conduct of another should not be driven to a distant forum to get a redress of his wrongs.

In the case of Ten Eyck v. Runk, 81 N. J. L. 428, the Supreme Court of New Jersey construed the word "trespass," as used in a statute of that State, as descriptive of a class of actions, and held that it was not used in its most restricted sense, but applied also to all actions of trespass on the case. See also Cook v. Hertman, 2 White & W. Civil Cas. 770.

If, as we think, the word "trespass," in our Statute, was intended to embrace, not only actions of trespass proper, as known to the common law, but also actions of trespass on the case, it is clear that the action in this case was properly brought in Freestone County, and that the court had jurisdiction over the person of the defendant.

We conclude that the court erred in sustaining the exception to the petition; and for this error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ERROR to the District Court for Galveston County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages from a landlord for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the defective condition of the leased premises. Affirmed.

Commissioner's opinion.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. L. E. Trezevant for plaintiff in error.

No appearance for defendant in error.

Collard, J., delivered the following opinion:

Suit by plaintiff in error, servant of a tenant, against defendant in error, the owner of the rented premises, for damages resulting from the falling of a cistern. The petition alleged that defendant, the owner of the premises, leased them to A. Watts to use as a restaurant; that he was employed by Watts; that there was a cistern upon the premises of the capacity of 8,000 gallons, which, because of its defective support (the same being decayed and insufficient) and because of the weight of water it contained, fell upon plaintiff while he was in the discharge of his duties, without his fault, causing serious and permanent physical injuries; that the defect in the cistern existed at and before the lease to Watts; that defendant knew of the defect in the cistern and its supports before the injury, and, at the request of Watts, had promised to have the same repaired before it fell, but had failed and neglected so to do; that plaintiff was at the time of the injury ignorant of the unsafe condition of the cistern; that its bad condition was not the result of temporary and unusual use and wear, but of age and natural decay. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and the case is here on writ of error, with a general assignment by plaintiff that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. There is no brief on file for defendant.

It is well settled that the owner of leased premises is liable to the public or to third persons for injuries resulting from a defective structure on the premises, when the defect existed at the time the lease was made, or when he had covenanted to repair and keep in repair. Thomp. Neg. 817; Marshall v. Heard, 59 Tex. 267; Owings v. Jones, 9 Md. 108; Grady v. Wolsner, 46 Ala. 381; Helwig v. Jordan, 53 Ind. 21.

The case at bar is not an action by a stranger, but by the servant of a tenant against the owner; and in such case the rule seems to be that the landlord is liable only when he had contracted or is under obligation to keep the tenement in repair, or has been guilty of fraud or deceit which would release the tenant from his implied obligation to repair.

"It is a general rule," says Mr. Thompson

NOTE.—Negligence; dangerous premises.
Whether a building has been made unsafe by the agency of time or the acts of trespassers is immaterial as affecting the owner's liability, where it was within his power to prevent such condition, as, in either event, it is the owner's duty to keep his in his work on Negligence (vol. 1, p. 823, § 3) "that, in the absence of fraud or deceit, there is no implied covenant that the demised premises are fit for occupation, or for the particular use which the tenant intends to make of them. . . . Therefore the tenant has no remedy against the landlord for suffering the premises to get out of repair, . . . and this rule extends to servants and others entering under the tenant's title."

In Jaffe v. Harteau, 56 N. Y. 401, the court states the doctrine as announced in the foregoing quotation, and says: "The question must be regarded as settled by authority." The action in that case was against the landlord for an injury of the wife of the sub-lessee, and, referring to the case of Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387, which held a contrary doctrine, says that, in that case, "some importance was attached to the fact that the building was erected by the defendant. This may have been regarded as proper in that case, as tending to show him guilty of fraud;" and the court proceeds to show that cases where one erects a nuisance on his premises, and afterwards parts with the possession, have no application to the case under consideration; and then concludes, that "there is no reason for holding the lessor, in the absence of any agreement or fraud, liable to the tenant for the present or future condition of the premises, that would not be equally applicable to a similar liability sought to be imposed by a grantee in fee upon his grantor." The following cases, besides those cited in the foregoing case, assert the same doctrine, that there must be an express covenant or agreement by the lessor to keep in repair, in order to make him liable to the tenant. Scott v. Simon, 54 N. H. 431; Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341; O'Brien v. Capwell, 59 Barb. 497.

The last case cited is, in principle, like the one before us. The action was by a washerwoman in the employ of the tenant, against the landlord, and the court held that where there is no fraud, false representations or deceit, and, in the absence of an express warranty or covenant to repair, there is no implied covenant in favor of the tenant; and, as the plaintiff stood in his place, there was no liability on the part of the landlord to her.

The authorities are abundant sustaining the doctrine that the owner cannot create a nuisance on his premises, and relieve himself of liability to a third person injured thereby, by leasing. It is also the law that he would be liable to a stranger where the defective structure causing the injury is on the premises when they are leased; but such liability would not exist in favor of the tenant, where there is no contract by the landlord to repair, and no fraud, because he does not owe the tenant the duty of repairing, as he does the public and strangers.

The cases cited by plaintiff, holding the landlord liable, are cases where the injury was to third persons lawfully upon the rented premises, or where the landlord owed a duty to the public to repair. The cases cited are Albert v. State, 66 Md. 325, 6 Cent. Rep. 447; Rankin v. Ingwersen, 49 N. J. L. 481, 8 Cent. Rep. 371; Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 553, 4 New Eng. Rep. 796; Delay v. Savage, 143 Mass. 83, 4 New Eng. Rep. 863. The first case was a suit by a minor for damages for death of parents who were drowned in consequence of the negligence of the owner of a wharf leased. The next case was a suit by a tenant of one part of a building for damages resulting from the bursting of water pipes in another part of the building, occupied by another tenant, who had covenanted to repair, where it was held that the landlord of the tenant on whose premises the pipes were defective was liable. The next case was where the owner of a defective wharf leased it in a defective condition. It was held that he was liable to one lawfully using it for the purposes for which it was intended. The court held both lessor and lessee liable.

Delay v. Savage, the next case cited, was an action for damages by a person who, while lawfully using a way abutting leased premises, fell into a coal-hole upon the way.

In none of these cases was the suit by the tenant, or the servant of the tenant, of the premises, having the defective structure upon them, and none of them is authority for the proposition that the landlord would be liable to such tenant or servant, where he was under no obligation or contract to repair. The mere fact that there was a nuisance on the premises at the time the property was rented would ordinarily render the lessor accountable for damages to a stranger lawfully passing thereon, whether he contracted to repair or not; and, in case he had not so contracted, both the lessor and lessee would be liable.

It is alleged, however, in plaintiff's petition, that he did not know of the defects in the supports of the cistern, but that defendant did know the fact at and before the injury, and that at the request of her tenant, Waits, she had promised to make the necessary repairs, but had failed and refused to do so. This allegation may have been set up to show that defendant was liable, because she had so promised and contracted. The promise was merely gratuitous, not made at the time of the lease, and was no part of the original contract. It was without consideration, and could not be enforced.

building in a safe condition. Tucker v. Illinois, Cent. R. Co. 7 So. Rep. 124.

One who enters the private apartments of another at the mere license of the latter does so subject to all the attendant risks. Schmidt v. Bauer, 5 L. R. A. 580, and note, 80 Cal. 565.

Placing an iron railing with pointed top around an area in front of a house is not negligence such as to create a liability for injuries by one of such points to the hand of a traveler, which he puts out to save himself from falling when he slips on an icy pavement. Kelly v. Bennett (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 120, and note, 25 W. N. C. 303, 7 L. R. A.

Where a tenant who has long lived in the building, and knows that the cellar stairs are rickety and dangerous, goes down them for a mere trifle, and is injured, she is guilty of contributory negligence; and the fact that her landlord has had notice to repair the stairs and has failed to do so is immaterial. Town v. Armstrong, 75 Mich. 580.

Owner of private premises not liable for neglect to keep them in repair. See note to Schmidt v. Bauer (Cal.) 5 L. R. A. 580.

If nuisance is created by owner, damages are recoverable. See note to Wasson v. Pettit (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 794.

There is a case similar to this, where the suit was brought by the tenant. He had requested the landlord to repair a privy attached to the tenement, and the landlord agreed to do so. He, with some common laborers, attempted to make the repairs. Reported to the tenant's wife that the privy was safe. She went into it the same evening, when the floor fell through, and she was precipitated into the vault, and injured. The court, discussing the case says: "In the ordinary contract between landlord and tenant, there is no implied warranty on the part of the former that the demised premises are in tenantable condition. He is under no obligation to make repairs, unless such a stipulation makes a part of the original contract; and any promise to do so, founded merely on the relation of the parties, and not one of the conditions of the lease, would be without consideration, and for that reason would create no liability. But, although a gratuitous executory contract of that kind would not be binding upon him, he would place himself in a very different position, if he should see fit to treat it as binding, and actually enter upon its fulfillment. He is at liberty to repudiate it, or to perform it at his option; but, if his choice should be to perform it he comes under some degree of liability as to the manner of its performance. Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 478, 479, and authorities cited.

We have quoted freely from this case, because it is the law of the point under consideration in the case before us, and is decisive of it. The reasoning is sound and well presented, and saves us the trouble of further discussion. We think the plaintiff's petition was bad on general demurrer, and that there was no error in the ruling of the court so holding, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for the County of San Joaquin in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a nuisance maintained by defendant. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Sharpstein, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought to recover damages caused by the falling of an awning and a portion of a brick wall upon the plaintiff while passing along upon a sidewalk under said awning. Defendants were the owners and lessors of the building to which said awning was attached. The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000. Defendants moved for a new trial on several grounds, one of them being "inefficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." The motion for a new trial was overruled, and 7 L. R. A.

from the order overruling it and the judgment this appeal is taken. There was sufficient evidence to justify a finding that the wall to which the awning was attached was not of sufficient strength to support that burden, although it did support it several months. But the evidence is abundantly sufficient to justify a finding that it was carelessness to hang such an awning to a wall in the condition that this wall is proven to have been. And somebody was guilty of carelessness in placing it there. The building, or some part of it, was occupied by tenants of appellants, and it was doubtless at the instance of those tenants that the awning was put up, and it was put up by contractors employed by said tenants. But appellants not only knew of and consented to the erection of the awning, but contributed the lumber for its construction; the tenants providing the iron used in the construction of it, and paying the contractors for the work on it.

In Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 503, this court said: "It is well settled that a landlord is not liable for such consequences, unless (1) the nuisance occasioning the injury existed at the time the premises were demised; or (2) the structure was in such a condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and the landlord failed to repair it (Jessen v. Sweigert, 66 Cal. 182; Rector v. Buckhart, 3 Hill, 193; Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567; Hussey v. Ryan (Md.) 2 Atl. Rep. 729; Wood, Nuis. §§ 295, 676; Wood, Land and Ten. 918); or (3) the landlord authorized or permitted the act which caused it to become a nuisance occasioning the injury."

In this case appellants not only authorized or permitted the act which caused the nuisance occasioning the injury, but contributed to it by furnishing material to be used in creating it. Under the rule above stated, appellants are certainly liable for the consequences of an act to which they contributed. We perceive no merit in any of the exceptions taken to the rulings of the court during the trial. The damages awarded the plaintiff are not, in our opinion, excessive, and the instruction of the court upon the subject of damages was not erroneous.

1. An engineer and fireman of a locomotive are fellow servants of a section hand.
2. Whether the proximate cause of an injury to an employé loading poles on a car was the failure of the engineer or fireman of an engine which struck the car, to ring the bell, or the negligence of the assistant road-master in ordering him to continue the work while the engine was backing down, telling him there was plenty of time, and throwing him off his guard, leading him to believe that the road-master would take care that the engine did not strike the car, is an important question in determining the liability of the employer, and if properly presented must be submitted to the jury.
3. A command to continue work, given by one standing in the master's place, will not justify a railroad employé engaged in loading a car in doing so, without attempting to save himself from danger when he sees that the near approach of an engine, of which his superior is ignorant, has rendered such continuance perilous.
4. An employé is not a fellow servant but a superior or agent, for whose acts the master is held liable, so far as he is charged with an act which the law imposes upon the master the duty to perform.
5. An assistant road-master, having general charge of a portion of a railroad, with control of all the section-gangs along that line, is not a fellow servant with a section hand so as to prevent recovery by the latter for an injury caused by the negligence of the former in ordering him to continue work while an engine is approaching, thus throwing him off his guard, and then failing to take care to prevent injury by the approach of the engine.

Messrs. Isaac M. Turner and Birney Hoyt, with Mr. John A. Fairfield, for plaintiff, appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This action is brought to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the claimed negligence of the servants of the defendant. On the trial the plaintiff had verdict and judgment for $9,000. The plaintiff had been in the employ of the defendant Company for about eight years, though for some portion of that time he had been laid off, by direction of those in charge of the works of the Company. During that time, his employment had been confined to the work as a section foreman and hand under a section boss. At the time of the injuries complained of one George Light was the defendant's assistant road-master of the western division, having charge of its tracks from Stanton to Big Rapids, and from Howard City to Saginaw, — a line of about 150 miles of defendant's road, Mr. Doyle being the general road-master. On the morning of November 11, 1887, Light, having been ordered by Doyle, the general road master, to go to Cedar Lake, east of Edmore, to move some telegraph poles, ordered two section foremen, — Cushton, to whose gang plaintiff belonged, and Horton, — to take their gangs there for that purpose. Light went with them from Edmore on a hand car, and assumed charge and direction of the work. The poles were partially loaded on a flat car standing on a side track, and in loading were piled much higher on the side of the car furthest from the pile of poles than on the other, the car being blocked up to prevent its tipping. A freight train came along on the main track from towards Edmore going eastward, when Light ordered the engine of this train to be detached for the purpose of moving the car upon which the poles were being placed to another part of the yard. The engine, on being detached, proceeded eastward beyond the switch; and, the switch being then turned, it was then backed in upon the switch towards the car upon which the plaintiff was at work, — plaintiff, with two other men, being on the east end of the car, with his back towards the approaching engine, and standing on the poles about five feet above the deck of the car. Plaintiff claims that the engine was then about sixty feet from him, when he desisted from his work, and turned his head around, looked towards the approaching engine, and said to Light, who plaintiff claims was standing near the main track, and about ten feet east of the car on which plaintiff was at work, "George, this here car will about do. She is about level," — and at the same time plaintiff grabbed hold of the poles to protect himself if the engine came back to the car, when Light replied:

"Roll another pole over. What the hell are you looking at? You have lots of time. Roll them over! Roll them over!" While plaintiff and his witnesses place Light at this time some eight or ten feet east of the car, some other evidence puts him near the middle of it. When this order was given by Light, plaintiff resumed his work; and he testifies that he went to work because Light told him to,—that Light was the boss of the gang that day. Plaintiff says that when he turned around to see, and saw the engine coming, he thought she was coming to make the switch to move the cars, and then he grabbed hold; but when Light told him to go to work, he did the same as the rest, went to work to roll more poles over to level the car up, and did not think they were going to let the engine come back on the car until they got through. On being asked if he relied upon what Light said in that respect, he stated: "I had to do as he told me, or maybe I would get the red ticket. I thought he would not let the engine come back while we were at work on it."

While the plaintiff was so at work the engine was backed down against the car. Plaintiff was thrown off, and seriously, and, as it is claimed, permanently, injured, and in a condition which wholly prevents him from doing any kind of labor. It is claimed that Light took no steps to warn the plaintiff of the approach of the engine, or to prevent the engine from striking the car. Plaintiff also claims that the bell was not rung, and the jury so found; that he was listening for the bell, and, had he heard it, would have taken it as a signal of danger, and protected himself. Mr. Light admits ordering the engineer to take the car upon which plaintiff and the others were at work, and move it to another part of the yard, but denies that he gave the plaintiff the order claimed; that he merely directed the men to level the poles on the car, but gave no other order until after the accident; that he stood with his back partly to the east, and at right angles to the east switch; that he saw the engine pass over the switch to the east and stop, and did not see it again until it struck the car. The defendant also contended that the bell was being rung while the engine was backing down.

At the close of the testimony, counsel for defendant requested the court to instruct the jury: "(1) If you find that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of Mr. Light, the assistant road-master, the plaintiff cannot recover, for the reason that the two were fellow servants, and the master is not liable for an injury to one caused by the negligence of another." "(3) If you find that the plaintiff was ordered by Mr. Light to continue work while the engine was approaching the flat car upon which the plaintiff was at work, but at the same time the bell upon the engine was ringing and the engine was backing up, then the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to heed the warning of the bell; and your verdict must be for the defendant. (4) If you find that such order was given by Mr. Light, but that afterwards the bell upon the engine was rung as a warning of the approach of the engine to the flat car, then the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover in this action.

(5) If you find from the evidence that Mr. Light gave the order to the plaintiff to continue work, as the engine was backing up, but that the fact of its near approach was not known to Mr. Light when he gave the order, and was known to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to notify Mr. Light of its approach, and to secure himself; and your verdict must be for the defendant. (6) If you find that Light gave the order as claimed by plaintiff, but that at the time of giving it the danger from the engine was not imminent, then the giving of the order was not the proximate cause of the injury, but the proximate cause was his failure subsequently to warn the plaintiff; and for such neglect the defendant is not liable, and the plaintiff cannot recover. (7) If it was apparent to plaintiff, when he looked around to the engine, that the danger of the engine running into the flat car was then impending and imminent, then the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in obeying Light's order, and cannot recover. (8) The evidence shows that if the bell had been ringing as the engine backed down, the plaintiff would have been warned, and would not have been injured; and I charge you that the omission to ring the bell was the proximate cause of the injury, and the plaintiff cannot recover. (9) Under all the evidence in the case, the defendant is not liable for the injury to the plaintiff; and your verdict must be, no cause of action."

The court refused to give these instructions, but instructed the jury that the negligence of Mr. Light would be the negligence of the Company, and for which a recovery might be had. Defendant's counsel submitted five special questions for a finding of the jury thereon, as follows: "(1) If the bell had been rung as the engine backed down on the car, would such ringing have given warning to the plaintiff of the approach of the engine? (2) Was the bell upon the engine ringing when the engine was backing up on the side track to the car on which the plaintiff was at work? (3) Would the accident have happened if the bell on the engine had been ringing as the engine backed up against the flat car? (4) Was the accident caused by the failure of the plaintiff to heed the warning of the bell-ringing? (5) At the time when the plaintiff turned and saw the engine coming and tried to make himself safe, as he testifies, was the danger imminent?" The court submitted the second, fourth and fifth of these questions to the jury and refused the others. To the second, the jury answered, "No;" to the fourth, they said it was disposed of by their answer to the second; and to the fifth, answered "No."

The principal questions argued here are grouped by counsel for defendant under the four following heads: "(1) If Light's negligence was the cause of the injury, was Light, in doing this work, the fellow servant of plaintiff? (2) If he was not, then was his negligence the proximate cause of the accident? Or was such proximate cause the neglect of the engineer or fireman to ring the engine bell? (3) Whether appellant was entitled to have the two special questions one and three submitted. (4) Was the special verdict inconsistent with the general verdict?"

No exceptions were taken to the admission or exclusion of evidence during the trial of the cause, and no complaint is made of the charge as given. The principal contention is that the plaintiff and Light were fellow servants, and therefore the defendant Company could not be held liable for the negligence of Light, even if, through his negligence, the plaintiff received his injuries. It is too well settled in this State to need the citation of authorities that the master is not liable for injuries personally suffered by his servant through the negligence of a fellow servant, acting as such while engaged in the common employment, unless the master is chargeable with negligence in the selection of the servant in fault, or in retaining him after notice of his incompetency. It is not contended in the present case that Mr. Light was incompetent for the position held by him as assistant road-master, but the claim of recovery is based upon the ground that he was not a fellow servant of plaintiff. Neither is there any serious contention that the work being performed by the plaintiff was in itself dangerous. The rule, therefore, that the master is bound to provide a safe place in which to work, or suitable tools and materials to work with, has no application to this case. The fact that the plaintiff was ordered by Light to load the poles upon the car, and to go upon the car to level them, and his having done so in obedience to the order, was not putting him in a place of danger by the assistant road-master. The injuries which he received did not grow out of the work he was ordered to do, either from the work being dangerous in character, or the place in which he was working, dangerous. Neither was he injured by reason of any defect in machinery, tool or other appliance he was called upon to use.

There are many cases in this State holding that, when a superior servant orders one under him to perform work differing from that for which he is employed, the superior is guilty of an abuse of authority, and the master held liable. But in the present case the work being done was in the ordinary line of the duty of the section gang. Their ordinary duty is to keep the road-bed in repair, but they are often called upon to load ties, poles and other materials upon the flat cars, and to unload cars; and they must be held to assume the risk incident to such employment.

The injury resulted either from the negligence of Light in ordering the plaintiff to continue the work while the engine was backing down upon the car, and telling him there was plenty of time, thus throwing him off his guard, and leading him to believe that Light would take care that the engine did not strike the car, or it resulted from the negligence of the engineer or fireman in not ringing the bell, which, if it had been rung, might have given the plaintiff warning of the approach of the engine, so that he could have steadied himself as it struck the car, and thus saved himself from being thrown off, or it was the result of plaintiff's own carelessness. If the injury grew out of the negligence of the engineer or fireman in not ringing the bell, if that was the immediate and proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff would have no right of recovery, as the law is well settled in this State that the engineer and fireman, under such circumstances, are the fellow servants of the plaintiff. It therefore became a material fact in the case, for the determination of the jury, whether the failure of the engineer or fireman to ring the bell was the proximate cause of the injury; and the court was in error in not permitting the jury to pass upon the special questions 1 and 3 presented. The jury found that "the bell was not ringing when the engine was backing up on the side track to the car on which the plaintiff was at work." The plaintiff testified that, if he had heard the bell ringing, he would have looked around, and prepared himself for the shock. The answer to these special questions, "If the bell had been rung as the engine backed down on the car, would such ringing have given warning to the plaintiff of the approach of the engine?" and "Would the accident have happened if the bell had been ringing as the engine backed against the flat car?"—might have shown that the jury found the injury was caused by the negligence of the engineer or fireman, and that the proximate cause of the injury was their negligence. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that these did not submit questions of fact, but possible contingencies, if certain facts which did not exist had existed, and were therefore not proper questions for submission to the jury. They were something beyond mere possibilities, under the testimony of the plaintiff himself. He was a railroad man,—had been engaged in that service for a series of years; and he knew, as he testifies, that the ringing of a bell on an engine is evidence that the engine is about to move or is moving; and even people who are not versed in the rules of railroad companies generally understand this fact. Therefore, according to this testimony, if the bell had been ringing he would have prepared himself for the shock; and the jury might have found, if the question had been submitted to them, that the accident would not have happened if the bell had been rung. This finding would, in effect, have been that the accident happened through the negligence of the engineer or fireman, and not through the fault of Light; for, even if Light gave the order to plaintiff to continue his work, and by such order indicated that the engine would be kept from backing down, yet, if plaintiff knew or believed, notwithstanding Light's assurances, that the engine was actually coming, and would strike the car, and place him in peril, very naturally he would have tried to save himself.

There is no evidence that Light had control of the engine, or that the engineer was not in full and complete charge of her. Evidently, the station agent, at the request of Light, gave the order to the engineer to uncouple from his train, and have the flat car upon which the plaintiff was working moved forward to the other pile of poles. When the engine had backed down to the switch, the forward brakeman of the freight train opened the switch, and then ran back to the car to make the coupling, at the same time giving the engineer the signals to back down. This evidence shows that Light had nothing to do with making the coupling or giving the signals. While he stood near there, and, as plaintiff testifies, between the engine and flat car, near the track, there is no evidence in the case that he had, or attempted to exercise, any control over the engineer in the manner of backing the engine down, or made any signals to stop or start. It was therefore an important element in the case, for the jury to determine under all the circumstances, and especially under the testimony of the plaintiff himself, whether the failure to ring the bell, if it was not rung, was the proximate cause of the injury; and the court should have submitted the special questions.

The court was also in error in refusing to give the defendant's fifth and seventh requests to charge. If, as stated in the fifth request, Light did give the order to the plaintiff as he claims, but at that time Light did not know of the near approach of the engine, and the plaintiff did know of its approach, and failed to notify Light, or to save himself, he was guilty of contributory negligence. Plaintiff would have no right to claim that, though he saw the engine approaching, and knew that he would be put in peril when it backed against the car, yet he said nothing to Light, and made no effort to secure himself from the fall. If such facts existed, the plaintiff must have apprehended a danger which was not apparent to Light. The evidence is somewhat conflicting as to whether the engine came to a stop after it approached or crossed over the switch, but Light testifies that he saw and heard nothing of its approach; that his back was turned partly towards the engine, and he was giving his attention to the men loading the poles. Plaintiff would have no right to recover damages for the negligence of Light, if he was aware of a danger which Light did not apprehend, and, being aware of it, did not seek to save himself from injury; and the fact that Light ordered him to go on with the work would not justify him to do so, in the face of danger which was apparent to him. This was covered by the seventh request, which should have been given.

The other requests, as framed and presented to the court, were properly refused. The first request to charge presents the most important question in the case. It assumes that Light is a fellow servant of the plaintiff, and therefore no recovery could be had, even if his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. Under the circumstances of this case, was he a fellow servant, or a representative of the defendant Company, standing in the position of a superior servant or agent, for whose negligence defendant Company is to be held liable? If Light, in this position as a superior servant, represented the defendant Company, and the plaintiff, relying upon the statement of Light that he had lots of time, went to work again under the belief that Light would not let the engine back against the car until the poles had been leveled off, and Light knew that the engine was backing up, or was in a position where he would have known it if he had exercised ordinary care, and he gave the plaintiff no warning of its approach, and plaintiff did not know of its approach, the negligence of Light in permitting the engine to back up, and failure to give such warning, would be the negligence of the defendant Company, for which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, if this, and not the engineer's or fireman's negligence in failing to ring the bell, was the proximate cause of the injury. Under such circumstances, the servant's dependent and inferior position is to be taken into consideration; and, if the peculiar risk commanded by the master is not obvious, the servant has the right to assume that he is not being put in peril, and is not bound to investigate into the risk before obeying his orders. He is not called upon to set up his own judgment against his superiors; and he may rely upon their advice, and still more upon their orders, notwithstanding many misgivings of his own. And it is a general rule that if the master directs the servant to do some act which is even dangerous, but which could be made safe by special care upon the part of the master, the servant has the right to assume that such special care will be taken; and, failing to exercise such care, the master is held liable. The jury found that at the time when plaintiff turned and saw the engine coming, and tried to make himself safe, as he testifies, the danger was not imminent; and, from the issues submitted to them under the charge of the court, they also found that Light not only told the plaintiff there was lots of time, but that he negligently permitted the engine to be backed against the car.

The management of the affairs of a railroad company is vested in its board of directors, and such powers as Doyle or Light possessed and exercised were such only as were delegated by the directors under the rules of the Company. So far as the corporate directors are concerned, no question can be made that for all purposes they represent the corporation, and their acts as a board are the acts of the principal; but, in the management of its affairs, certain powers are and must be delegated to agents or servants who are clothed with certain discretionary powers. If the master places the entire charge of his business, or a distinct branch of it, wholly in the hands of an agent, exercising no discretion and no oversight, the neglect of the agent of the ordinary care in the exercise of the business of the master thus entrusted to him is a breach of duty for which the master is held liable.

Just what relation this superior servant bears to other servants it is often difficult to determine in a given case. The solution of the question must depend largely upon the power delegated to the superior servant, the exercise of such power and his command and authority over those acting under him. The reciprocal rights and duties of such servants, and the liability of the master, are nowhere defined, except by adjudicated decisions of the courts; and in some of the States the duty and liability of the master is pushed much further than in others by these adjudications.

In this State, in 1861, in the case of Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Leahy, 10 Mich. 199, the general doctrine was laid down that the master is not liable to a servant for the neglect of his fellow servant in doing or omitting to do their portion of the common work. This rule has been followed and approved in numerous cases, which have been so often cited that a repetition is unnecessary. The rule grew out of the English doctrine laid down in Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1, in 1837, and which has since been adhered to in England.

The Massachusetts court, in Farrell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. 49 (decided in 1842), adopted the rule of the English courts. Other States followed this rule, until it has become the general doctrine in all the American States. The reason of this rule as held by the Massachusetts court in the early case above cited, is that, "where several persons are employed in the conduct of one common enterprise or undertaking, and the safety of each depends much on the care and skill with which each other shall perform his appropriate duty, each is an observer of the conduct of the others, can give notice of any misconduct, incapacity or neglect of duty, and leave the service if the common employer will not take such precautions and employ such agents as the safety of the whole party may require. By these means the safety of each will be much more effectually secured than could be done by a resort to the common employer for indemnity in case of loss by the negligence of each other. Regarding it in this light, it is the ordinary case of one sustaining an injury in the course of his own employment, in which he must bear the loss himself, or seek his remedy, if he have any, against the actual wrong-doer."

The rule thus adopted did not, however, relieve the master from a duty and obligation to his servants, whether the master be a natural person or a corporation, to furnish safe machinery or other apparatus, and to observe all the care which the exigencies of the situation reasonably required, as well as to employ competent servants. It is the duty of the master, also, to make such regulations or provisions for the safety of employes as will afford them reasonable protection against the dangers incident to the performance of their respective duties. This duty extends to the selection of competent persons, to whom the master may delegate his authority, to take charge of and control the business in which the servants are employed. There is no diversity of opinion upon these propositions. The difficulties arise when courts are called upon to determine who are and who are not fellow servants in given cases, and this difficulty is made apparent when we note the hundreds of cases which in the last few years have found their way to the courts of last resort in the different States of the Union. The courts are not in harmony upon this question.

In Massachusetts it is said that this rule "is not confined to the case of two servants working in company, or having opportunity to control or influence the conduct of each other, but extends to every case in which the two, deriving their authority and their compensation from the same source, are engaged in the same business, though in different departments of duty; and it makes no difference that the servant whose negligence causes the injury is a sub-manager or foreman of higher grade or greater authority than the plaintiff." Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 129 Mass. 268; 7 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 835.

This rule is substantially followed in Maine, though it is said that an exception to the rule exists if the master has delegated to the foreman or superintendent the care and management of the entire business, or a distinct department of it, the situation being such that the superior servant is charged with the performance of duties towards the inferior servant which the law imposes upon the master.

The rule is ably discussed by Chief Justice Church in Mike v. Boston & A. R. Co., 53 N. Y. 549, where he says: "The true rule, I apprehend, is to hold the corporation liable for negligence or want of proper care in respect to such acts and duties as it is required to perform and discharge as master or principal, without regard to the rank or title of the agent intrusted with their performance. As to such acts, the agent occupies the place of the corporation, and the latter should be deemed present, and consequently liable for the manner in which they are performed."

If an agent whose duty it is to employ servants or provide materials for the company acts negligently in that capacity, his fault is that of the company, because it occurred in the performance of the principal's duty, although only an agent himself.

In Malone v. Hathaway, 64 N. Y. 5, Mr. Justice Allen makes the distinction between natural and artificial persons, and lays down the rule that it is only where the master withdraws from the management of the business, intrusting it to a middleman or superior servant, or where, as in the case of a corporation, the business is of such a nature that the general management and control thereof is necessarily committed to agents, that the master can be held liable to a subordinate for the negligent acts of one thus placed in his stead. Under this rule, a foreman who had no delegation of power or control, but who was merely charged with special duties, was held to be a fellow servant. 7 Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 884.

Mr. Wharton, in his work on Negligence (§ 229), says this doctrine is in harmony with the American cases.

As before stated, it is difficult to lay down any general rule which shall determine all cases. In some of the States, it is undoubtedly true that the master is held to a much stricter accountability and responsibility for the acts and omissions of those who are classed by some of the other courts as fellow servants; and the tendency of modern adjudications is more and more to relax the rule that those who are engaged in the same common enterprise or business are fellow servants, especially if it can be pointed out that the one in fault occupies some higher grade or more power than the party injured. Especially is this the case where parties are servants of corporations. If parties are fellow servants while engaged in the business of a natural person, the same rule and reasoning, under like circumstances, ought to place them in the same category while engaged in the business of a corporation; and if one is the agent or superior servant while engaged in the business of a corporation, and through whose negligent conduct another engaged in the same common enterprise is injured, and for whose injuries the corporation is held liable, then, under like circumstances, if it was the business of a natural person, the master should be so held. Some general rules may, however, be laid down which in many instances may serve as a guide in the determination of the question. It is not to be determined solely from the grade or rank of the offending or injured servant, but it is to be determined by the character of the act being performed by the offending servant. If it is an act that the law imposes the duty upon the part of the master to perform, then the offending employé is not a fellow servant, but a superior or agent, for whose acts the master is held liable. Again, if the master has delegated to a servant or employé the care and management of the entire business, or a distinct department of it, the situation being such that the superior servant is charged with the performance of duties towards the inferior servant which the law imposes upon the master, then such superior servant stands in the place of the master, and the rule of respondet superior applies. Whether or not the servant has power to employ and discharge other servants is also important in determining whether or not he is deemed to be a superior servant, for whose acts the master is held liable. Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Salmon, 11 Kan. 83.

When the offending servant, having general power and authority to employ and discharge servants, and having authority to direct and control the injured servant, orders him to do an act not within the scope of the injured servant's employment, whereby he is exposed to danger not contemplated in his contract of service, and he is injured in so doing; or where the master has charged a servant or employé with the sole duty of providing proper materials and appliances for carrying on the work in which he is personally engaged, and a servant is injured by his neglect so to do, the master is held liable to the injured servant while acting under the orders of the superior servant. Gilmore v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 896.

These rules are in line with the remarks of Mr. Justice Cooley in Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 39, though the learned justice, in finally deciding the case, held that Wagner did not stand, in respect to the company, in such position. It was, however, remarked by him that, when a servant demands from his master compensation for an injury received in his service, it is necessary that he trace some distinct fault to the master himself. The mere fact of such injury is no evidence of such fault; neither is the mere fact that it resulted from the carelessness of some other person in the same employment. The servant assumes all the usual risks of his employment, and among these is the risk that fellow servants will sometimes be careless, and that injuries will result. All that can be required of the master in that regard is that his servants shall be prudently chosen, and that they shall not be retained in his service after unfitness or negligence shall be discovered, and has been communicated to him. This duty of due care in the employment and retention of competent servants is one the master cannot relieve himself of by any delegation; and, if it becomes necessary to intrust its performance to a general manager, foreman or superintendent, such officer, whatever he may be called, must stand in the place of his principal, and the latter must assume the risk of his negligence. The same is true of the general supervision of his business. If there is negligence in this, the master is responsible for it, whether the supervision be by the master in person, or by some manager, superintendent or foreman to whom he delegates it. In other words, while the servant assumes the risk of the negligence of fellow servants, he does not assume the risk of negligence in the master himself, or in anyone to whom the master may see fit to intrust his superintending authority. In support of this doctrine the following cases are cited: Albro v. Agawam Canal Co. 6 Cush. 75; McAndrews v. Burns, 39 N. J. L. 117; Malone v. Hathaway, 64 N. Y. 9; Hard v. Vermont & O. R. Co. 82 Vt. 478.

In Ryan v. Bagaley, 50 Mich. 179, it appeared that the defendant resided at Pittsburgh, and was proprietor of the Palmer Iron Mines. Decedent, while working as a laborer in the mine, was killed. The defense was that the casualty was owing to the negligence of Whitesides, who was a fellow servant. It appeared that Kirkpatrick was the agent of defendant first in station. He knew nothing of the business, and appointed Whitesides as mining captain, and with whom the defendant, on his visits to the mine, consulted. Upon the question whether Whitesides was the fellow servant of the deceased, the circuit judge charged the jury: "Now, what was the position of Captain Whitesides? He was a mining captain. I think it appears from the testimony that he had the entire charge and control of the under ground work, and all the work generally of the mine, and that he employed and discharged men. Now, I charge you that Captain Whitesides, if he had this power delegated to him—to manage and control the mine—negligence on his part would be the negligence of the owners or managers of the mine." This court, in considering that part of the charge, says: "Under this charge, and in view of all the facts, it was settled by the jury that Whitesides' position and power were as indicated by the judge. We are consequently to consider that he was intrusted with the management of the mine, without direction or interference. He was not, in any true sense, a mere foreman or department leader or sub-chief, in a given sphere of the mining operations. His agency covered the entire mine, and his capacity and discretion dominated. The defendant and his agent, Kirkpatrick, equally regarded him, and looked to him, as the one person to contrive and execute; and they were guided by his intelligence, not he by theirs. In respect to legal accountability, his negligence was the negligence of the defendant. The case is within the principle stated and recognized in Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34."

Many cases have been presented to this court involving the questions as to who were and who were not fellow servants, but in no instance has the question been presented under circumstances exactly like the present case; so that we must determine it upon its own peculiar facts, being guided by the rules here laid down. Applying, therefore, the foregoing rules, so far as the same can be made applicable to this case, is Light to be treated as a superior servant, for whose negligence, if any is shown, the defendant company can be held liable? He had general charge of the entire length of about 150 miles of defendant's road, and had under his control all the section gangs along that line; and there is nothing in the record showing that Doyle, the general road-master, in any way interfered with him in the manner in which the work of that division was being conducted. He in fact controlled that entire division absolutely, so far as employing and discharging the men was concerned. The order came from Doyle to remove these poles, because they were to be taken to another division or branch of the same road. Doyle was not present at the time of the injury, and the fair inference is that whatever power Doyle would have had, if present, Light had like power, and represented the defendant company as fully as Doyle would have done. He did no manual labor himself, but had the full oversight, care and management of it. It is apparent that the business of the railroad could not be carried forward without this division of labor and responsibility. It was necessary that these heads of departments and divisions should be made, and power delegated to each head. Under such circumstances, and well-settled rules of law, it must be held that Light represented the Company; and for his negligence, while in the line of the duties so assigned and delegated to him, the Company must be held responsible. It is evident that the plaintiff and the other section hands there looked upon Light as the responsible head, from whom they received their orders, and whom they were bound to obey, or else they would receive their "red tickets," or discharges from their employment. Any other rule than this would enable the master to escape all liability, by parceling out his work to different heads of departments or divisions, and retiring from any management or control of it; and the more he abandoned it to others—the more he neglected it—the less would he be liable.

When the master appoints a middleman with such powers as were delegated to Light in this case, or where the business is of such a nature that it is necessarily committed to agents, with full power to employ and discharge those acting under them, and full and absolute control of the work, the principal is liable. The master is in a position to select such middlemen and agents with care, and in regard to their fitness for the place, and is responsible for their negligence. Laning v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 521; Malone v. Hathaway, 64 N. Y. 9.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment below must be set aside, with costs, and a new trial granted.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

There is no provision for commencing or maintaining a suit where the name of the plaintiff is unknown, except in partnership cases, where, if the names of all of the several parties are unknown, suit may be commenced in the partnership name.

The name of the plaintiff should be given in full, both the Christian and the surname.

The defendant answered in person, and moved to dismiss the writ, because plaintiff's full Christian name did not appear in affidavit, writ or declaration. The justice returns that he asked Mr. Salisbury if he could amend, and insert full Christian name of H. C. Fisher, and Mr. Salisbury replied that he could not, as he did not know the full Christian name of said

Fisher. Thereupon, the plaintiff being unable to amend, the justice dismissed the case, and rendered a judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff, together with $3.25 costs of suit. Salisbury, in the name of H. C. Fisher, sued out a writ of certiorari to the Circuit Court of Wexford County, where, on hearing, the judgment of the justice was reversed. The case comes here on writ of error from the circuit.

It is contended, in support of the judgment of the circuit, that any mistake in the name of the plaintiff must be taken advantage of in a plea of abatement. Pleading in justice's court is not required to be technical. The effect of defendant's motion was the same as a plea in abatement. The plea was also admitted when Salisbury, who appeared for plaintiff, said that he could not amend, because he did not know plaintiff's full name. This was equivalent to saying that H. C. Fisher was not the true or full name of plaintiff. The justice was then warranted in dismissing the case, as Salisbury did not ask for time to ascertain plaintiff's name, who it appears lived in Chicago, Ill.

It is a usual supposition that one commencing an action will know the correct name of the plaintiff, but if he does not he cannot for that reason proceed with his suit by a wrong name, or carry it on by the initials of the Christian or first name.

The case of Fewlass v. Abbott, 28 Mich. 270, is not in point. There the plaintiff commenced suit in the name of O. B. Abbott upon a prom-issory note made by Fewlass payable to O. B. Abbott or bearer. Objection was taken by defendant before the justice that the plaintiff was not properly named in the process, which was overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff. Defendant removed the cause to the circuit by certiorari, where the judgment was affirmed. When it came to this court on error, it was held that it would not be presumed, for the purpose of invalidating the judgment and in the absence of any showing on the subject, that the plaintiff had any other name than the one used.

In the case at bar it was substantially admitted in justice's court that plaintiff had sued by the initials of his Christian name, and his bond executed on the issue of the writ of certiorari shows his true name to be Hart C. Fisher. A person sued has a right to know who is making claim against him. If the plaintiff plants the action himself, there is no hardship in requiring him to plead his proper name in full. If the suit is commenced by an agent, who is not acquainted at the time with the full Christian name of his principal, it is certainly his duty to ascertain and plead the same before or at the time issue is joined, and there is no good reason why he should not do it. I think the judgment of the justice was correct, and should be affirmed, with costs of this court and the circuit against the plaintiff.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed.
The other Justices concurred.

A mortgagor in possession removed a building to another lot of land, to make room for a part of a larger building and improvements, and sold the lot, and building affixed to it, to a bona fide purchaser. The mortgagor has a right to lease, sell and, in every respect, deal with the mortgaged premises as owner so long as he is permitted to remain in possession, and so long as it is understood and held that every person taking under him takes subject to all the rights of the mortgagee, unimpaired and unaffected. *Teal v. APPEAL by defendant, Verner, from a decree of the Chancery Court in favor of plaintiff in a suit to foreclose a mortgage and to compel a return to the mortgaged premises of a building which had been removed therefrom. Reversed.

Statement by SCUDDER, J.:

The bill of complaint sets forth that the appellee, John F. Betz, held a mortgage on a lot of land in the City of Camden, given by August Muench, one of the defendants, to secure a bond conditioned for the payment of $1,500, with interest, dated October 10, 1885, duly recorded October 17, 1885, and that there were other subsequent incumbrances; that when the mortgage was executed and delivered to him the premises consisted of a two-story frame dwelling-house, and the lot of land therein described,

Mortgagor in possession.

Possession by the mortgagor or his grantees will not be adverse so long as payments of principal or interest are made, or the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee is recognized by both parties. Lewis v. Schwenn, 6 West. Rep. 853, 93 Mo. 28; Bartlett v. Sanborn, 3 New Eng. Rep. 168, 64 N. H. 70.

He is as absolute an owner of the property as if the mortgage had no existence. Howe v. Wadsworth, 59 N. H. 397; Northy v. Northy, 45 N. H. 141; Bryant v. Morrison, 44 N. H. 288; Worster v. Great whereon the house was erected; that in February, 1887, without his knowledge or consent, Muench removed the dwelling-house to another lot, about forty feet northward; that at the time of removal this other lot belonged to E. A. Armstrong, trustee for an association, who by deed dated July 29, 1887, conveyed the land to Muench, and Muench and wife, by deed dated August 3, 1887, conveyed to Henry Verner. He further claims that the removal of the house, the purchase and sale of the property, were fraudulent; that the security of his mortgage is thereby diminished; that it is still subject to the lien of his mortgage, and should be returned to the land described therein; that Muench has erected partly on the mortgaged lot of land a two-story frame building, used as a dancing hall and bowling alley, twenty-four feet in width and fifty-eight feet in length, and the part thereof erected on the mortgaged premises is four feet in width and fifty-eight feet in depth; that other persons claim building liens on the building, and the lot whereon it stands; and the title to the land on which the building is erected, adjoining the mortgaged land, is now in other parties. He also sets forth that the lot of land, without the building, is worth about $250, and inadequate to secure and raise the amount of his mortgage; and that Muench is insolvent. He therefore prays a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises, that Muench and Verner may be decreed to return the frame dwelling-house to and upon the lot of land described in this mortgage, and that they may be restrained from conveying or creating any lien on the same. The defendant Verner denies all fraud; claims to be a bona fide purchaser for full value, and without notice of complainant's mortgage, or of the removal of the dwelling house from the mortgaged premises. Upon the proofs taken, a decree was made that, unless Verner pay the complainant's debt and costs within twenty days, a receiver be appointed to take charge of the dwelling-house, and move it back to the lot whence it was removed, and that the mortgaged premises be sold to satisfy the debt secured by the mortgage, with other incumbrances, and costs. The defendant Verner appeals from this decree.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The exact form in which this decree is made for the removal of the house back to the mortgaged premises from which it was taken is, so far as my examination of the authorities has gone, without precedent; but this may be not objectionable, if, in administering equitable relief, it be found necessary to apply a remedy which is unusual. The design of the bill is to restore to the mortgagee his security, which he alleges has been taken from him by the severance of the dwelling-house from the land covered by his mortgage, and its annexation to land owned by another. The defense is that the house was removed on another lot, to make room for a larger building which was to be extended over on the lot of land from the adjoining premises; that the defendants acted in good faith; that the complainant had notice, and, if he did not consent, did not object; that a full money consideration was paid, without any actual notice of the lien of the mortgage on the land from which the building was removed, and that the defendant Verner, who appeals, is a bona fide purchaser of the building. The facts are not as fully proved as they might have been, and are thus likely to mislead the court.

A mortgagee may sue for damages for permanent injury impairing his security, as for flowage from a reservoir maintained by a municipality; and settlement in good faith by arbitration is binding on the mortgagor. James v. Worcester, 2 New Eng. Rep. 354, 41 Mass. 331.

A purchaser of land subject to a mortgage, who removes a building therefrom to other lands belonging to him, thereby rendering the security inadequate, is guilty of waste, and is liable, in case of deficiency, for the value of the building so removed. Edler v. Hasche, 87 Wis. 653. See note to Cook v. Cooper (Or.) 7 L. R. A. 279.

We do not find in the evidence proof of the knowledge of the defendant Verner of the transfer of the building from one lot of land to the other, by which he may be charged with constructive notice of the lien of the mortgage, nor actual notice of a fraud that was intended, which appears to have been satisfactory to the court below. It appears that Verner lived in Philadelphia up to February 15th, when he moved to Camden, and opened a grocery store about two squares from Muench's place of business, and after that time went there frequently. He kept bar for him from May to August. Muench testifies that the house was removed about the 8d or 4th of February, and thinks they started in January. This was before Verner came to Camden. Verner says he did not know that the house had been moved from another lot until after he had bought it. This evidence, if believed, shows that he neither saw nor knew that the house was moved from the mortgaged premises, and there was not a fraudulent knowledge or collusion in the purchase. Without proof of such collusion, the testimony of two witnesses that Muench told them "he removed the dwelling-house so that, if the sheriff come on him, he would have a house anyhow," is not competent to show that Verner had knowledge of a fraudulent purpose, and participated in it. If said, it was spoken between other parties in his absence. Faulkner v. Whitaker, 15 N. J. L. 438.

The payment of the consideration by Verner to Muench is testified to by them, and by Muench's wife, who says she saw money paid, without knowing the amount. The purchase price, they say, was $1,300, paid in different sums, at several times,—$400 on February 15th, $300 July 30th, $500 on August 1st, and $100 in wages due Verner. The first money was brought from Philadelphia, obtained by selling out a grocery store there, and cash on hand. The second and third payments were, as Verner says, borrowed from his brother. The first sum was $400, loaned to assist Muench in building. Afterwards, he says, when he asked for it, he was told that he (Muench) had no money, and he offered to sell the house and lot. He did not want it, but, with the advice and help of his brother, he bought it to save losing the money he had loaned. Although this money was all paid before August 8d, when the deed was dated, it was not a pre-existing debt, without parting with anything of value at the time of conveyance, depriving the defendant Verner of the character of a bona fide purchaser for value, as was argued by counsel; but all, excepting the first two items, were parts of a present consideration, appropriated, when made, to its payment, and sufficient to constitute the defendant Verner a bona fide purchaser in equity. Mingus v. Condit, 23 N. J. Eq. 813; De Witt v. Van Sickle, 29 N. J. Eq. 209; Basset v. Nonwoorthy, 2 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 82.

The small profit derived from the grocery store conducted by his wife while he attended bar for Muench, and before that time; the fact that Muench collected rent of the tenant, after the alleged sale, as Verner's agent; and the failure to produce the brother who was said to have loaned the money to complete the purchase,—cast suspicion on the consideration; but as the proof now stands, with the positive evidence of three witnesses to sustain it, and nothing more than these circumstances to overcome it, we do not feel warranted in saying that this payment was not made. Muench swears positively that he received these sums of money, and applied them to making the improvements for the summer garden.

Assuming that the appellant, Verner, bought the house, and paid for it a valuable consideration, without knowledge of its removal, as appears by the direct proof, and that Muench sold it, as he testifies, to raise money to pay for the hall building, and the improvements he was making, the important question is presented whether the complainant is in a position to obtain the relief he asks here for the injury he has sustained. Can a court of equity return to the wasted property the building that has been wrongfully removed, and sold to a bona fide purchaser, after being affixed to other land not included in the mortgage?

The subject of legal and equitable relief, where such removals are made, is considered by Mr. Jones in his book on Mortgages (§§ 143, 144, 453, 684), with abstracts from cases and numerous citations in the notes. It is a question on which the authorities are divided, and depends for its solution on the effect given to a mortgage of lands. It seems that where the mortgage is regarded as a conveyance of the legal title to the property, giving the mortgagee the right of possession, his legal ownership, and actual or constructive possession, give him the right to follow and recover the property severed. The principle applied is that property severed from the realty, so as to become a chattel, belongs to the legal owner of the land; but where the mortgage is regarded merely as a lien for security, and the mortgagor has the right of possession until ejectment or foreclosure, there the mortgagee has merely the right to restrain the removal of the property by injunction, to protect his lien, or, after the removal, only a right to recover damages for the wrongful diminution of his security.

The case of Hamlin v. Parsons, 12 Minn. 108 (Gil. 59), comes nearer to the conclusion reached by the decree in this case than any other to which my attention has been called. There the mortgagor moved a dwelling on an adjoining lot belonging to his wife, without the knowledge of the mortgagee, but with the knowledge of the wife; and it was held that the lien on the dwelling-house remained, and the mortgagee might sell the lot of land covered by the mortgage, and afterwards the house, to satisfy his mortgage.

But in Harris v. Bannon, 78 Ky. 568, where a petition was filed in equity to subject to the lien created by the mortgage a number of cottage buildings which had been removed to other land, and affixed, it was held that when the buildings were severed from the mortgaged premises, and had become part of another freehold, the lien upon them was gone.

In Peirce v. Goddard, 22 Pick. 559, the materials of a dwelling-house or mortgaged land were used in the construction of a house upon another lot of land. It was said the right of property vested in the grantee of that land, and the mortgagee could not maintain trover against the purchaser, either for the new house, or the old materials used in its construction.

In Cooper v. Davis, 15 Conn. 556, millstones were severed from the mill, and sold by the mortgagor. It was held that the title passed to the purchaser, and there was no power to seize them after they had been severed and carried away.

In Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433, where a house subject to a mortgage was floated off by a flood into the street, and was bought while in that position, it was said that the severance affected the right of lien; that a building on land was subject to the lien of the mortgage whether there at the time of the mortgage or built there afterwards, but, when severed, the lien was lost. If the contrary were the law, everything affixed to mortgaged lands might, when severed and sold to a bona fide purchaser, be followed and reclaimed. Clark v. Reyburn, 1 Kan. 281; Kimball v. Darling, 32 Wis. 684; Van Pelt v. McGraw, 4 N. Y. 110; Gardner v. Hearst, 3 Denio, 232; Lane v. Hitchcock, 14 Johns. 213; Hutchins v. King, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 53 [17 L. ed. 544]; Gore v. Jenness, 19 Me. 53; Gooding v. Shea, 103 Mass. 860; Byron v. Chapin, 113 Mass. 308; Wilson v. Maltby, 59 N. Y. 126, and many other cases,—might be cited as illustrating the differences of opinion, and the principles applied, in determining the rights of parties when fixtures are severed and sold from mortgaged lands.

A distinction is made in Hoskin v. Woodward, 45 Pa. 42, where it is said that a mortgagor may sell, in the usual way, lumber, fire-wood, coal, ore or grain growing on the land, until the mortgagee stops him by ejectment or estoppel; for these things are usually intended for consumption and sale, and the sale of them is the usual way of raising the money to pay the mortgage. But in the case of a factory or other building it is from the use of it as it is, and not by its consumption or its sale by piecemeal, that all its profits are to be derived.

It is manifest that this cannot be reconciled with cases cited above, as furnishing a rule applicable to all fixtures, but that any general rule must be based on the right of property. If the mortgagee have the legal ownership and right of possession, he may follow things severed and removed from the mortgaged lands without his consent wherever he can find them. If he holds title under the mortgage only as security for his lien, then the remedies appointed for preserving the security, and compensating for any loss sustained by its diminution, are such only as the mortgagee may use. The theory in the latter case is that, as to innocent third parties, the mortgagor is the owner of the property, and may sever and sell until restrained by injunction, or ejected by entry, or barred by foreclosure. In any view taken of the respective rights of mortgagor and mortgagee, the latter may have the security of his lien protected by injunction. Brady v. Waldron, 2 Johns. Ch. 148; Emmons v. Hinderer, 24 N. J. Eq. 89.

In our State the title of the mortgagee to lands under his mortgage has been defined by this court in Shields v. Lozeau, 34 N. J. L. 496-508, where it is said that the mortgage is regarded, not as a common-law conveyance on condition, but as a security for debt, the legal estate being considered as subsisting only for that purpose. This is elsewhere called the equitable and the American doctrine, by which the mortgagor has a right to lease, sell and in every respect deal with the mortgaged premises as owner so long as he is permitted to remain in possession, and so long as it is understood and held that any person taking under him takes subject to all the rights of the mortgagee. 4 Kent, Com. 157.

There is no difficulty in applying this rule while fixtures remain attached to the realty; and so long as the mortgagor continues in possession, or when the property severed passes into the possession of a person in collusion with him to defeat the lien and security of the mortgagee, whether upon or off the mortgaged premises, it would seem that the rights of the mortgagee would be unaffected. But when the property is severed, and sold to an innocent purchaser, the lien in equity is gone, and the remedy of the mortgagee is an action at law against the mortgagor, and those who act with him, to impair or defeat the security of the mortgage.

The case of Kircher v. Schalk, 39 N. J. L. 335, holds that a mortgagee of real estate, whose debt is due, but who has not entered into possession, cannot maintain replevin for a steam-engine affixed to the realty subject to the mortgage, which the mortgagor or his assigns had severed from the realty, and removed from the premises, because the mortgagee cannot, with propriety, insist upon being legally entitled to a remedy, the enforcement of which pertains to the general legal ownership of the land.

But in Jackson v. Turrell, 39 N. J. L. 329, it was decided that a mortgagee may maintain an action on the case against the mortgagor or his assigns for an injury to the security resulting from the removal of fixtures, or other waste, by the defendant. Notice, without fraud, was said to be sufficient to charge the purchaser with liability. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether a court of law will enforce this remedy against a bona fide purchaser without actual notice, or the exact form of remedy that may be then used; but in a court of equity the right of such purchaser is equal to the equity of a mortgagee who has not such title to the article severed that he can maintain an action for the recovery, in specie, of the fixtures removed. It is a maxim that where there is equal equity the law must prevail. It is upon this account that a court of equity constantly refuses to interfere, either for relief or discovery, against a bona fide purchaser of the legal estate for a valuable consideration, without notice of the adverse title, if he chooses to avail himself of the defense at the proper time, and in the proper mode. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64c.

The conclusion given in 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 743, on this matter is that, wherever one or the other of the parties has a legal estate over which a court of law can exercise jurisdiction, then, in an equity suit between them, as a general rule the defense of a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration will avail as against the plaintiff, whether he has a legal or an equitable estate. In either case the court of equity simply withholds its hand, and remits the party to a court of law. In the review of cases which appear to conflict with the conclusion in this case, cited from the English courts, it must be borne in mind that there the mortgagee has the legal title to the mortgaged land, and the right of possession.

Having found that the appellant, Verner, is a bona fide purchaser of the building in controversy affixed to his land, according to the weight of the evidence as presented, the decree will be reversed, and modified so that the land described in the mortgage, with the building and improvements thereon, as they exist at the time of filing the bill, shall be sold to satisfy the mortgage; and, as to the injury sustained by the removal of the building formerly on the land, the mortgagor will be remitted to his remedy at law.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE & WESTERN
R. CO. et al.

1. A corporation violating the Organic Law forfeits its franchise, but does not thereby become subject to the escheat or confiscation of its property.
2. A foreign corporation owning all the stock of a domestic corporation, where the statutes allow its stock to be held by other corporations, does not thereby "acquire or hold" the real estate of the domestic corporation so as to violate the Act of April 23, 1855, against acquiring or holding real estate "directly in the corporate name, or by or through any trustee or other device whatsoever unless specially authorized" under penalty of escheat.
3. The penalty of escheat is removed as to land in the possession of owners having the right to hold the same, although the Act imposing it is not repealed in terms, when before any inquisition is taken the land has been conveyed to such owners, and a statute has declared that the land should be held by them "indefeasibly as to any right of escheat" in the Commonwealth.

(March 3, 1890.)

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas for Elk County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto to escheat to the Commonwealth certain lands in Elk County. Affirmed.

The New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company is a corporation of the State of New York doing the business of a common carrier in Pennsylvania.

The information set out that during the years 1873 and 1874 that corporation acquired certain lands for mining purposes and took the title in the name of trustees. That it acquired, without authority, all the capital stock of the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company, a domestic corporation. That the Erie Company procured the transfer of the title to said lands by the trustees to the Mining Company for its benefit. That subsequently the title became vested in the New York, Lake Erie & Western Coal & Railroad Company, a domestic corporation, the capital stock of which was held by the Erie Company and the Mining Company. That the Erie Company procured the capital stock of the other two corporations for the purpose of enabling it to hold lands in this State which it could not otherwise lawfully hold, and that such holding of the lands by it was a violation and evasion of the laws of Pennsylvania, and prayed that such lands might be escheated to the Commonwealth.

It appeared at the trial that the shares of stock of the Company holding title to the lands were distributed as follows: of the whole number of 5,000 shares 4,194 shares stood in the name of the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company, 800 in the name of trustees of the Erie Company and the remainder in the names of persons who were directors of the Coal & Railroad Company, and who were also officers of the Erie Company, and who were alleged to hold the stock merely for the purpose of qualifying them to hold the offices of directors of the Company.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

A corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation unless by power specifically granted by its charter or necessarily implied in it, especially if it be for the purpose of controlling or affecting the management of the other corporation, and a fortiori, if for the purpose of thereby engaging in a business other than and additional to that for which it is incorporated.

7 L. R. A.

Messrs. John G. Hall and George W. Biddle for defendants in error.

Paxson, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an information in the nature of a quo warranto filed by the Attorney-General, the object of which was to escheat to the Commonwealth certain lands in Elk County, alleged to be held by or for the defendant Railroad Company. The facts as disclosed by the evidence and admitted by the parties, do not differ essentially from those in Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., reported in 114 Pa. 340. This is really a branch of the same proceeding, but for lands lying in a different county. The present case has been twice argued—a re-argument having been ordered of our own motion—and has received careful consideration. This was due to the gravity of the questions involved and the amount in controversy.

It was alleged in the first place by the Commonwealth that the Railroad Company had violated section 5 of article 17 of the Constitution of this State. The said section is as follows:

"No incorporated company doing the business of a common carrier shall directly or indirectly prosecute or engage in mining or manufacturing articles for transportation over its works; nor shall such company directly or indirectly engage in any other business than that of common carriers, or hold or acquire lands, freehold or leasehold, directly or indirectly, except such as may be necessary for carrying on its business; but any mining or manufacturing company may carry the products of its mines and manufactories on its railroad or canal not exceeding fifty miles in length."

It will be noticed that this clause in the Constitution affixes no penalty for its violation. It is conceded that for a violation of the Organic Law, a Pennsylvania corporation or a foreign corporation having or exercising corporate franchises within this Commonwealth would forfeit such franchises. This, however, would not involve an escheat or confiscation of its property.

For present purposes we must regard this constitutional provision as out of the case. The question here is whether the real estate in controversy is liable to escheat. This is not a proceeding to forfeit the Company's franchises but to escheat its lands. It must rest, if it can be sustained at all, upon the Act of April 26, 1855 (Pub. Laws, 329), the fifth section of which provides that "no corporation shall hereafter acquire or hold any real estate within this Commonwealth, directly in the corporate name, or by or through any trustee, or other device whatsoever, unless specially authorized to hold such property by the laws of this Commonwealth."

This is the prohibition of the Act. The penalty for its violation is contained in section 9. It is as follows:

"That all property hereafter acquired and held by persons, corporations or associations forbidden by this Act, and all such hereafter acquired and held beyond the limit prescribed as aforesaid by this Act, shall escheat to this Commonwealth, and upon the same being adjudged to have escheated under proceedings in court by quo warranto in all respects as is provided by law in the case of the usurpation of any corporate franchises, the same shall be taken in possession and disposed of," etc.

It was not alleged that the defendant Railroad Company held the title to any of the lands in controversy either in its corporate name, or by or through a trustee. The contention of the Commonwealth was that the title thereto was held by the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company, defendant; that all of the stock of said last-named Company was held by the said Railroad Company, and that the placing of the title in the former Company was a mere "device" to enable the Railroad Company to hold lands indirectly which it was forbidden by the Act of 1855 to hold directly, or by or through a trustee. Whether it was such "device" was the question we directed to be submitted to the jury, when the other branch of the case was here, reported in 114 Pa. 340.

It is not denied that the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company is a Pennsylvania corporation, and authorized by its charter to hold these or similar lands, and to carry on the business of mining, milling, smelting and refining gold, silver, copper, iron, lead and other ores, coal and other minerals. Nor was it denied that under the Act of April 15, 1869 (Pub. Laws, 32), the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company had the right to purchase and hold all or any portion of the stock of the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company. The said Act expressly declares: "It shall and may be lawful for railroad and canal companies to aid corporations authorized by law to develop the coal, iron, lumber or other material interests of this Commonwealth by the purchase of their capital stock or bonds or either of them, or by the guaranty of or agreement to purchase the principal or interest, or either, of such bonds."

The object of this legislation is obvious. It was to authorize railroad and canal companies to employ their capital and credit to aid in the development of the mineral resources of the Commonwealth. Such development, as everyone knows, is in many instances beyond the reach of individual enterprise. It was easy enough to form corporations with all the requisite powers for this purpose. It was a very different thing to find capitalists to take their stocks or bonds. Hence it was that the Legislature gave to railroad and canal companies the power to purchase both stocks and bonds of such companies. Nor was any limitation placed upon this power. They might buy a portion or all of the stock. It probably never occurred to the legislative mind that while the purchase of a portion of the stock of a mining company would be aiding such corporation to develop the mineral resources of the State, the purchase of a majority of the whole of the stock of such company might be held to be a "device" to evade the Act of 1855. However that may be, the Act of 1869 was evidently intended to legalize, and perhaps encourage, railroad and canal companies to invest in this species of mining companies. It involved, necessarily, the control of such companies by the corporations making such investments to the extent of the stock held by them. A majority of the stock controls the corporation;

the corporation controls the land held by it. In this sense, and to this extent, the Act of 1869 enabled railroad companies to control real estate, the title to which they were forbidden to hold directly or indirectly by the Act of 1855. It must not be forgotten, however, that controlling real estate, by means of the ownership of a majority of the stock of such corporation is a very different matter from holding the title to such real estate. The one is legalized by the Act of 1869; the other is forbidden by the Act of 1855.

It appears by the evidence that the Railroad Company purchased the charter of the Mining Company and retained all of the stock thereof, except the number of shares requisite to qualify the directors. It is admitted that the whole interest in the stock of the Mining Company was owned and controlled by the Railroad Company. It was contended that this was not aiding the Mining Company, but was a mere scheme or "device" to hold lands in violation of law. This was the view taken of it by our brother Sterrett in the former opinion of this court, and in that case it was directed that the question whether it was a "device" to evade the Act of 1855 should be submitted to a jury. That case was not heard before a full bench; those who heard it were not unanimous; it involved a question of grave importance, and a majority of those who heard the argument were in favor of taking the verdict of a jury upon the facts.

As the question is now presented here, and as it was presented below, there are no disputed facts. It is conceded that at the time these proceedings were commenced the title to the lands was in the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company; that the said Company was expressly authorized by law to hold them; that the stock of said last-named corporation is held or controlled by the Railroad Company, which Company is in terms authorized by the Act of 1869 to hold it; that the stock so held is personal property, and that the Railroad Company does not hold the title to said real estate, or to any portion of it, either in its own name, or by or through a trustee. With the facts upon the record undisputed, we cannot evade the responsibility of this case by throwing it upon a jury. With the facts admitted, it is the duty of this court to pass upon their legal effect, and the verdict of a jury could not aid us. Moreover, if we submit this question to a jury, we would have no rule whatever. Different juries in different counties might find conflicting verdicts, in which case we would have the strange result that in one county the transaction would be held to be legal, while in an adjoining county it would be held to be illegal. We were informed upon the argument, and have no doubt of its truth, that a vast amount of real estate in this Commonwealth is held by corporations similar to the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company, and chartered by the State for the purpose, inter alia, of holding the title to such property; that the stock of said companies is largely held by railroad corporations, in pursuance of the Act of 1869, and that the said real estate is in whole or in part controlled by the latter class of corporations by means of their stock. If in all such cases the question of whether the holding of such stock is a "device" on the part of the railroad companies to evade the Act of 1855 must be submitted to a jury, the consequences might be very serious and destructive of vested rights. To say the least, it would introduce an element of uncertainty into the titles to a large amount of property which it would be difficult for a purchaser to protect himself against. The possibility of such results admonishes us to move with caution, and to hesitate ere we finally adopt a principle which may lead to such confusion.

If there is anything that is clear in this case it is that the defendant Railroad Company has no title, legal or equitable, to this land. Its whole title thereto, in fee simple, passed by the conveyance to the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company. Attention is again called to the Act of 1855, and at the risk of being prolix I repeat it: "No corporation shall hereafter acquire and hold real estate within this Commonwealth directly in the corporate name, or by or through any trustee or other device whatsoever, unless specially authorized to hold such property by the laws of this Commonwealth."

It will be observed that the prohibition of the Act is of a threefold character, viz.: (a) holding real estate in its corporate name; (b) by means of a trustee; and (c) by any device whatever. It must be conceded, indeed it is not denied, that there is no violation of the first two prohibitions. It is equally clear to my mind there is no violation of the third, for the reason that the Railroad Company has, as before stated, no title to the real estate of any kind. If it has no title how can it hold title by a "device?" The only answer that has or can be made to this is that the Company controls said real estate. If we concede this proposition, where in the Act of 1855 is there to be found a prohibition of a railroad company controlling the use of real estate? The Act strikes only at the holding of the title, and as it is a highly penal statute, penal to the extent of practically confiscating all real estate held in violation thereof, we are not at liberty to extend it beyond its terms. The Legislature may have had good reasons to prohibit railroad companies from holding the title to large bodies of mining lands. They may not have had the same reasons to move them to prohibit all control over them. At any rate they have not done so, which is sufficient for our purpose.

As before observed, this is a question of escheat. It must be manifest that before there can be an escheat of these lands under the Act of 1855, it must appear that the defendant Railroad Company holds the title thereto in its corporate name, or by or through a trustee, or by some device, by means of which said Company not only controls the lands but enjoys the beneficial ownership thereof. In other words it must have either the legal or the equitable title or it has no title whatever. If it has no title there can be no escheat of the lands as real estate. The third section of the Act of 1855, which does not appear to have been heretofore called to our attention, provides that "the shares held by shareholders in all incorporated land and building associations, and mining and manufacturing companies, shall be taken to be personal property, conferring a right to receive dividends of the profits and proceeds of the real estate held by such companies, but not to create any title in the shareholders in or to such real estate, which shall be subject only to the liens of, and be fully conveyed by the corporation holding the title and owning the same."

This section of the Act of 1855 is a distinct declaration by the law-making power that shares of stock held in a mining company are personal property, and create or give no title to the holder of such shares in or to any of the real estate held by such company. How, then, is it possible to escheat it as real estate belonging to or held for the company owning the shares? The law having fixed its character I do not see how the parties can change it even by a "device."

The Act of April 8, 1881 (Pub. Laws, 9), enacts that "where any conveyances of real estate in this Commonwealth have been made by any alien, or any foreign corporation or corporations of another or of this State, to any citizen of the United States, or to any corporation chartered under the laws of this Commonwealth, and authorized to hold real estate, before any inquisition shall have been taken against the real estate so held to escheat the same, such citizen or corporation grantee as aforesaid shall hold and may convey such title and estate indefeasibly as to any right of escheat in this Commonwealth, by reason of such real estate having been held by an alien, or a corporation not authorized to hold the same by the laws of this Commonwealth."

While I do not consider this Act important in the determination of this case, as the contention of the Commonwealth cannot be sustained for the reasons already given, it is proper to say that it appears to condone the alleged offense so far as the Legislature may lawfully do so. It removes the penalty of escheat imposed by the Act of 1855. It may be said, however, that it is controlled by section 10 of article 17 of the Constitution, which declares: "No railroad, canal or other transportation company, in existence at the time of the adoption of this article, shall have the benefit of any future legislation by general or special laws, except on condition of complete acceptance of all the provisions of this article." In the absence of any evidence that the defendant Company had accepted the provisions of the above article, it is urged that it cannot claim the benefit of the Act referred to.

It is doubtless true that before a railroad company can enjoy the benefit of new legislation, enlarging its powers or increasing its facilities, it must formally accept all of the provisions of the 17th article of the Constitution relating to railroads and canals. This question, however, is not raised. The Act of 1881 is in the way of the Commonwealth. No one doubts that the Act of 1855, imposing the penalty of escheat, could at any time have been repealed by the Legislature. The repeal of the Act would have been an answer to this proceeding. The Commonwealth would have nothing to rest it upon. The Act of 1881 does not in terms repeal the Act of 1855, but it removes the penalty. This information was not filed until several years after the passage of the Act of 1881. Nor had any inquisition been taken against the real estate in controversy until after it had been conveyed to the Northwestern Mining & Exchange Company. The case comes, therefore, precisely within the terms of the Act of 1881, and were we in doubt as to our former position, we might well affirm the judgment upon this ground alone.

We have considered this case solely upon the power of the Commonwealth to escheat the lands. No question is raised under the constitutional provision referred to, and none is decided.

A corporation in this State is inherently incapable to execute a deed as attorney in fact for the following reasons:

1 Lindley, Partn. 165.

Lord, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for failure of the defendant to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a conveyance of certain premises pursuant to an agreement to that effect. The defendant denies this, and alleges, as the attorney in fact of one Deborah H. Ingersoll, in compliance with said agreement, that it did execute and tender to the plaintiff a conveyance of said premises, etc., and now brings it into court, and deposits it for the plaintiff, and that plaintiff refuses to accept the same. To this the plaintiff demurred on the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of defense to the cause of action alleged.

The point raised by the demurrer is, Can the defendant, a corporation, execute a deed of conveyance of real property as the attorney in fact of another? In this State the right to become incorporated is secured by a general law, and any persons may avail themselves of it by complying with its provisions. Corporations which owe their existence to the common law must be governed by it in the mode of their organization, in the manner of exercising their powers, and in the use of the capacities conferred. But the Legislature may authorize the creation of corporations for many purposes not contemplated by the common law, and endue them with powers and capacities to be exercised in disregard of its rules, or which may greatly extend, modify or limit their common-law powers and privileges. The measure of the legislative power in this regard is limited only by circumstantial provisions. Ordinarily, in the creation of corporations, the common-law incidents and powers are implied, unless otherwise provided or restrained by the law of its corporate existence. But, in determining the nature and extent of the powers and capacities conferred on a corporation, and the mode of their exercise, the law of its creation, whether a charter or a statute, must be consulted; for it has no power, except as thus given, either expressly or as incidental to the exercise of the powers granted. It is provided by our Statute that a corporation may engage in any lawful enterprise, business pursuit or occupation (Code, § 8217); so that, unless corporations are affected with some disability, when the articles of incorporation are sufficient for the purpose, there is no lawful occupation or business in which it may not engage in this State exactly as individuals.

By its articles of incorporation, the defendant corporation is expressly authorized and empowered "to act as the general or special agent, or attorney in fact, for any public or private corporation or person in the management and control of real estate or other property, its purchase, sale or conveyance," etc. No question is made but what the defendant, by its articles of incorporation, has conferred upon it the power to do the act as to which there is claimed to be an alleged failure; but the contention is that a corporation, from the nature of the organization, as an artificial body, necessitated to act through agents, is incapable of executing a deed as an attorney in fact. This argument is based on the assumption that there are some things, from the inherent nature of the case, that a corporation is incapable of doing, and seeks its illustrations in the common law, as that a corporation cannot be an administrator or executor because its duties are of a personal nature, and cannot be delegated; or cannot take an oath, when so required by law, before proceeding to execute some duty or trust. But this argument overlooks the fact that a corporation may be empowered to do by statute what it was incapable of doing under its common-law powers; and, when thus created, its powers, capacities and modes of exercising them depend upon the Statute. Nor is the disability, in such cases, of a character which cannot be obviated by statute; for, as Mr. Morawetz says, "there are numerous instances in which corporations have been expressly empowered by statutes to administer estates." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 357.

The reason why a corporation was unable to perform the office of executor or administrator, as stated by Blackstone, was that it could not take an oath for the due execution of the office. 1 Bl. Com. 477.

But, to enable a corporation to act as executor or administrator, the Statute may dispense with the oath, or provide that some one of its officers may take it, or the law of the State may not require any oath for the due execution of the office; and in such case, where no other impediment intervenes, a corporation may act as administrator when the law of the State does not require the administrator to take an oath. It was so held in Deringer v. Deringer, 5 Houst. 416. So, too, in Lincoln Sav. Bank v. Ewing, 12 Lea, 602, where it was urged that a corporation was incapable of taking to itself a mortgage or trust conveyance, it was held that a corporation may take and hold as a trustee or mortgagee, and execute a trust in which it has an interest, within the scope of its business; and a failure or inability to comply with the provisions of the Code by taking the required oath would not affect the validity of the deed, or the title vested.

As it is not questioned that the business in which the defendant is engaged is a lawful occupation, and that the articles of incorporation are sufficient to confer the power on the defendant to act as an attorney in fact in furtherance of its legitimate objects, there is nothing to prevent it from doing the acts essential to carry on its business, and comply with the terms of its agreement, unless it is incapable of performing such acts from some cause inherent in itself.

A corporation, like a natural person, has a right to conduct its legitimate business by all the means necessary to effect such object. Within its prescribed range, it can do whatever a natural person mutatis mutandis could do. Wharton, Ag. § 57.

In Barry v. Merchants Exch. Co. 1 Sandf. Ch. 280, it is said: "Every corporation, as such, has the capacity to take and grant property, and to contract obligations, in the same manner as an individual. . . . And every such corporation has power to make all contracts which are necessary and usual in the course of the business it transacts, as means to enable it to effect such object, unless expressly prohibited by law." Having the power conferred upon it to act as an attorney in fact, is it not endowed with all the faculties or capacities essential to execute it, and carry out the business projects of its creation? Why may not a corporation act as an agent for an individual or another corporation? As the owner of real property, it can by its authorized agents execute a conveyance, or it may authorize another, by power of attorney in writing, to convey such property for it; why, then, may it not act as the agent or attorney in fact of another for a like purpose, when it is so authorized, and to thus act is one of the chief powers conferred to effect the object of its creation, and to carry on the business in which it is engaged?" "Within the scope of its corporate powers," says Mr. Mechem, "unless there are express provisions in its charter or constituting instruments to the contrary, a corporation may act as agent, either for an individual, a partnership or other corporation. Many of the great corporations of the country are organized for this express purpose, under statutes or charters conferring and defining their powers, and the methods of executing them; but even in other cases, authority so to act might be implied as auxiliary to their main purpose." Mechem, Ag. § 64.

It is clear, then, that a corporation may act as the agent of another; and, if so, it must be endowed with the faculties or instrumentalities to perform the office it is authorized to undertake, and carry out the purposes of its creation.

When a corporation engages in a legitimate business, and is authorized by its incorporation to do the things necessary to carry on such business, it is an express grant of power to enable it to effect that object. If it is to be excluded from doing such things because, from the nature of its organization, it cannot act personally, but only through agents, there would be little left in the domain of business it could do. As was said by the court in Hopkins v. Gallatin Turnp. Co., 4 Humph. 412: "The common-law rule with regard to natural persons, that an agent, to bind his principal by deed, must be empowered by deed himself, cannot, in the nature of things, be applied to corporations aggregate. These beings, of mere legal existence, and their board, as such, are, literally speaking, incapable of a personal act. They direct or assent by vote; but their most immediate mode of action must be by agents." Being a creation of the law,—an artificial person,—it can only act by agents, who are its limbs, or instrumentalities to effect the purpose for which it was organized, and to act for it, their act being the act of the corporation, exactly as the act of an individual is his act. As such, upon the principle of the objection raised, it could not make an acknowledgment in person, but it may by its officers; and in such cases its officer affixing the seal is the party executing the deed, within the meaning of the Statute requiring deeds to be acknowledged by the grantor. Kelly v. Calhoun, 95 U. S. 711 [24 L. ed. 544]; Frostburg Mut. Bldg. Asso. v.

Brace, 51 Md. 508; Am. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, Acknowledgment, Corporations.

In fact, within the same principle of reasoning, it may be said that a corporation cannot make a deed of its own property; but we know it can, and that the act of its officers in so doing is the act of the corporation.

When a corporation is made the agent of another to sell and convey property, it acts through the same instrumentalities as when acting for itself; and the relation between it and its instrumentalities are as one being or artificial person in the performance of its engagement, and involves no delegation of powers. So that, when a corporation is invested with a power of attorney to sell and convey real property, the person conferring the power knows that the corporation cannot act personally in the matter, but that in performing the engagement it will act through its agents, who for that purpose are its faculties, and whose acts in the discharge of that duty are the acts of the corporation, and as such must be considered to be included in the artificial person, as instrumentalities authorized by him to do the act conferred upon it by his power of attorney. In this view, the argument that the corporation cannot do such act, under the power of attorney, without a delegation of authority to its agents, and that the grantor of the power has given no such power of substitution, cannot be sustained.

There was no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

*1. A bill of review, for error of law apparent upon the record, will lie, although the decree sought to be reviewed is a final decree, consequent upon a decree pro confesso, for failure of the defendant to plead.

2. Where the bill does not justify the final decree following the decree pro confesso, a bill of review for error apparent upon the record is a proper remedy for relief in the court rendering such decree, and an appeal the remedy through the appellate court.

NOTE.—Wife's capacity to contract.

As to the wife's disability to contract, see notes to Speler v. Opfer (Mich.) 2 L. R. A. 345; Roop v. Real Estate Invest. Co. (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 211; Cook v. Walling (Ind.) 2 L. R. A. 769.

The existence of the wife is merged in that of the husband, and a contract binding herself personally, or subjecting her to a judgment in personam, is void. Spencer v. Parsons, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 769.

A married woman cannot be sued at law in an action ex contractu, except where such suit is authorized by express legislative enactment. Davis v. Carroll (Md.) 18 Atl. Rep. 935.

A contract which could not have been enforced against a married woman if living cannot be enforced against her estate. Ibid.

Where coverture is pleaded to a contract it is proper, in the reply, to show that the contract is one a married woman has power to make. Arnold v. Engleman, 1 West. Rep. 433, 108 Ind. 512.

Late decisions from various state courts: California.

A married woman, in California, is incapable of contracting a personal obligation except in cases provided by statute. Norton v. Meader, 4 Sawy. 604, 7 L. R. A.

Under the Civil Code

Under Civ. Code, a married woman may enter into any agreement or transaction respecting her property which she might if unmarried. She may mortgage or convey it by deed of trust to secure the debts of her husband, and, having done so, his creditors may enforce their claims against it in the same manner and to the same extent that they could if it were his property, and not hers. Burkile v. Levy, 70 Cal. 250.

District of Columbia.

The common-law disability has not been removed in the District of Columbia (Ritch v. Hyatt, 3 Mac-Arth. 538); but a married woman may contract to repair her house, or to put it into rentable condition. Harmon v. Garland, 1 Mackey, 1.

Florida.

Though the wife may conduct a mercantile business in Florida, and the husband may act as agent for her in that business, yet she cannot make a contract herself or by him as agent on which she will be personally liable. McQuaid v. Fontane, 24 Fla. 509.

To determine whether the credit was given to

3. A married woman is by the common law incapable of making a contract that will bind her personally, either in law or equity; and for this reason there cannot, in the absence of legislation changing the common law, be a judgment or decree against her personally for the recovery of money, as distinguished from a decree charging her separate equitable estate, or other property, with the payment of money. No exception to this rule is created by the existence of a marriage contract between husband and wife giving her the right to control and manage her separate estate and property the same as if she had remained unmarried.
4. A married woman is personally liable for her civil torts, including such frauds as do not grow out of, or are not directly connected with, or a part of, a contract which she has undertaken to make.
5. Wherever coverture avoids a contract which a wife has attempted to make, it likewise bars a personal recovery against the wife on the ground of the fraud connected therewith; and the bar cannot be overcome by suing her in an action ex delicto.
6. It is error to decree a recovery of money of or against a married woman personally, in a suit in equity instituted to set aside a contract for the sale of land on the ground of fraud, and to recover the amount of a cash payment made thereon by the complainant.

him or to her, it should be shown that the fact was known to the vendor, or that between him and the husband there was a clear and distinct understanding that the credit was given to her; else the husband will be liable. Ibid.

Georgia.

A married woman is not liable on her note given for money borrowed to pay the premium due by the husband upon a policy of insurance on his life, where it is not shown that the policy was for her benefit alone. Jones v. Bradwell (Ga.) 10 S. E. Rep. 745.

Illinois.

As to the power of the wife, under the Enabling Laws of Illinois, to engage in trade, etc., see Re Kinkhead, 3 Biss. 405; Farwell v. Kinkhead, 1 Am. L. Rec. 323.

Indiana.

A married woman may execute a promissory note for property purchased by her. Lane v. Schlemmer, 12 West. Rep. 924, 114 Ind. 296.

Kentucky.

A note given by a married woman, not for necessities for herself or family, and for which credit was not given her, is void. Stevens v. Deering (Ky.) 9 S. W. Rep. 222.

Maryland.

A bond executed by a feme covert alone, without the joinder of her husband, is void, and no action can be maintained upon it, either during coverture or afterwards. Harris v. Dodge (Md.) 19 Atl. Rep. 697.

Massachusetts.

A married woman who indorses blank promissory notes, at her husband's request, for him to fill up and use, which afterwards and in her absence he fills up and negotiates for value at a bank, is liable to the bank as indorser, under the Massachusetts statutes, which give her the unrestricted right to contract except with her husband. Binney v. Globe Nat. Bank (Mass.) 6 L. R. A. 373.

Michigan.

A married woman cannot make an executory contract that is not directly connected with her estate. Howe v. North, 12 West. Rep. 919, 69 Mich. 272. 7 L. R. A.

7. The marital relation does not of itself disqualify a husband from acting as the agent of his wife with reference to her separate estate.

8. The person in whom the legal title to property is vested in trust for a married woman is a necessary party to a bill seeking to charge the property with the payment of money paid to her.

(January 12, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the Circuit Court for Marion County dismissing a bill for review of proceedings in which a personal decree was entered against a married woman, and refusing to enjoin the sale of her separate property for the enforcement of such decree. Reversed.

Hugh S. Paisley filed a bill against T. D. C. Prentiss and Annie M. Prentiss his wife, alleging misrepresentation and fraud on the part of defendants in selling to plaintiff certain land alleged to contain orange trees, but which in fact had no such trees on it and was of very little value. He prayed a rescission of the contract of sale, a cancellation of the bond for title, a delivery up of the notes given for the purchase money and a judgment against defendants for the amount of the purchase money already paid.

But she may render herself liable for things bought by her for family use. Ibid.

Yet she is not liable upon a contract for the board of herself and husband. Ibid.

She cannot make a valid contract for the erection of a building upon the joint property of herself and husband, but can contract only with reference to her sole or separate property. Curtis v. Crowe (Mich.) 41 N. W. Rep. 876.

A contract in writing to bind her must have been made on behalf of her sole property. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Wayne Co. Sav. Bank, 12 West. Rep. 535, 68 Mich. 116.

The statutes do not authorize a wife to become personally liable on an executory promise except concerning her separate estate. Kenton Ins. Co. v. McClellan, 43 Mich. 564; Reed v. Buys, 44 Mich. 80; Edwards v. McEnhill, 51 Mich. 190; Harvey v. Galloway, 48 Mich. 532; Richards v. Proper, 44 Mich. 98; Wilson v. Coolidge, 42 Mich. 112; Gantz v. Toles, 40 Mich. 725.

Minnesota.

The capacity of married women to be bound and estopped by their conduct is incident to their enlarged power to deal with others, under Minnesota statutes. Dobbin v. Cordiner (Minn.) 4 L. R. A. 333.

Mississippi.

The statutes in Mississippi in relation to married women have not relieved a wife from common-law disabilities to make contracts. Canal Bank v. Partee, 99 U. S. 325 (25 L. ed. 390).

With certain exceptions a married woman cannot bind herself by any covenant, nor can she be bound by the covenants of her trustee in a deed of separation; nor can she, in consideration of such separation, convey or release to her husband her claims on his estate. Stephenson v. Osborne, 41 Miss. 125.

In Mississippi, unless a married woman has a separate estate, she is subject, as to her contracts, to the disability of coverture. Canal Bank v. Partee, supra.

A personal judgment against a married woman, in an action against her on her promissory note, is a nullity under the laws of Mississippi. Ibid.

A decree pro confesso was rendered against defendants granting the relief prayed for and directing execution to issue for the collection of the money judgment, which decree was afterwards enrolled.

Subsequently defendants filed a bill of review against Paisley and the sheriff to set aside so much of the judgment as bound Mrs. Prentiss and to enjoy the sale of her separate estate which had been levied on to satisfy the judgment.

The bill was dismissed, the injunction refused and defendants appealed.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Spencer, for appellants:

A creditor suing a married woman must, in his bill in equity or declaration at law, aver that she is a married woman, that she has a separate estate and that the debt is a charge on it or ought to be paid out of it.

Choppin v. Harmon, 46 Miss. 307; Canal Bank v. Partee, 99 U. S. 384 (25 L. ed. 894).

There can be no personal judgment against her at law, and no personal decree in chancery; it must be one which reaches her property only.

Reeves, Baron and Feme, 171; Bank of Louisiana v. Williams, 46 Miss. 629; Cary v.

Dizon, 51 Miss. 598; Wallace v. Rippon, 2 Bay, 112; Francis v. Wigzell, 1 Madd. 262.

Her property is not liable on a general engagement, except where a case is made out for a court of equity to charge her separate estate, as for improvements on the same.

Spearman v. Ward, 6 Cent. Rep. 147, 114 Pa. 634.

The only relief given in equity on a married woman's contract to convey is to enforce a refunding of the purchase money where she has received it.

Goss v. Furman, 21 Fla. 411.

The judgment against her is not a personal one purely, but one to be satisfied out of her separate estate; and the record should show this, otherwise the judgment is void, and may be so treated wherever it is met.

Offutt v. Dangler, 5 Cent. Rep. 430, 5 Mackey, 818; Canal Bank v. Partee, 99 U. S. 325 (25 L. ed. 890); Rodemeyer v. Rodman, 5 Iowa, 427; Lewis v. Perkins, 36 N. J. L. 183; McGlaughlin v. O'Rourke, 12 Iowa, 461; Cary v. Dizon, 51 Miss. 598; Mallett v. Parham, 52 Miss. 921.

When a bill seeks to affect the separate property of the wife through her personally, it should be dismissed; her trustees must be made parties.

Missouri.

Under the Revised Statutes of Missouri a married woman may act as feme sole as to her separate property, and may make contracts for purchase of personal property with her separate means. Dailey v. Singer Mfg. Co. 4 West. Rep. 563, 88 Mo. 301; Roenheim v. Hartsock, 7 West. Rep. 114, 90 Mo. 357; Miller v. Brown, 47 Mo. 504.

The restriction by Mo. Rev. Stat., § 669, on the power of a married woman to covenant in a joint deed with her husband of her statutory estate, does not apply to her covenants in a conveyance of her separate estate in equity. Barlow v. Delaney, 40 Fed. Rep. 97.

New Jersey.

Under the New Jersey Revision, a wife may contract to sell her real estate; and specific performance thereof will be decreed after her husband's death, against one purchasing with knowledge thereof. Union Brick & Tile Mfg. Co. v. Lorillard, 12 Cent. Rep. 82, 44 N. J. Eq. 1.

New York.

In New York, a married woman may carry on business and may make contracts in the prosecution of such business. United States v. Garlinghouse, 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 11. See Voorhees v. Bonesteel, 63 U. S. 16 Wall. 16 (21 L. ed. 268).

In the course of her separate business she can make negotiable paper, which will be governed by the law-merchant. Noel v. Kinney, 8 Cent. Rep. 60, 106 N. Y. 74.

Her contracts may be either express or implied, and may be made either personally or by agent, and when within the statute they will charge her separate estate. Dickerson v. Rogers, 114 N. Y. 406.

As to all contracts relating to her separate estate, a married woman stands at law, under the Married Woman's Acts, on the same footing as if unmarried. Noel v. Kinney, supra; Overseers of Poor of Parker City v. Overseers of Poor of Du Bois Borough (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 207; Frecking v. Rohland, 58 N. Y. 422; Bodine v. Killeen, 58 N. Y. 93.

North Carolina.

As to the power of a wife, in North Carolina, to make contracts which will charge her separate estate, see Matthews v. Murchison, 17 Fed. Rep. 760, 7 L. R. A.

Ohio.

The jus disponendi which attaches in Ohio to the estate of a married woman is largely regulated by statute. Levi v. Earl, 30 Ohio St. 147.

The ground upon which a court of equity charges her separate estate for her general engagements is not because her contracts have any validity but because the circumstances are such that equity decrees it to be just that they should be paid out of her estate. Ibid.

Her separate property is not liable for her general engagements in the absence of a contract valid in law to bind the same. Rice v. Columbus, T. & T. R. Co. 32 Ohio St. 380.

Except so far as capacity has been given to her by statute to bind herself by her contracts, they are void. Payne v. Thompson, 3 West. Rep. 153, 44 Ohio St. 192.

She may charge her separate estate at least to the extent that such liability may be incurred for its benefit. Phillips v. Graves, 50 Ohio St. 371; Patrick v. Littell, 36 Ohio St. 72.

Pennsylvania.

The wife has only such power over her personal property as is conferred by statute. Hinkle v. Landis (Pa.) 26 W. N. C. 218.

All contracts made by the wife concerning her separate estate, other than for labor and materials for improving the same, are subject to her disabilities as a feme covert, except where a case is made out for the court to charge her separate estate. Spearman v. Ward, 6 Cent. Rep. 147, 114 Pa. 634.

Under Pa. Act of Feb. 29, 1872, a married woman can make a valid judgment note for a sewing-machine purchased for her own use. Baker v. Singer Mfg. Co. 18 Cent. Rep. 477, 122 Pa. 363.

Under the Pennsylvania Act of June 3, 1887 (Pub. Laws, 332) known as the Married Person's Property Act, a married woman may confess judgment, or bind herself or her estate by contract, for three purposes, viz.: where she engages in trade or business; in the management of her separate estate; and for necessities; but she cannot bind her estate generally as a feme sole. Real Estate Invest. Co. v. Roop (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 211.

A married woman cannot enter into a valid agreement with a third person, without the consent of

Lewis v. Yale, 4 Fla. 418; 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 186.

Mr. S. D. McConnell, for appellees:

Equity will charge the separate property of the wife with the repayment of money advanced to her at her instance and for her benefit or on account of her estate.

Pentz v. Simonson, 13 N. J. Eq. 232; Norton v. Turcill, 2 P. Wms. 144; Greatley v. Noble, 3 Madd. 79; Stuart v. Kirkwall, 3 Madd. 387.

The marital relation does not disqualify the husband from becoming the agent of his wife.

Tresch v. Wirtz, 84 N. J. Eq. 124.

Equity will charge the separate estate of a married woman with the value of property delivered to her as a consideration of a contract for the sale of her separate property and for money expended by vendee by reason of contract of sale.

Pierson v. Lum, 25 N. J. Eq. 390.

The estate of a married woman is chargeable with its augmentation by another through her procurement or knowledge and consent.

Thrasher v. Doig, 18 Fla. 809; Staley v. Hamilton, 19 Fla. 275.

Raney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order denying an injunction and dismissing a bill of review.

her husband, transferring to such third person a sum of money in consideration of his obligating himself to pay her an annuity out of such sum during her natural life; and if she does so it will be presumed that such third person knew that she was acting ultra vires. Hinkle v. Landis (Pa.) 25 W. N. C. 213.

South Carolina.

Under the South Carolina law, a married woman cannot execute a valid contract of suretyship. Harris v. McCastan (S. C.) 10 S. E. Rep. 104.

A note given by a married woman for money borrowed for her own use is valid, under S. C. Gen. Stat., § 2037. Howard v. Kitchens (S. C.) 10 S. E. Rep. 224.

And a note given by her for money expended on account of her child at her request is invalid. Ibid.

Wisconsin.

In Wisconsin, married women have not been vested by statute with general power to bind themselves or their separate estates, by the ordinary contract of indorsement of a note. Avery v. Doane, 1 Biss. 64.

Husband as agent of wife.

The mere relation of husband and wife creates no agency in the husband to bind her by his representations or to create an estoppel against her. Henry v. Sneed (Mo.) 12 S. W. Rep. 663; Wilcox v. Todd, 64 Mo. 383; Hall v. Callahan, 66 Mo. 316.

A married woman may manage her separate estate either in person or by an agent, and can constitute her husband her agent for that purpose, whose acts in purchasing articles for the use of her separate estate are binding upon her. Brown v. Thomson (S. C.) 10 S. E. Rep. 96.

The husband may be the agent of the wife, though the agency must be clearly established. Mead v. Spalding, 12 West. Rep. 403, 94 Mo. 43; Eystra v. Capelle, 61 Mo. 580; Rodgers v. Pike Co. Bank, 69 Mo. 532; Morrison v. Thistle, 67 Mo. 596; Baum v. Mullen, 47 N. Y. 577; Treman v. Allen, 15 Hun, 4; Abbey v. Deyo, 44 N. Y. 243; Paine v. Farr, 118 Mass. 77; Ross v. Baldwin, 65 Miss. 370. 7 L. R. A.

The bill of review, considered as one for error of law apparent upon the face of the record, is maintainable. The term "record," as used in connection with such bills, means the pleadings and decree in the cause as to which the complaint is made. Whiting v. Bank of U. S. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 6 [10 L. ed. 33]; Shelton v. Van Kleeck, 106 U. S. 532 [27 L. ed. 269].

Looking at the Paisley decree, complained of, we perceive one of its features to be a personal recovery against Mrs. Prentiss, and the pleading or bill shows the claim to be for a money demand growing out of a contract, the sum recovered being the amount of a cash payment alleged to have been made on a contract for the sale of land, in which the complainant charges he has been defrauded.

A married woman is by the common law incapable of making a contract that will bind her personally, either in law or equity; and for this reason there can be no personal judgment or decree of recovery against her. Goss v. Furman, 21 Fla. 406; Randall v. Bourguardez, 23 Fla. 264; Dollner v. Snow, 16 Fla. 86; 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 601; Pfeifer v. Smith, 2 Head, 208; McQuaid v. Fontane, 24 Fla. 509; Choppin v. Harmon, 46 Miss. 304; Bank of Louisiana v. Williams, Id. 618; Cary v. Dixon, 51 Miss. 593; Mallett v. Parham, 52 Miss. 921;

So the improvement of land, or the management of personal property, may be conducted through the agency of her husband. Noel v. Kinney, 8 Cent. Rep. 53, 106 N. Y. 74; Rowe v. Smith, 45 N. Y. 230.

Where a husband, under a power of attorney from his wife to convey her real estate, conveyed the real estate to a third party, who reconveyed to the husband on the same day, and he conveyed to the defendant, the transaction is void, being in fact a conveyance to himself by an agent authorized to sell land. A subsequent grantee of the wife may maintain ejectment against the husband's grantee. McKay v. Williams, 12 West. Rep. 33, 67 Mich. 547.

Where a husband, both before and after marriage, was the agent for his wife, and collected the interest on a note sued on, for four years before the defendant acquired it by an assignment from him, a previous note having thus been negotiated with the defendant with the wife's knowledge; and the proceeds of the note were used in paying family expenses,—a finding against the wife, as to the husband's agency, will not be disturbed. Mead v. Spalding, supra.

In an action to recover for labor done and materials furnished on a wife's house, where it appeared she was aware of the work at the time it was being done, the agency was sufficiently made out to support a verdict for the plaintiff. Kelly v. Kearns, 10 Cent. Rep. 244, 107 N. Y. 633.

But the knowledge, consent and approval of a wife, that improvements should be made to a house owned by the wife, does not of itself constitute the husband, under whose direction it was done, her agent in fact. Ziegler v. Galvin, 45 Hun, 44.

That the wife resided on premises with her husband subsequently to their being hired by him is no evidence of her husband's authority to hire as her agent. Sandford v. Pollock, 7 Cent. Rep. 321, 106 N. Y. 450.

Where a husband by an agreement with his wife, not recorded and not known to a creditor, carries on business for himself upon his wife's plantation, she is responsible, as an undisclosed principal, for those items of account only which were all for the use and benefit of the business transacted with her

Canal Bank v. Partee, 99 U. S. 325 [25 L. ed. 890]; Wallace v. Rippon, 2 Bay, 112; Rodemeyer v. Rodman, 5 Iowa, 426; Leica v. Perkins, 86 N. J. L. 133; Pentz v. Simonson, 18 N. J. Eq. 232; Pierson v. Lum, 25 N. J. Eq. 390.

Several of the above authorities are to the effect that where she has been given authority by statute to make personal contracts the proceedings must show the existence of the special circumstances as to or under which the power has been conferred or may be exercised; and others of them adjudicate that, when it is sought to charge her property with liability, the bill, or other proper pleading, must show the character of her estate in the property sought to be charged, in order that the court may know that it is chargeable. The decree assailed does not adjudicate a charge upon any particular estate or property of Mrs. Prentiss, but the feature of it in question is a personal recovery.

If it be that a personal judgment or decree may be rendered against a married woman licensed as a free trader under our Statute of March 11, 1879 (McCl. Dig. 756, 757), it is sufficient on this point to say that Mrs. Prentiss is not sued as such.

A married woman is personally liable for her wrongful civil acts or actual torts, including frauds not growing out of, or founded upon, or directly connected with, or a part of, or the means of effecting, a contract which she has undertaken to make; and she may be sued jointly with her husband in respect to such acts, or separately if she survives him. His liability for her torts is a result of the mere fact that by the common-law rules a suit cannot be maintained against the wife alone during coverture. If, before or pending the action, she dies, the right of action against him falls. Whenever her coverture avoids the contract, it is likewise a bar to a personal recovery for the fraud; and this cannot be overcome by suing ex delicto. 2 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 254-256, 261, 263; 1 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 842, 905 908; Owens v. Snodgrass, 6 Dana, 229; Smith v. Taylor, 11 Ga. 20; Koving v. Manly, 49 N. Y. 192; Liverpool Adelphe Loan Assn. v. Fairhurst, 9 Exch. 422; Wright v. Leonard, 11 C. B. N. S. 258; Capel v. Powell, 17 C. B. N. S. 743.

As to when a tort will be deemed the wife's, and when the husband's, vide 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 905, and 2 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 257-260.

The fraud in the case before us, in so far as it is imputable to the wife, is not one sounding in tort, but is a part of, and directly connected with, the contract for the sale of the land, and hence not one as to which there is a personal property; and the burden of proof is upon the creditor to show what items fall within that class. Porter v. Staten, 64 Miss. 421.

A husband undertaking to be bound for the commissions of a broker for effecting the sale of real estate of his wife is personally bound, whether he disclosed his agency for his wife or not. Jarvis v. Schaefer, 7 Cent. Rep. 675, 105 N. Y. 229.

Where the husband simply acted as agent for the wife, and did not profess to bind himself, then the note and check were not in any sense the joint instruments of the husband and wife; and unless it is proved that they were executed by them jointly, action cannot be sustained against the wife. Wilderman v. Rogers, 66 Md. 127, 5 Cent. Rep. 574; Lowe-kamp v. Koechling, 64 Md. 95.

Where a wife executed a deed absolute on its face, but in reality an equitable mortgage, to enable the grantee named therein to raise money to pay off a liability of the husband, the grantee was bound to ascertain the conditions upon which it had been executed and intrusted to the husband for delivery, the husband not being the general agent of the wife. Gilbert v. Deshon, 9 Cent. Rep. 648, 107 N. Y. 824.

Liability of wife for her torts; common-law rule.

The common-law rule making a husband liable for torts of his wife not having been abrogated by the New York Code of Civil Procedure, he is liable for damages sustained by another person in consequence of forgeries committed by her. Mangam v. Peck, 111 N. Y. 401.

At common law when a tort is committed by a married woman, she is personally liable jointly with her husband, unless her husband is both present and directs the doing of it at the time, in which case he is alone liable. Franklin's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 322, 115 Pa. 534.

His presence furnishes evidence and raises presumption of direction, but is not conclusive. Cassin v. Delany, 38 N. Y. 178.

They are jointly liable in an action for damages for the tort; but the death of the wife terminates the liability of the husband. Franklin's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 322, 115 Pa. 534.

pra; Southworth v. Kimball, 1 New Eng. Rep. 360, 58 Vt. 337.

If the husband dies she may be sued alone, as if she had been feme sole when the tort was committed. Franklin's App. supra.

While the presence of the husband furnishes evidence and raises the presumption of his direction of a tort committed by his wife, it may be rebutted by competent evidence; and in the absence of evidence that he was present, there is no presumption. Ibid.

If a wife makes unlawful sales of intoxicating liquors in the absence of her husband, there is no presumption that she acts under his coercion; but if the husband is near enough to influence the wife, although not in the same room, he is not absent. Com. v. Flaherty, 1 New Eng. Rep. 590, 140 Mass. 454.

Where a married woman wrongfully converts, in the absence of her husband, property intrusted to her as bailee, she is, at common law, personally liable for her tort, jointly with her husband. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Hell, 7 Cent. Rep. 179, 115 Pa. 437.

Exemplary damages are recoverable against husband and wife in an action against them for a malicious assault committed by the wife, though the husband is without blame, and endeavored to prevent his wife from injuring the plaintiff. Lombard v. Batchelder, 2 New Eng. Rep. 738, 58 Vt. 558.

The husband alone is liable for the wrongful detention of property by his wife, which was delivered in specie to her in his presence, with his approval, and detained for their use. Doherty v. Madgett, 1 New Eng. Rep. 344, 58 Vt. 323; Southworth v. Kimball, supra.

Connecticut.

A quæ tam action, under Conn. Gen. Stat., p. 233, § 1, for placing obstruction in a highway, is maintainable against a wife without joinder of her husband, provided the tort was committed by her without actual coercion by him. Blakeslee v. Tyler, 5 New Eng. Rep. 598, 55 Conn. 397.

Where bars obstructing a highway inclosed the lands of the wife, and after they had been taken money liability, or can be such a personal decree or judgment, as to her.

The bond for title executed by Prentiss and wife not being a basis for the money recovery against Mrs. Prentiss personally (Norton v. Turvill, 2 P. Wms. 144; Dollner v. Snow, supra; 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 842), the order of the chancellor was erroneous. Still it is proper, in view of possible future proceedings, to notice another feature of the proceedings before remanding the cause. The Paisley bill states, in effect, that the land involved in this controversy was included in a deed of trust made by Dr. Butte, the former husband of Mrs. Prentiss, to Mrs. Simmons, and providing that the land could not be conveyed by Mrs. Butte, but could be conveyed by the trustee upon the written request of Mrs. Prentiss. The bill of review represents that on July 11, 1885, prior to the marriage between Mrs. Butte and Prentiss, they entered into a marriage contract, whereby the latter agreed to relinquish and surrender to the former his right to control and manage her separate estate and property described in the above deed of trust, which is dated August 28, 1883, and any other separate property then owned, or that she might thereafter own, and that he would suffer and permit, and it authorizes her, without let, hindrance, molestation or interference on his part, to hold, occupy, "exert" and enjoy the absolute, unqualified control and management of all such property owned or to be owned by her, with all the rents, issues and profits, and all the receipts and income therefrom by sale, mortgage, lease or otherwise, as fully and absolute, and as free from his debts, as if she remained single and unmarried; he surrendering and relinquishing all his marital rights, and also the management and control of her property as her husband, under the laws of this State, and it being stipulated that she does not part with the right to dispose of the interest surrendered to her by Prentiss.

These allegations would not have the effect to create any exception to the doctrine announced above as to the money decree, and the only further observation necessary to be made as to them now is: If it be that a cash payment was made to Mrs. Prentiss, or to her husband for her, with her consent or as her authorized agent, which relation he could sustain to her (Tresch v. Wirtz, 34 N. J. Eq. 124; Baum v. Mullen, 47 N. Y. 577; Pentz v. Simonson, supra), and under the circumstances of the case, as they may be shown to exist, the land involved, or her other property, if she have any, can be charged with such payment, the trustee is, as suggested by counsel for appellants, a necessary party to any proceeding seeking to charge any property included in that trust. Lewis v. Yale, 4 Fla. 418; Dollner v. Snow, supra.

Whether or not her property is so charge-down she and her husband started together to put them up, and he said to her, as she was running ahead of him, "Put them up,"—it is not actual coercion by him. Ibid.

Indiana.

By Statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5120), married women are made liable to action for damages for their torts. Mayhew v. Burns, 1 West. Rep. 577, 108 Ind. 328.

They take right to their separate estates with all its incidents, and must use their property with due regard to the rights of others. Ibid.

The statute which provides that a married woman is jointly liable with her husband for torts relates to mere personal torts of the wife, and not to trespasses on real estate resulting in injury to others. Ibid.

Michigan.

In an action of trespass for forcible dispossession of one claiming as tenant, it was held that personal assaults made by defendant's wife in his presence were admissible, while those made while he was not present should have been excluded. Baumier v. Antiau, 8 West. Rep. 115, 65 Mich. 31.

The wife is not chargeable with the fraudulent intent of her husband, notwithstanding he may have been her agent in the management of her property and the conduct of her business. Plinsky v. Germania F. & M. Ins. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 47.

New Jersey.

Since the enactment of the statutes empowering married women to transact business independently of their husbands, they will be held more amenable to the same rules as other persons in reference to what may amount to fraud. Troxall v. Silverthorne (N. J.) 10 Cent. Rep. 189.

New York.

Under the statutes of New York, the husband must be joined as defendant in an action for the tort of the wife (having no relation to her separate property), and is liable for recovery had therein.

Fitzgerald v. Quann, 12 Cent. Rep. 745, 109 N. Y. 441.

A wife who received property through the fraudulent acts of her husband acting as her agent is liable for the consequences of such acts to the persons injured. Rush v. Dilks, 43 Hun, 282.

A married woman may have such community of interest with her husband in relation to real estate as will render her liable for his frauds relating to it; and when he, professing to act as her agent, makes false representations, although without her knowledge, and she receives the proceeds, she cannot retain the fruits of his fraud. Noel v. Kinney, 8 Cent. Rep. 58, 105 N. Y. 74.

Pennsylvania.

Since the passage of the Pennsylvania "Married Persons' Property Act," of June 8, 1887 (Pub. Laws, 333), a husband is no longer liable for torts committed by his wife alone. Kukience v. Vocht (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 855.

That Act does not deprive a married woman of her common-law exemption from arrest on capias ad respondendum or capias ad satisfaciendum in a civil action for a tort committed by her. Vocht v. Kukience, 11 Cent. Rep. 767, 119 Pa. 365; Kukience v. Vocht, supra; Whalen v. Gabell, 12 Cent. Rep. 508, 120 Pa. 284.

A married woman is personally liable for a tort committed by her, unless her husband was both personally present and directed the doing of it at the time. If directed by him, he alone is liable. Franklin's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 324, 115 Pa. 534.

Where the evidence shows a wrongful conversion of trust funds by a married woman, her estate is liable in damages although the trust funds be not identified as a part of her estate. There was no evidence of coercion by the husband. Ibid.

Virginia.

Where a wife is sued as a sole trader, under the Virginia Married Woman's Act of April 4, 1877, in an action of unlawful detainer, the consent or non-concurrence of her husband can have no effect whatever. Farley v. Tillar, 81 Va. 275.

able is a question we do not feel called upon to discuss, in the absence of both proper pleadings and necessary parties.

Though the decree assailed is one absolute upon a decree pro confesso, we think a bill of review for error apparent is a proper remedy. Stribling v. Hart, 20 Fla. 235; Maynard v. Pereault, 30 Mich. 160.

The purpose of a bill of review for error apparent is to have the court rendering the decree give the same relief that the appellate court might under the same circumstances. Evans v. Clement, 14 Ill. 206.

Where the bill does not justify the final decree which has been taken upon a decree pro confesso, relief may be had from the appellate court on an appeal (Hart v. Stribling, 21 Fla. 136), and the same may be secured through a bill of review from the court rendering the decree.

The decree appealed from should be set aside. If Paisley shall desire to amend his bill, he should be permitted to do so, and, as a consequence, his decrees should be vacated, and his cause proceed on the bill as it may be amended; but should he elect rather to stand upon his decree, modified to the extent of the personal money recovery against Mrs. Prentiss, his decree should be modified merely as to such relief against her.

The cause will be remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

TERRITORY OF IDAHO, Recept.,

v.

Henry EVANS, Appt.

(.....Idaho.....)

*1. A juror must have all the qualifications now prescribed for an elector, and a member of the so-called "Mormon Church" cannot be a juror.

2. No exception is by statute allowed to an order overruling a challenge to a juror for general cause; hence such order is not error.

3. Depositions taken in the presence of the accused may be used on trial, when, on account of death or other good cause, the presence of the witness cannot be had. Our Statutes do not forbid such use, nor is it in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.
